The explanation of the additional fee for examination of boys for Sandhurst at Wellington College, as compared with the same examination in London, appears to be very simple. Examinations are held at provincial centres—whether Wellington College or anywhere else is immaterial—on condition "that a fee of £22 to defray the minimum extra cost involved by provincial examination be paid by the centre." In addition to this the fee for examination at a provincial centre is £3 as against £2 in London. The authorities, therefore, in any local centre, say Wellington, have to levy a charge of £22 on the candidates, in addition to the extra fee of £1 a head. Whether the Civil Service Commissioners are justified in charging these amounts for the privilege of being examined locally, may be open to question. But undoubtedly the local examinations have advantages from the point of view of candidates—or, perhaps I should say, of their parents—which are worth paying for.

An inquiry was addressed to me the other day from a station hospital in Wales as to whether a medical officer has any constitutional right to inform a private of the Medical Staff Corps that he is a "barbarian," a "scoundrel," and a "d——d fool." Not finding anything in the Queen's Regulations which confers such a right upon Army doctors, I suggested to my interrogator that his best course would be to complain to his Commanding Officer. He replies that the officer in question was his Commanding Officer. What am I to tell him now?

One of my military readers asks me why no appointment has yet been made to the vacancy for a sergeant-major in the 2nd Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, which has been open since the death of the last sergeant-major in August, 1895. The question appears reasonable, inasmuch as there are non-commissioned officers in the 1st Battalion and the Depot, to say nothing of the 2nd Battalion, fully qualified for the post. I feel sure that the real answer is, that the authorities are waiting till some unqualified N.C.O., on whom they have their eye, has succeeded in qualifying himself. This I say, not because I know anything whatever of the facts, but because I have heard of so many cases where such vacancies have been kept open for this purpose. It occurs to me that if a battalion can get on without a sergeant-major for a year and three months, there cannot be any good reason why the vacancy should be filled up at all.

A statement, commented upon in TRUTH a fortnight ago, that the Board of Trade had decided to disallow the proposed War Office regulations for artillery practice in the Solent, would seem to have been premature. At any rate, no official information on the subject had been received at Portsmouth up to the end of last week. The Board of Trade, however, will certainly show a lamentable indifference to local interests if they allow these regulations to pass on the information at present before them.

The Portsmouth Chamber of Commerce has been moving the Board for a further inquiry at Portsmouth before the case is finally disposed of, and the grounds for this request are extremely strong. It seems that at the inquiry which actually was held, Sir George Nares, the Board of Trade representative, refused to receive evidence as to the damage which the proposed rules would inflict upon the trade, passenger traffic, and general interests of Southsea and the vicinity, as health resorts, as well as upon the danger and alarm which might be occasioned to residents. Yet at the adjourned inquiry which took place in the Isle of Wight, these points were gone into. From the correspondence that has passed, it would seem that the Board of Trade question the legal admissibility of evidence under these heads. In that case they ought not to have gone into it at the Isle of Wight inquiry. But it seems a monstrous thing that such a question should be decided without full weight being given to every possible interest affected, and it is difficult to believe that Parliament so intended. It will strike most people as strange that an inquiry of this nature, in which the interests of the public and the Service are at issue, should be entrusted to a Service man at all.

The attitude of the Naval and Military authorities towards the Marines has been conspicuously exemplified in the distribution of honours for the Dongola operations. In June last, in response to a telegram from Sir H. Kitchener, an officer and nine N.C.O.s of the Royal Marine Artillery were sent out to Egypt, to drill Egyptians, and to command the Nile gunboats The Sirdar especially asked for Marines, and named the officer whom he wanted. The party were engaged at Wady Halfa all through the hot weather in repairing the gunboats, getting together the armament, and drilling the Egyptian crews. Only when all these preliminaries were over did Commander Colville and three other naval officers come out and endeavour to get the command of the river operations—a kindly endeavour which was, I believe, frustrated by the Sirdar himself. Yet when the operations were over Commander Colville got his promotion and a C.B., and another of the Naval officers a D.S.O., while the Captain of Marines, who had been in charge of all the hardest and dirtiest work, received no recognition of any kind. So it has been throughout the whole history of this invaluable Corps.

A further incident in Major Brittan's case which has come to my knowledge serves to accentuate the vindictive spirit in which the Admiralty have behaved towards that officer. It appears that after he had been appointed to the Rodney, on his deprivation of his post at Plymouth, he endeavoured to negotiate an exchange, in order, if possible, to avoid the expense thrown on him by having to leave the country at a moment's notice. The Admiralty, however, refused to sanction the exchange, thus clearly proving that, not content with ousting Major Brittan from his berth, they were determined to banish him to a foreign station. All this without preferring any formal charge, without trying him, and without giving him the slightest opportunity of defence. Could there possibly be a more unscrupulous and tyrannical abuse of power?

It is impossible for me to devote further space to Major Brittan and the Marines at the present moment, but the many correspondents who have addressed me on the subject may rely upon it that I shall not lose sight of their communications. I may mention, however, that I have been corrected over the statement that the Captain of Marines of the Victory received a brevet majority after the battle of Trafalgar. My corrector states that the Captain of Marines on board the Victory was Captain Charles Adair, who was killed in the battle. I still believe it to be a fact, however, that the services of the Marines at Trafalgar were recognised by the award of a brevet majority to one officer present, although I cannot say at the moment who this officer was.

The mysterious disappearance of the British Consul at Madeira continues to exercise the British colony at that place. On the arrival of the Training Squadron at the island last month, the Consul failed to pay the usual official visit to the Commodore, who declined to receive an official visit from the Vice-Consul—virtually a clerk in the Consular office. This is only in keeping with the custom of the Consul for many months past, he having paid no official visits of any kind, and the whole business of the Consulate having been performed by the Vice-Consul. When, some six months back, I commented upon the official limitation of the hours of labour at the Consulate to two and a half per diem, I was rebuked for want of sympathy with the Consul in a domestic bereavement which he had sustained. If, however, this bereavement still incapacitates the Consul from attending to his duties, the question arises whether this incapacitation may not be permanent. This again suggests the further question, why, if for an indefinite period the whole work of the Consular office can be efficiently discharged by a Vice-Consul at £100 a year, need we pay a Consul £700 a year to do it?

Still the war between direct employment and employment through a contractor rages at the L.C.C. as though some vital principle were involved. I am myself a Progressive, also a London ratepayer. I want good work for my money, a fair wage to those employed, and, under these conditions, proper economy in expenditure. Assuredly, with the data in hand, a Committee might arrive at some definite conclusion between the two systems. If work is scamped by a contractor, this is the fault of those who employ him. It is stated that contractors' work in regard to sewers was scamped at Manchester. But I should have thought that every one knew that underground work should not be allowed to be covered before being passed. A certain amount of work has been done under the Works Committee of the L.C.C. The first thing is to arrive at its cost, including central expenses and depreciation of plant. This assuredly cannot be difficult. What it would have cost, if done by contract, is a more difficult problem; but the difficulty is not insuperable. To this would have to be added the cost of thorough supervision by architect, clerks of works, &c. Having arrived at these facts, then the cheaper system should be adopted. If in either case the worker has the same—i.e., the trades-union—wage, his position is not altered, whether he be employed by the Works Committee, or by a man contracting to do the work of the Council.

There are so many men nowadays ready to contract, that I doubt whether contractors could form a ring. Assuming that the Works Committee spends in building, &c., £300,000 per annum, even three per cent. net profit would be £9,000, and there surely are many respectable men engaged in the building trade who would not despise this solatium. Competition would keep down profits. Moreover, the fact of contracting for the Board and giving it satisfaction would be a very considerable advertisement. Contractors vary: some make money, others lose it. This is because the first are men who thoroughly understand how to buy material and how to manage their business. Now, I very much doubt whether a Board of well-intentioned amateurs, with a manager under them getting £700 per annum, has this knowledge, for it is by no means possessed even by all who make building their trade.

An interesting comparison might be drawn between the so-called "scandals" in the County Council Works Department and the much more real and substantial scandals which have been exposed in the work of the Royal Engineers. Readers of TRUTH will remember that, in connection with the reconstruction of the Royal Barracks at Dublin, a little matter of some £50,000 mysteriously disappeared, and has never yet been accounted for. On this fact being brought to light, the Inspector-General of Fortifications, the head of the department responsible for the job, was made a K.C.B. Considering that it has been clearly proved that not a half-penny has been misappropriated in the County Council Works Department, that nothing has taken place beyond a mere transfer of items to equalise the profit and loss account on different jobs, and that all the officials who resorted to this financial hocus-pocus have been dismissed from their posts, or otherwise punished, the contrast between these two cases is fully significant enough. Equally significant is the fact that while the Globe and other Tory papers have been for weeks in a state of hysterical indignation over irregularities in the Works Department which have not cost the taxpayer a halfpenny, not one of these journals has ever thought fit to allude to the blundering incapacity of the Royal Engineers, through which the country has been robbed to the tune of at least £50,000, and goodness knows how much besides.

I hear from a source that has never proved inaccurate up to the present moment, that the practice which has got the County Council officials into so much trouble has been habitually resorted to on jobs executed by the Royal Engineers. As one instance, it can be proved that in barrack building in one of the colonies, under the Imperial Defence Loan, materials ordered and paid for in respect of one building have been systematically used for others. In one case, through the bungling of an officer in charge of the works, telegrams had, on two occasions, to be despatched to England for bricks and cement for building operations in the Indian Ocean. On this same station, one building which was to have cost under £5,000, actually cost £5,500. Another on which £500 had to be spent, cost £800. I do not know whether anybody was made a K.C.B. on the strength of these transactions. Perhaps the Editor of the Globe will be able to enlighten us.

As I expected, the Leatherhead Urban Council has refused to fall in with the modest proposal of the Headley parish meeting that a right of way over a footpath in Leatherhead should be surrendered in return for the removal of some gates across a road in Headley. Having taken a proper and sensible view of their duty in this matter, the Council might now usefully turn their attention to the right of way across Woodlands Park. A local resident tells me that a row of iron posts, intended to carry wire fencing, has been erected across a footpath there, and the Council would do well to interfere before this fence is completed. This would be far better than leaving it to the public to demolish the obstruction.

About £9,000 has been obtained towards the £12,000 needed for securing the enlargement and preservation of the public ground in Aldersgate, near the General Post Office, which has come to be familiarly known as the Postman's Park. It would be a great misfortune if the opportunity of adding to this pleasant garden in the City were lost, and I hope the appeal which the Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Botolph are making for the money still required will be successful.

A parish meeting was held at Feniscowles, near Blackburn, last week, to consider what steps should be taken respecting the issue of writs by Sir William Feilden for possession of the parish school. No rent has been paid for the school for sixty-two years and the buildings have been maintained and improved at the expense of the parishioners. It was decided to pay the rent demanded by the owner of the estate, this being the only alternative to giving up possession of the school.

The Corporation of Richmond seem to be a set of incorrigible vandals. All visitors to the town will remember the holly hedge which runs along the front of the Terrace, separating it from the meadow below. The Corporation have now evolved a scheme for removing the central portion of this hedge, and substituting a monstrosity of their own invention in the shape of an iron railing. The hedge was an appropriate rural feature in the landscape, and had the advantage of not obstructing the view from the Terrace seats. Although ragged in places, it only needed banking up at the roots and replanting here and there in order to preserve it intact.

Bailie Pollard, of Edinburgh, may be a very good Bailie, but he does not know his own countrymen. At a public dinner the other night he was so ill advised as to attempt a good-humoured joke—what in South Britain we should call a bit of "chaff"—at the expense of a brother Bailie from Portobello. Portobello has been amalgamated with Edinburgh, somewhat against its own wishes. And Bailie Pollard's little joke (prefaced by the flattering remark that the Portobello members were as sensible as any on the Council) was to the effect that he had particularly noticed one of his Portobello colleagues "amalgamating" at lunch time, and that "amalgamation" seemed to agree with him. By this time the facetious Bailie doubtless regrets his witticism. A solemn letter has appeared in the local Press, signed "G. Balfour, C.," lecturing Bailie Pollard on his lack of breeding, and haughtily recording that "I resent, on behalf of myself and amalgamation colleagues, the unseemly remarks which fell from Bailie Pollard." It is a peculiarity of some Scotchmen not only to "jock wi' deeficulty," bu also to take a jock wi' deeficulty.

The sorrows of Eastbourne were further aired at a meeting which took place the other day, to consider the desirability of raising a fund to advertise the town. The fact, of course, which the town is most anxious to advertise is that it now has an unimpeachable supply of good drinking water. The chief difficulty in the way seemed to be the question whether this fact really is a fact; and the true state of the case was only too clearly indicated by the Medical Officer of Health, who, while stating that the Holywell water is excellent, observed that it could hardly be described as a "supply." As soon as Eastbourne is itself again in the matter of water, I, for one, shall be delighted to advertise the fact quite independently of any fund that may be raised for the purpose; and as the townspeople are now doing everything in their power to provide drinkable water, I trust that the day when I can truthfully do so is not far distant. The manager of the Queen's Hotel stated at the recent meeting that from the moment when TRUTH made unpleasant remarks—"attacked" was his expression—about the local water supply the hotel business began to fall off. I can only tell him that when the proper time arrives I will do my best to send his customers back, and will set the example by coming myself among the first.

Some time ago I drew attention to the sweating of the assistants in public libraries. The Leeds Public Library was, if I remember rightly, one of the institutions which I mentioned in this connection; but from a remarkable incident which has just been brought under my notice it is evident that the Committee there, unlike most bodies of the kind, do not content themselves with practising their economies on the junior members of the staff. This year they seem to have thought they would like a slice out of the Chief Librarian's salary, and, accordingly, when that official applied for his usual month's holiday, it was granted with an extraordinary addition to the resolution, ordering him to take "leave of absence for the following two months without salary." To treat an official of many years' service and high reputation in his profession in this way is, I should think, almost unprecedented.

Sir Robert Edgcumbe read to the Dorset Field Club the other day a highly edifying paper on the arms of the town of Dorchester and the county of Dorset, from which it appears that the ancient arms of Dorchester are often grievously misrepresented, while the county is in the painful position of having no arms at all. In this condition the county seems to have adopted the plan of the various nouveaux enrichis whose misdeeds have been exposed by that acute writer "X," of the Saturday Review; that is to say, the County Council invented arms for itself in the shape of "three full-grown but emaciated lions." The Councillors might as well have done the thing in style while they were about it, and engaged three lively unicorns at the same time; but the idea doesn't seem to have occurred to them. Sir Robert Edgcumbe explains to the County Councillors the course they should adopt if they want a respectable and genuine article; but I think they would do far better to apply to the eminent artist who has been designing arms for some of our rising families in the pages of Punch, and who seems to me to have a far truer appreciation of the possibilities of heraldry than anybody at the Heralds' College.

A lawyer who has been reading my remarks on the "necessity" of champagne for Peers' sons when under age, corrects me as to the liability of parents for "necessaries" supplied to their "infants." He writes:—

> The rule on this point was laid down by Lord Abinger in Mortimer v. Wright (6 M. & W., 482), as follows: "In point of law a father who gives no authority and enters into no contract (i.e., of agency) is no more liable for goods supplied to his son than a brother, or an uncle, or a mere stranger would be."

If this is so, many fathers will probably be pleased to hear it. The law, however, has a knack of discovering "implied" contracts where an ordinary mortal might not suspect their existence.

The old magistrates and the new do not seem to get on very well together at the Dewsbury West Riding Police-court. Those of the old order are rather inclined to ignore those who sit by virtue of their office as Chairmen of District Councils, and last week two of the latter publicly protested against a decision which had been given without consultation with them. By doing so they caused an unseemly scene, but still their protests appear to have been quite justifiable. The magistrates who have been elected have just as much right to a voice in the decisions of the Bench as the magistrates who owe their seats to social or political influence, and the sooner the latter recognise this the better for the dignity of the court and the administration of justice.

A shocking exhibition of magisterial ferocity in dealing with juvenile offenders was given at Rhyl Police-court last week. Three boys, named Williams, Mellor, and Owens, and aged twelve, thirteen, and fourteen years respectively, were convicted of breaking into a school (which, as a matter of fact, they entered through an open window), and stealing a quantity of books, pencils, and other articles, and 5s. 9d. in money. It was admitted by the police that "there was nothing against Mellor and Owens," and if the Rhyl Justices had had an atom of common sense, to say nothing of compassion, these lads would have been discharged under the First Offenders Act. What Messrs. W. Wynne and R. M. Hugh Jones did, however, was to sentence Mellor and Owens each to one month's hard labour. As for the third culprit, Williams, it seemed that he was birched last February for a petty theft, and so, in consequence of his "previous conviction," this child of twelve was committed for six weeks' hard labour; while, to round off their performance, the Dracos who passed these monstrous sentences actually took credit to themselves for their "leniency." A firm of solicitors at Rhyl has brought the case before the Home Secretary, on behalf of the widowed mother of the boy Owens, and I have little doubt that Sir Matthew White Ridley will at once order the release of all three prisoners. If the Lord Chancellor would at the same time erase the names of Messrs. Wynne and Jones from the Commission of the Peace it would be a decided gain to the interests of justice.

There was a poaching case at Bromyard Petty Sessions last week which, for more reasons than one, calls for special notice. To begin with, the prosecuting gamekeeper, before giving his evidence, handed a letter to the Bench which the Chairman partly read and then tore up. Subsequently the Chairman mentioned that this letter was from Sir Francis Winnington, the gamekeeper's employer, and that it was "a most improper communication." What the purport of the letter was the Chairman did not indicate, but it must have been something highly reprehensible to evoke his strong condemnation of his brother magistrate, Sir Francis, and it is a pity the latter's conduct was not under the notice of Mr. Justice Hawkins, who might have been relied upon to give him a lesson which he would not have forgotten in a hurry.

That the letter was not exactly favourable to the defendant, Joseph Smith, a farmer on Sir Francis Winnington's estate, may, I think, be safely inferred from the circumstances of the case. Smith was charged with "taking game by night" on the estate, but it appeared from the gamekeeper's statement that the offence took place at 5.30 in the evening, only five minutes after sunset. To call this night poaching was too much even for the Bromyard Bench, and the charge was reduced to one of trespass in pursuit of game. It was then proved that Smith had shot a pheasant, but it appeared that he gave it up to the gamekeeper, and his defence was that he mistook the pheasant for a wood pigeon. In the dusk such a mistake is not incredible. But, as a matter of course in a Game Law case, the Bench, instead of giving the defendant the benefit of any doubt which might exist, fined him £2 and costs. Apart from Sir Francis Winnington's letter and the Justices' decision, there are one or two facts in connection with this case which, though they have not been mentioned in the newspaper reports, deserve the fullest publicity. Mr. Smith, the defendant, is a farmer who was born on Sir Francis Winnington's estate, and who has lived there all his life. He has held his present holding of between 300 and 400 acres for six years, and though the farm abounds with game, there has been no complaint against him before. In the present instance he apologised to the agent for shooting the pheasant, and offered to apologise to his landlord, but the latter refused to see him. It was, indeed, considered too serious a matter to end with an apology, or even with a prosecution, for, incredible as it may seem, I am informed on good authority that, after his unfortunate mishap with the sacred bird, Smith was at once called upon to pay up all arrears of rent before the usual audit, the result being that he has had to arrange a sale of his stock by auction. If this be true, a more amazing example of the lengths to which the game-preserving mania will carry a landowner, even in these days of agricultural depression, has rarely been recorded.

Considerable surprise was, I am told, excited at the Liverpool Assizes by the youth of one of the gentlemen sworn on the Grand Jury. The young man in question presumably possesses the necessary property qualifications, but on the Grand Jury people naturally expect to see men of mature judgment and experience, and the inclusion of a stripling not long past his twenty-first birthday is a curious and undesirable innovation. It is suggested that this juvenile grand juror was indebted for the compliment of the summons to the fact that his father this year fills the office of Chaplain to the High Sheriff. Doubtless the reverend gentleman, however, would rather have had his son spared a compliment which involved his introduction to the details of a good many vicious stories which could scarcely benefit the mind of one of his age.

With reference to the rejection of the bill at Glamorganshire Assizes against Mrs. Edwards, the wife of a clergyman who was charged with cruelty to her child, a correspondent gives me another account of what transpired in the Grand Jury room. He states that there was actually a majority of the Grand Jury in favour of returning a true bill, but that it was considered this majority was not sufficiently large, and so the minority were allowed to have their way. However this may be, it seems to be a fact that the Grand Jury did not confine their attention, as they ought to have done, to the question whether there was a primâ facie case against the accused, and in throwing out the bill in defiance of the direction they received from Mr. Justice Mathew they were guilty of a grave dereliction of duty.

Perhaps the most surprising and inexplicable item in my Legal Pillory this week is the sentence of two months' imprisonment which was passed on an old man at Kent Assizes. I never could see either reason or justice in visiting an attempt at suicide with a term of imprisonment, as though that would be likely to reconcile the accused to life; and in this particular instance the age of the prisoner and his state of mind at the time ought surely to have saved him from punishment. Why could not the poor old fellow have been handed over to the care of his friends, or, if he has none, why not have sent him to the workhouse? In the remainder of the list there is little or nothing to call for special comment. It shows how leniently such offences as brutal assaults on wives or gross acts of cruelty to dumb animals are treated in comparison with the crimes of poaching, vagrancy, and petty larceny; but this is only the topsy-turvy administration of justice to which we have long been accustomed from our enlightened magistracy:—

Fife Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Henderson. Robert Seath, junior, grocer, pleaded guilty to an outrageous assault on a passenger in a railway carriage. He kicked the prosecutor in the ribs, and pushed his head through the window, whereby he was severely cut and injured. Fined £1. 10s.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before Alderman H. H. Bemrose and Messrs. Stokes and Williamson. William Kniveton, convicted of assaulting his wife. She said he struck her in the face, blackening her eyes and knocking her down, and after attempting to strangle her, turned her out of the house. Fined 5s. and costs.

Horncastle Police-court. Before the Rev. Canon Wright and the Revs. J. Graham and W. O. Massingberd. Alfred Drewery, butcher, summoned for working a horse whilst it was in an unfit state. The animal, an old pony, which had been bought for 17s., was in an emaciated condition. It suffered from severe "mattering" sores, and altogether was in a totally unfit state for work. Fined 10s. and 7s. costs.

Edinburgh City Police-court. Martin White, convicted of assaulting his wife by striking her on the head and face with his fists, and kicking her on the body. She was in an advanced state of pregnancy. Fined £3.

Coventry Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. T. G. Beamish, C. J. Hill, J. B. London, and J. Maycock. Charles Ward, convicted of assaulting John A. Parkinson. Defendant struck complainant on the head with a poker, rendering him insensible. Fined 20s. and costs.

Broughty Ferry Police-court. George Croll pleaded guilty to assaulting a girl. It was a bad case, defendant having followed the girl, violently seized hold of her, and attempted to stifle her cries by placing his hand over her mouth. Fined 40s.

Fife Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Henderson. Thomas Batchelor Baxter, moulder, pleaded guilty to poaching. Fined £2.

Burnley Quarter Sessions. Before the Recorder. George Greenbank, convicted of stealing eight eggs from a garden. Three months.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before Alderman J. P. Doherty and Mr. G. B. Unsworth. Thomas Holdridge, charged with wandering abroad and lodging in the open air, and having no visible means of subsistence. Fourteen days.

Thorpe Petty Sessions. Before the Rev. Canon Norman, Rev. A. Page, Mr. E. K. Norman, and Colonel Davis. William Cooper, summoned for using a gun to take game without a licence. A constable and a gamekeeper swore that he shot a pheasant. For the defence three witnesses who were with Cooper denied that he had a gun or killed a pheasant. Fined £10 and £1. 4s. costs.

Lexden and Winstree Police-court. Before Mr. J. Bateman and other magistrates. John Page, charged with absconding from the workhouse. Fourteen days.

Newbury County Police court. Before the Mayor. William Saunders, charged with vagrancy by sleeping out. Seven days.

Salisbury County Police-court. Ernest Judd, charged with poaching. Three months.

Kent Assizes. Before Mr. Baron Pollock. Edward Cottrell Burfield, aged 66, pleaded guilty to attempting to commit suicide by hanging himself. It was stated that he had met with reverses which had affected his mind. Two months.

Leamington Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. Caroline Roe, a maiden lady, charged with cruelty by starving four cats, which were kept in an outhouse for ten days whilst the defendant was out of town. The cats when found were mere skeletons and could scarcely crawl. Fined £1. 1s.

Cardiff Police-court. William Mortimer, convicted of cruelty to a dog. He was leading the dog by a strap, and witnesses saw him swing the animal in the air and kick it in a brutal manner, after which he banged its head against some boards. Fined £3 and costs.

Plymouth Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Wills and J. Cumming. Ellen Wood, wife of a pensioner, charged with stealing ½ lb. weight from a shop. She had been previously convicted of drunkenness and larceny, and it was stated that her craving for drink had been her ruin. Three months.

Temple Cloud Police-court. William Huish, an old man, summoned for stealing 20 lb. of hay. Twenty-one days.

Petworth Police-court. Before Messrs. Henry Upton and J. Osmaston. Alfred Denyer and Wm. Shotter, charged with poaching. Two months each.

I have received a letter from the foreman of the coroner's jury in respect to the paragraph in last week's TRUTH concerning an inquest at Barry, questioning the accuracy of my version of the facts of the case, which was based upon a local newspaper report. The main point was that the deceased, a boy of fifteen, had been at work for nearly thirty-four hours between Sunday night and Tuesday morning, when he was drowned. To this my correspondent replies that the lad had only been at work on his last job ten or eleven hours; but it is admitted that he had been engaged on other jobs at the same works from midnight of the previous day. It is said that he "voluntarily" worked on during the second night, and that he would not have been allowed to do so if it had been known he had already done "two shifts." The foreman thinks that if I had been present at the inquest I should have come to the same conclusion as the jury. I do not think so. It would take a good deal to convince me that this boy of fifteen worked through one night, the next day, and a second night of his own free will, and without any one in authority knowing anything about it.

With reference to the stamping of statutory declarations made before J.P.s, a country solicitor informs me that such declarations are exempt from stamp duty Another legal correspondent complained to me the other day that Justices of the Peace should be allowed to take statutory declarations at all, and thereby interfere with the perquisites of notaries public and commissioners of oaths who have to work hard for their living. If, however, it is really the case that all declarations before Justices are exempt from stamp duty, I take it that the intention of the Legislature was to provide a means of making such a declaration free of all costs. In that case we have a further argument against the practice of J.P.s charging fees for witnessing such declarations.

My note of last week with regard to the practice of Newquay J.P.s in charging fees for witnessing statutory declarations, has brought me a letter from Mr. M. Williams, the senior magistrate resident in the town. It seems from his statement that in 1892 the magistrates of the division decided to demand any fee which might be payable for "performing any magisterial act," and to pass on such fee to the clerk, in order that he might account for it to the county treasurer. In a circular issued at the time, the clerk stated that "a fee of 1s. is payable for every oath and declaration, except it be to obtain pay, pension, or allowance from Government, a friendly society, or charitable fund." Mr. Williams explains that his invariable custom has been "to keep a small wooden box in a drawer of his writing-desk into which he drops every shilling received by way of fee;" and when a few shillings are thus collected he hands them to the clerk. Mr. Williams is, of course, only able to speak for himself, but I hope it may be taken that other magistrates pursue the same course, and that the Great Unpaid, either at Newquay or elsewhere, have not been pocketing for themselves fees to which they are not entitled.

Miss "Nellie Lane," the damsel who has been before the readers of TRUTH for several months past under different aliases, and in connection with the "Carlton Society" of Leeds, and the "Kensington Association" of St. John's Wood, was last week convicted at Winchester Assizes, and sentenced to three years' penal servitude. The most remarkable point about the case was the accommodating spirit manifested by his Lordship (Mr. Justice Wills) in passing sentence. Three years' penal servitude was the first decision. The prisoner, however, begged so strongly that it might be made five years, that his Lordship obliged by making it five. The ground of the prisoner's request was that as a five years' convict she would be better treated, and would be "sent to a refuge when she came out, and not be thrown upon the world." After her removal, however, some kindly gaoler seems to have disabused her of this idea, and presently she was brought back into court, gravely informed his Lordship that she had been under a misapprehension, and begged him to "make it three years again." The Judge, whose anxiety to comply with the wishes of convicts is as rare as it is commendable, at once made it three years again.

The jury, in returning their verdict in this case, expressed a belief that the "Carlton Society" was originally started with honest intentions. Where they got this idea I do not know. The truth seems to be that since she came out of prison a few months ago, this young woman has simply been living on her wits, and she has shown that her wits are very considerable. A remark which she made to the detective who arrested her is very significant, and may entitle her to some sympathy. "When I went to Woking Prison," she said, "I was an innocent woman. When I came out, I knew everything" —meaning, I suppose, everything bad. This may account for her anxiety not to be "thrown on the world" when she has completed her present sentence. She is only twenty-four years of age now, decently educated, and lady-like, and if any benevolent lady accustomed to such cases would take her in hand in three years' time, it would be an act of true charity.

The man Bennett, who was fined at Hull the other day for the awful crime of cutting a pane of glass in his own workshop on a Sunday, was brought up again last week on another charge of the same gravity. It then transpired that the man was actually a Jew. This illustrates the Lord's Day Act in a more odious light than ever, for this statute is actually being used for the purpose of the most intolerable form of religious persecution, that of enforcing upon a member of one religious community the observance of the ordinances of another. How we continue to tolerate the existence of such a scandalous law in this age I am at a loss to understand.

A monstrous decision was given by two Swansea Magistrates the other day in a case in which fifty-three tin-plate workers were sued by their employers for leaving their work without due notice. It seemed that the contract with these defendants had been repeatedly changed, but latterly they were working under a twenty-eight days' notice, and when a strike was resolved upon they handed in such a notice on the first Monday in the month. It is the usual rule in the trade for twenty-eight days' notice to begin on that day; but at the end of the month it transpired that there was a special contract at these particular works requiring that the notice should be given on a Saturday before noon. The employers who made this stipulation had never brought it to the individual attention of the men. On the strength of it, however, they took proceedings, and though no loss had been occasioned by the technical irregularity in the notices, the Bench ordered each defendant to pay £2 damages and 7s. costs—a total of £124. 11s. A nominal penalty of a shilling or so would have amply met the case, and the award of heavy damages against these working men was grossly unjust. Matters of this kind ought not to be left to the Great Unpaid—especially when, as in this instance, the chairman has been himself engaged as an employer in the trade affected by the dispute.

The Thomas Kempe who has been lately referred to in TRUTH in connection with his advertisements of a cure for deafness appears to be no better than a systematic, thoroughgoing swindler. I hear of one case after another in which he has taken people's money, and failed for months and months to forward anything whatever in return. To facilitate this game, apparently, he does his advertising chiefly in regions at such a distance from London, that his victims are not likely to trouble him personally, or to incur the expense of legal proceedings. I mentioned the other day the case of a Hindoo gentleman who had been thus defrauded. A similar tale is now told by a resident in Port of Spain, Trinidad. Fortunately, TRUTH circulates quite as widely as Kemp[illegible] advertisements are likely to do, and it may be hoped [illegible] after this those provincial and colonial journals th[illegible] been publishing his advertisements will rather [illegible] to be to put their readers on their guard against th[illegible]

An itinerant quack, calling himself "Dr. Maloney, physician and surgeon, of Melbourne," has lately been giving free entertainments in the North of Ireland and Scotland, by way, apparently, of decoying the public into his "private consulting-room." Is this the Australian legislator of the same name and profession, who was referred to in TRUTH of August 27 in connection with his recent tour in India? If so, it will no doubt interest the police to know whether he still has on his staff the still more notorious quack named "Richard," whose history was told in TRUTH a year or two ago, who was exposed at Manchester, and who subsequently fled the country. In his flaming advertisements "Dr. Maloney" omits to specify the particular seat of learning from which he holds a diploma, and this is another point on which information would be interesting, especially, I imagine, to the medical authorities in all parts of the United Kingdom.

The enterprising Ernest Day evidently does not keep a list of his victims. A lady in Yorkshire, who was induced by him some four or five years ago to buy for two guineas a worthless print of a supposed ancestor, has just received another letter from him offering another portrait of the same individual. Of course, Day makes his second attempt in precisely the same terms as the first, writing on mourning edged paper, stating that he has just come into the portrait through the death of a relative, and that "straightened circumstances" compel him to part with it, &c. The fact that this scamp has now been playing this game for five or six years past, in precisely the same form, and that he continues to make it pay, notwithstanding incessant exposure, does not speak very highly for the intelligence of the class on which he preys.

In response to an inquiry in TRUTH of the 19th ult., I have received some interesting information concerning Mr. M. A. Yonge, or Young, of Woodbrook, Dawlish. It seems that in May last this gentleman professed himself desirous of obtaining a partnership, and for that purpose placed himself in the hands of an agency in London. He then described himself as prepared to invest up to £10,000 in "a sound manufacturing or trading business," and as having been many years in the United States, Australia, and South Africa. The £10,000 he stated to be locked up in South African securities, which he did not wish to disturb unnecessarily, and he therefore attached to his requirements the peculiar condition that he must be allowed six months' preliminary investigation of the business, by being employed in it for that time at a rate of remuneration to be agreed upon. Any party to whom such a proposal was made would naturally (unless partially imbecile) require on his side proof of Mr. Young's bona fides, or at least of the existence of the £10,000 which he was to invest if suited. In one instance an attempt was made to obtain something of this kind from Mr. Young, but without success. It is, to say the least, singular that a capitalist who was anxious to invest £10,000 in a sound manufacturing business in May, and who did not wish to disturb his investments till fully satisfied about the concern, should be in October engaged in a business of a financial character at Monte Carlo; and, putting all the facts together, I should advise extreme caution in all dealings with Mr. M. A. Young.

For the information of heads of convents in Ireland and any one else whom it may concern, I may mention once again that "the daughter of the late gifted Thomas McNevin" is a very doubtful object of charity. This lady, as many of my readers will remember, is exploited by a Mr. Hubert de Burgh, who has been for years writing begging-letters on her behalf from 38, Great Charles-street, Dublin. The letters are almost always in the same form of words, recapitulating the sorrows of the daughter of the late gifted Thomas McNevin, more especially in the death of "her talented little girl." Why a lady should require assistance in cash to-day because her little girl, however talented, died two or three years ago, Mr. de Burgh wisely refrains from explaining. With equal wisdom, he omits from his letters any mention of the fact that he is himself the half-brother of the daughter of the late gifted T. McNevin, and that they both reside in the same house. He has been able, unfortunately, to impose on the benevolence of a few well-known Irishmen, and he uses their letters as passports to the confidence of others, who might otherwise be on their guard against him.

De Burgh is now devoting himself specially to the Irish convents. In writing to the "Reverend Mother" of one such institution, he encloses a letter received from another convent with a donation of 5s. Inquiry was very wisely made from this convent as to what they knew about Mr. de Burgh, and it turned out that all they knew was that De Burgh had written to them a similar letter, enclosing a sympathetic note received, with a donation of £1, from a third convent. A better instance could not be found of the truth, on which I have so often insisted, that every person who encourages a begging appeal by sending money without due inquiry thereby facilitates the entrapping of another victim. "One fool makes many."

The latest thing in quack advertising is the distribution of the cards of a female quack doctor from house to house by women disguised as hospital nurses. My information on the subject comes from the Southern suburbs, where a householder complains that his daughter, opening the door in answer to a double knock, had this card put into her hands. The card is really an order form, to be filled up and posted; which being done, the advertiser offers to send her invaluable pamphlet "in sealed letter, post free." It strikes me that, if the card be read with the pamphlet, it amounts to a breach of the Indecent Advertisements Act, and that those who are annoyed in this way should put the police on the track of Madame ——'s "hospital nurses."

I am glad to find that the proprietor of the "Sun Incandescent Gas Light" has had his attention called to the remarks upon his advertisement in last week's Truth. In writing from Liverpool to inform me of this fact, he asserts that there is no danger whatever in the use of the lamp, which may be his opinion, but is certainly not mine. He also justifies the use of the term "incandescent," by referring me to the etymology of the word. If it comes to that, every light produced by combustion is an "incandescent" light, and this particular contrivance is just as much, and just as little, an incandescent light as an ordinary gas burner or oil lamp. As, however, the term "incandescent" has come to be specially applied, more particularly in regard to gas lighting, to one particular type of burner, I remain of opinion that the application of this term to the mere combination of a gas and oil flame is misleading.

There is but cold comfort to the lover of the incomparable oyster in the report from the Medical Officer to the Local Government Board, recently made public. The same risks are pointed out, and it is shown that the public health is placed in jeopardy when oyster-dealers, for the sake of plumpness, place oysters in the mouths of fresh-water creeks in close proximity to sewers. Various places round the coast are indicated whence oysters should never, on any account, be consumed; but unless some one will get a law passed that each oyster-shell shall be distinctly marked with the place of its birth, the adventurous consumer can only go on doing what he has practically had to do any time this last five years, and "chance it." Some day the long-suffering bivalve may succeed in thoroughly clearing its reputation, and then the nervous portion of the community will have an opportunity of recouping themselves for so many years of enforced abstinence.

It is a silly thing of foreign countries to enable us, by means of bounties, to have sugar at 1½d. per lb., whilst their own countrymen have to pay about 5d. for the same amount; but it is not for us to complain of a system that saves a few pence to every working man in the country, and makes us the chief manufacturers of sugared confectionery in the world. With their mania, however, for insisting on the inhabitants of these isles taxing themselves for all who live out of them, our Jingoes would have us exclude all bounty sugar, in order that the sugar-planters of the West Indies may be in a position to oblige us to buy their sugar at a higher price than what we have to pay for bounty sugar.

These West Indian sugar-planters have old-fashioned machinery, and they employ coolie labour. They have been to the population of the West Indies much what our landlords have been to us. Where the profit to us would come in, by our paying more for sugar in order to benefit them, does not quite appear. The West Indies have been going down hill ever since slavery was abolished there. This is in the main because it costs so little to obtain the necessaries of life that the negroes are disinclined to work. One would really suppose, from the nonsense that is written, that these favoured climes could bring nothing but sugar into the market.

"Last week," writes a correspondent, "Truth told us that the Poet Laureate was fishing in Scotland. This week, I read, he has been making speeches in Kent at a Volunteer prize distribution Yesterday he was reported as having been half drowned in the Tweed, but this, fortunately, turns out to be a false report. Well I, for my part, do not think that we have any reason to blame Mr. Austin for his recent proceedings, and I address him the following lines to encourage him to go on fishing in the Tweed rather than in Helicon, and to induce him to allow his harp to remain on the willow tree where it has so long been hanging":—

TO OUR DUMB POET LAUREATE.

Still, Alfred, anything but verse
Thy errant fancy chooses;
Still any task save poesy
Thy fickle taste amuses.
Thy lyre in silence on the wall
Depends from this or that peg;
Thy bays, already somewhat sere,
Hang limply from a hat-peg.

Thy Muse, deserted, calleth thee,
Unkindest of seceders;
But deaf to her, thou writest still,
The heaviest of "leaders."
The Empire biddeth thee arise
And set thy harp ting-tangling;
But in effect thou say'st, "Go to!
I'm far too busy angling!"

The Court bespeaks thy fluent lays;
Thou grantest ne'er a token;
The Czar arrives, the Czar departs,
Thy silence is not broken.
For sounding great St. Jingo's praise
Chance after chance arises—
But thou to East Kent Volunteers
Distributest their prizes.

Yet think not, Alfred, that the world
To me seems sad and hollow
Because thou yieldest up to Mars
The gifts vowed to Apollo.
No, no; since thou in "Jameson's Ride"
Attained to such sublimity,
I view your silence as a bard
With perfect equanimity.

'Tis better thou wert dumb by far
Than that, whilst England wonders,
Thou should'st effusively repeat
Thy recent rhythmic blunders.
'Tis better thou should'st fail to earn
Thy not too lavish salary,
Than that thou should'st defile thy harp
By "playing to the gallery."

The office of Librarian at the House of Lords will become vacant in a few weeks by the retirement of Mr. Pulman, who has held this post for thirty-five years. The salary is £810 a year, with an excellent official residence. The post is in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, and it may be hoped that it will not be jobbed away, as Mr. Parker, the Assistant Librarian, has an incontestable claim to it.

The Salisbury Liberals will do well to be on the alert, as it is probable that Mr. Hulse will resign his seat before long. Mr. Alhausen has just taken a house in The Close at Salisbury, and it is understood that he is to be the Tory candidate whenever the seat is vacated.

In a clever and amusing speech at Edinburgh last week, Lord Rosebery deplored that there were not more M.P.'s who followed in the steps of "Single-speech Hamilton." But Hamilton gained the sobriquet of "single speech" because he only made one good speech. He made others in the House of Commons, and then having become Irish Secretary, with a seat in the Irish House of Commons, his speeches were legion. Hamilton himself wrote a book upon Parliamentary eloquence, in which he embodies a number of recommendations to those who would gain the ear of the House. I remember reading the book years ago. His suggestions are in the main tricky.

Sir Robert Reid has made two suggestions: (1) that the differences of opinion which Lord Rosebery asserted existed between him and Sir William Harcourt, and which led him to throw up the Leadership of the Liberal Party, should be explained; (2) that in future the Leader of the Party should not be selected by a little clique, but by the entire Party. As regards the first, let us have by all means the letter which Lord Rosebery wrote to Sir William, stating that he would have no further political connection with him, together with Sir William's reply. The latter has been attacked for not acting with Lord Rosebery. It is only fair, therefore, to him that these letters should be published, and that Lord Rosebery should supplement them by explaining what were the divergencies of opinion that led him to pursue this course.

At things now stand, it is difficult for the Party to form any conclusion as to relative blame. It can only do this when in possession of facts. As regards the second point, I—and I believe that most Radicals are of the same way of thinking—will acknowledge no one as Leader who is not in the House of Commons, because it is the corner-stone of the Radical faith, that the Radical Leader should be in the People's House. I recognise Sir William Harcourt as my Leader, because he is the Leader of the Liberal Party in that House. If no Liberal proposes that he should cease to lead there, this is reasonable proof that all Liberals are for his retaining that position—a position which, as I have said, involves, or, rather ought to involve, the Leadership of the Party and the call to the Premiership should a Liberal Cabinet be formed.

The Daily News suggests that the selection of its Leader by a Party is a "big question, involving many considerations;" and falls back upon the doctrine, that the Queen sends for a leading man in the Party that obtains a majority, and desires him to form a Cabinet. If he is not the right man in the right place, and if he cannot get what the Daily News calls "Cabinetable" persons to serve under him, the Queen entrusts the formation of a Government to some one else. This is all very well, but it throws the right of selection upon these same "Cabinetable" persons, and, as all takes place in a hole-and-corner fashion, the door is thus left open to personal intrigues and rivalries.

When a political Leader has been long at the head of a Party, and he is a man of commanding personality, people trouble themselves very little about his colleagues. Most of them are merely his clerks, and, provided that they have the average amount of common sense, no one cares who they are. This was very much the case at the time when Mr. Gladstone withdrew from public affairs; more, indeed, the case than is usual, owing to the previous withdrawal of the Liberal Unionists. In his Cabinet there were, at most, three to whose views the Party or the country paid any attention. These official Brahmins took upon themselves to ostracise their best known colleague, and to exalt to the Premiership a Peer, differing in many of his opinions from the Party that he was invited to lead. Obviously, this was an abuse, and the subsequent General Election proved that it was not only a crime but a blunder. The Executive has increased, and is increasing, in power; so is the autocratic power of the Premier in the Executive. Every day, therefore, it becomes more necessary for those who do not believe in governing classes to take the selection of the Premier out of the hands of a few official Brahmins. Human nature is much the same with these exalted beings as with other folk. Their tendency must always be to select as Leader a man who leaves them a free hand in their Departments; who is not likely to replace them; and who is rather a Whig than a Radical. The man, said a Greek sage, who loses his liberty loses half his virtue. And it may be said that, as a rule, a man who has been in the bonds of officialdom loses a large percentage of his Radical fibre. So it always has been, and so it always will be.

Lord Grey's letter respecting the proposed action of the Chartered Company in regard to its future attitude towards natives is sound in theory. But in practice I doubt whether the Aborigines' Protection Society will be satisfied with it. The aim seems to be to force the natives to work in mines, and this is to be attained by imposing on them a hut tax, which is to form the basis of a revenue, not only to meet expenditure, but to pay interest on the huge, and mainly bogus, capital of the Company. They are to be protected in each district by Native Commissioners, but the Commissioners are to be appointed by the Company. Now, I do not see why the natives should pay any hut tax, certainly not one that is in excess of the amount expended on and for them in each district. The Commissioners ought to be appointed by the Imperial authorities, if they are to serve as a protection to the natives. The world's history has been one long record of white men striving to make black men work for them.

But the letter is mainly interesting as an indictment of the policy pursued by the Company towards the natives, and goes far to justify their uprising. The Times, in commenting on it, doubts whether Lord Grey's action is wise in remedying the former state of things by going back to native rule, because it may encourage the natives, should they deem themselves again maltreated by the Company, once more to rebel. I sincerely trust that, should they be again maltreated, they will again rebel. In this way alone do men secure themselves against oppression and injustice on the part of their rulers.

Lord Grey says that the revenue is coming in well, but this revenue seems to be mainly derived from the sale of stands, i.e., town lots. Taken with the fact of there being only 1,800 Europeans in the country, and many, as Lord Grey says, having already left it, whilst others contemplate doing so, this seems on the face of it remarkable. We have had many tricks played by the financing gang at the bottom of all the transactions of this wondrous Company, and as they will have to provide revenue unless they throw up the sponge, it would not surprise me if they were not the purchasers of these stands, with a view to counteract the impression that the game is up. Whoever yet heard of town lots going up in a place the population of which cannot be more than 1,000, and which is daily diminishing, whilst the supplies of cash that have been poured into it are cut off, and famine and ruin are threatening?

As I said last week, if Dr. Jameson's life is endangered by his imprisonment, he ought to be let out. But it is obvious that unless doctors are prepared to certify to this, he must remain in prison. I certainly have no personal feeling against the Doctor; indeed, so far as I understand the matter, he simply obeyed orders, and has been made a scapegoat for others, who are far more guilty than he is, and who are still at liberty. To say, as Mr. Dicey does in the Observer that the Doctor is eating his heart out because he wants to get back to Rhodesia, may be correct, but this would hardly serve as a ground for letting him out of prison. His evidence will be valuable before the Committee of Inquiry, and if he be set free on doctors' certificates, he ought to pledge himself not to leave England until that evidence has been forthcoming.

All sorts of rumours are current as to the course contemplated by Mr. Rhodes and others connected with the Transvaal raid. The latest is that certain persons sent to the Cape cablegrams conveying to Mr. Rhodes that Mr. Chamberlain approved of the contemplated movement. But this is nothing new to those who have been interested in getting to the bottom of what transpired. It has long been known what these telegrams were, and by whom they were sent; indeed, it would not entirely surprise me, were the cablegrams themselves produced before the Committee of Inquiry. That they were sent there is no doubt. But that really Mr. Chamberlain either knew of the contemplated raid, or approved of it, is a very different thing. Many were interested both here and in South Africa in producing this impression, in order to meet objections to the raid being undertaken without the knowledge of the Imperial authorities, and it is quite conceivable that these cablegrams were forwarded in order to meet those objections without Mr. Chamberlain having uttered one word of approval, or, indeed, knowing that a raid was contemplated.

I should have thought that I had always expressed my views so openly in respect to the Chartered Company that I should be free of any charge of hinting them. These views have been derived from the perusal of the official documents which have been published. I am open to evidence in correction of these views if it be forthcoming, and if it be trustworthy, for my object is to elicit the truth. It is absurd to suppose that the friends of Mr. Rhodes may use a complaisant Press to propagate the grossest misconceptions, in order to deceive public opinion, and that I, as a journalist, have not a right to rectify these misconceptions. Just now I am attacked, because I stated in TRUTH that certain cablegrams had been sent from London to South Africa, implying that Mr. Chamberlain was not only cognisant of the raid before it took place, but that he encouraged it, and that in doing so I "want to put a spoke in the wheel of Mr. Chamberlain."

As I have said already, I do not believe that Mr Chamberlain had anything to do with the raid, or knew that it was to occur. I several times expressed my admiration in the House of Commons of Mr. Chamberlain's action, and so far from believing that these telegrams represented anything that he ever said, I am convinced that they did not. But this does not alter the fact that the telegrams were sent, nor does it alter the fact that Sir John Willoughby did write to the War Office, asserting that he took part in the raid because he had reason to believe that the Imperial authorities approved of it. As to what took place in the interview between Mr Rhodes and Mr. Chamberlain I know absolutely nothing. My reason for believing that Mr. Rhodes threatened to round on Mr. Chamberlain if he did not take care is, that this is vouched for by a Conservative member to whom the observation was made, and who is a man of the highest honour.

The attempt of all these baffled conspirators to compromise Mr. Chamberlain is one of the worst features in their conduct. When Mr. Chamberlain went over to the Unionists, I used language in regard to his action not precisely complimentary; I did so mainly because he would insist that he still belonged to the Liberal Party. When he squarely joined Lord Salisbury, and accepted office under him, I uttered no word of protest, because any one has a right to alter his political opinions, and, as a necessary consequence, his Party. As a colleague of Lord Salisbury, I recognised that his action in regard to the Transvaal raid, under exceptionally difficult circumstances, was able and honest, although in taking the course that he did he had what is called "society" against him. I said so then, and I say so now.

SCRUTATOR.

LIBERALISM AND LIQUOR.

THE licensing of public-houses is in the hands of magistrates, who are appointed either by the Lord Chancellor or by the Lords-Lieutenant of counties. Neither in towns nor in rural districts have the inhabitants more right to do anything connected with the liquor traffic, than if they lived on the planet Mars—a planet where, according to recent discovery, all are so much occupied with the difficulties of obtaining water, that they have no time for much else. On the liquor question there are two phases of thought amongst Radicals: some regard it as a duty of every one to do his utmost to hinder the sale of spirituous liquor in his locality; others do not hold with this, but agree that all in connection with its sale should be under the control of the inhabitants of the locality. As an advocate both of temperance and of local self-government, I hold that the latter is the better line to follow. We may approve or disapprove of the Local Veto Bill of last Parliament, but after the result of the last General Election, we can hardly deny that it does not command the support of the majority. Practically, that Bill gave every rural parish and every ward in a town the right to prohibit by plébiscite the sale of liquor within its area. But there are very few parishes or wards in which such a prohibition would obtain the needed two-thirds majority of ratepayers—therefore the Bill, although legalising a principle, would have been almost everywhere a dead letter; whereas a Bill vesting the full control of the liquor traffic in the hands of ratepayers would be far more effectual in the interests of temperance. The strongest argument, however, for the latter course is that the first cannot be carried, and the second might be.

To say that drinking is not productive of great evil is to deny a self-evident fact. My own impression is that spirits, unless taken in very small quantities, have an injurious effect upon the system of those who imbibe them. The coats of the stomach soon acquire a craving for strong drink, and no sooner has the effect of one glass evaporated than an internal gnawing is felt that calls for another. The habit may not be harmful for a considerable time, but in the end it is. The case of beer, however, is different. Beer in moderation does no one harm. An excess of it, however, produces drunkenness. Spirits and beer, therefore, taken in excess, result in drunkenness; but spirits taken habitually weaken the system, which beer does not. A man would be wise, consequently, to eschew spirits entirely, and, if he cannot limit himself to a moderate amount of beer, to abstain altogether from it. I am inclined to think that temperance would gain, were its advocates to preach the doctrine of no spirits, and moderation, rather than total abstention from all alcoholic drink I have passed years in Germany, France, and Italy in the course of my life. When first I knew these countries, beer was drunk largely in Germany, and wine in France and Italy, but very little spirits in any of them. Now, however, in parts of Germany and in France there is a very large consumption of spirits, and this has become in towns so universal a habit that both the German and the French races are deteriorating. In northern Germany spirit-drinking is far more general than in southern Germany. In Bavaria it is rare, but the quantity of beer consumed there is enormous. I never saw that it did any harm, for a more manly, vigorous race than the Bavarians does not exist, and very rarely is a drunken man to be seen. The Bavarian pot contains about two-thirds of an English pot. The brewers' men are stalwart giants. Each of these men has a right to seven pots per diem. But as a rule this does not suffice, and most of them buy about three more. They are never drunk, and they are as healthy and long-lived as others. I forget what the average consumption of beer of each individual is, but it is far higher than with us. One reason, perhaps, why they can drink with impunity so much is that the beer is brewed in a different way from that in use in England; with the result that, although its alcoholic strength is about equal to ours, the effects of the alcohol are reduced; the only ill-effect, indeed, being that it makes those drinking it very fat. Men, women, and children really seem to live on beer in Munich, without getting drunk, and without harm. What people elsewhere spend on food, they spend on beer, which they insist is liquid food of the most nourishing character.

But in considering the question, we must not lose sight of the fact that many amongst us who do not injure their constitutions by drinking, and who do not get drunk, spend an amount on liquor out of all proportion to their means. Some of them frequent the public-house as a place of resort where they meet and gossip; others seem to have a perpetual thirst upon them, and their happiness apparently consists in letting beer pass down their throats into their stomachs. Now, to spend on what may be deemed a luxury—whether it be beer or plum cake—more than a man can afford, without trenching on the needful expenditure of his family, is to be strongly deprecated.

The only way in which I think that it would be possible to deal practically with the liquor question would be to give to each locality full power to work out its own salvation. The areas of separate control were too small in the Bill of the last Parliament. Supposing the sale of all spirituous liquors were prohibited in one ward of a town and permitted in the next ward, evidently the drinkers in the first ward would all betake themselves to the second ward. Moreover, the tendency would be for the wards mainly inhabited by rich people to drive all public-houses into the neighbouring ward, if inhabited by poor people. In London there are few public-houses in fashionable quarters, but their number is legion in the poorer quarters.

As to the vexed question of compensation, any one may, if he pleases, regard the liquor traffic as unholy; but as it is, and it has been, not only permitted by the State, but is, and has been, the source of a huge revenue to it, the community, quoad State, can hardly regard those concerned in the trade in any different light from those engaged in any other recognised business. It is with publicans as it is with others. Some are thoroughly respectable, others are not; as a class they are neither better nor worse than any other class. They are the retailers of liquor which is brought into existence by large manufacturers. These latter have in England, as regards the sale of beer, acquired a monopoly, greatly to their benefit. Although the materials from which it is made have gone down largely in price, there has been no corresponding reduction in the price of beer. It is only necessary to look at the vast amount that is paid for goodwill whenever a private brewery is converted into a public company, together with the market quotations of the shares of such companies, to realise how remunerative brewing is. No one would ever dream of giving brewers compensation for loss of trade owing to legislation. If they have bought public-houses at a fancy price, they have done so with their eyes open to the fact that the licence is legally only a yearly one. But the case of what may be termed the working publican is different. If suddenly deprived of his means of livelihood, he ought not in common fairness to be turned adrift into the world, but he should have reasonable compensation, this compensation coming out of the pockets of the brewers by some additional tax being imposed on beer.

Then there is the question of whether everything connected with the sale of liquor should be placed in the hands of existing local elected authorities, or in the hands of some specially-elected Board. Temperance men are generally in favour of the latter, but I have always doubted whether the temperance cause would not be more benefited by adopting the former course. Temperance men act together, and the vast number of candidates for election to County Councils, Municipal Councils, or Parish Councils, who trim their sails in order to win these elections, could not afford to ignore a strong united and zealous body of voters.

In order to put an end to all monopoly, no licence should be granted or renewed without the actual holder of the licence having secured the right—any private undertaking notwithstanding—to obtain his beer from whomsoever he likes, nor should any clause in regard to the letting of the house be permitted by which the holder of the licence is obliged, when called upon by the lessor, to transfer the licence to the lessor's nominee. This would practically put an end to the tied house system, and, by making the publican independent of the brewer, prove a boon to him. There are parts of England where 90 per cent. of the public-houses are tied houses. Generally the district is shared by two or three brewers, whose aim it is to keep out interlopers. With this object in view, whenever a house is in the market they buy it up at an excessive cost, if an interloper is endeavouring to get it. I wonder what would be said if this system prevailed in respect to bakers, with the result of almost doubling the fair price of bread to consumers? As the law now stands, the licence is personal, but the brewers have rendered it impersonal, and the house, not the man, has the licence. Publicans really have become as much the slaves of the brewers as ever Irish tenants were of their landlords. The brewers' object is to have as many outlets for the sale of their beer as possible; therefore, they seek to increase the number of houses; but if the licence were really, and not nominally, in the hands of the man who works it, the tendency of all publicans would be against the grant of new licences.

To resume, if I had my way, my aim would be, not to prejudice the main issue, which is to place control of the liquor traffic of a locality under its ratepayers. With this object I should accept existing authorities, and I would give them absolute control. They might do what they pleased, have many public-houses, or few, or none. The areas of control I should make far larger than was proposed in the Bill of last Session. The publican should be made absolutely independent of any particular brewery. Whenever a properly-conducted public-house is suppressed, I should give compensation to the working publican, deriving that compensation from an additional tax on the liquor traffic. The best plan to effect this would be to declare that the existing licence shall, except in cases of misconduct, be continued for some given term of years, after which there would be no compensation, but that, if in any locality a public-house is suppressed within that term, compensation should be granted for the period yet to run. If all temperance men were to unite on such a programme as this, I think that it might be carried. Some temperance men are so enamoured of the scheme of reform which they put forward, that the means overshadow the end; also as the particular scheme which they advocate is not likely to secure a majority, year succeeds year without any legislative attempt being made to put an end to a state of things which is itself inherently bad, and which strikes at the root of the principle of local popular control in all matters affecting alone the locality. For my part, I am never particular about means; the end is everything with me, and to attain it I take the line of least resistance. If I find myself confronted in pushing forward along one path with a stone wall, I do not knock my head against it, but take some other path by which the wall is turned.

I am no advocate of beer from any love of it, as I never drink it. But I look to the fact that, since the world has been peopled, the use of alcohol has been the habit everywhere. Beer, or light wine, is probably the least harmful form in which to absorb it. If we are to wait until all are converted to abstention from all alcoholic liquor, we shall have to wait for centuries before dealing with an evil. I do not want to wait, and a bird in the hand is worth more than fifty birds in a bush that is not yet planted.

A LIFEBOAT MUDDLE.

The entrance to the Port of Liverpool is, I suppose, one of the most crowded marine thoroughfares in the world. That being so, peculiar interest attaches to the inquiry that has just been concluded at Liverpool into the arrangements of the National Lifeboat Institution for the protection of life around the entrance to the port. The immediate subject of the inquiry was the loss of the Irish schooner Carmel and her crew of five in Liverpool Bay, on the night of October 10. As remarked by the representative of the Board of Trade, the occurrence certainly called for investigation. The Carmel got into trouble, and began showing signals of distress at 7.45 p.m. She continued to do so until 9.30, by which time, apparently, she was getting past help. Three lifeboats were, more or less, within reach of her, those at New Brighton, Hoylake, and Formby. The two first put off, but neither succeeded in getting to the wreck, which was not discovered till the next morning Of the three boats, that from New Brighton—a steam-boat—apparently did all that was possible. But this boat seems to have been the furthest from the wreck, and of deep draught, and after cruising about for five hours it returned without having found the distressed vessel The Hoylake boat also went out, but it encountered a series of difficulties in launching at low tide, finally getting stuck in the sand, so that it had to wait till the tide flowed and floated it. The Formby boat, which seems to have been in the best position for rendering assistance, never went out at all. The coxswain had information of the wreck at 8 o'clock, and actually saw the schooner for a time. He spent twenty-five minutes communicating with the other lifeboats on the telephone, and then summoned his crew. Some of the crew live a mile and a half off, and it takes a good half-hour to get them together. After they had been got together, and the horses had been harnessed to the boat for three-quarters of an hour, the coxswain decided that it was no good to start. He stated at one point in his evidence that he did this because he heard that the other two boats were going out, and at another point that as the flare-up on the wreck had disappeared he should not have known where to look for the vessel. He admitted that he got "muddled" by his communications with the other boats over the telephone, and this seems the only intelligible explanation of his conduct.

The truth is that the five lives of the crew of the Carmel were simply muddled away. The lightship which signalled the lifeboats, should have been in electric communication with the shore, but the communication had been interrupted since September 17, and the delay in repairing it, though partly attributed to stress of weather, was also in part attributed to "the absence of the marine superintendent on other duties." From the evidence, it would seem that the Hoylake boat got stuck in the sand through the carriage being of an unsuitable type, and the wheels too narrow. In regard to the Formby boat, an allegation has already been referred to in TRUTH, and contradicted by the local representative of the Association, that the delay was in some measure caused by the doors of the boat-house being blocked with sand; but, notwithstanding the contradiction, it is clear that six or seven men were engaged in shovelling away this sand, and that it took them half-an-hour. If this did not delay the boat, it was only because the coxswain was all this time deliberating whether he should or should not go out. His evidence shows that he knew that his boat, being of lighter draught than the New Brighton boat, was more likely to be of use in the position where he had seen the wreck. Nevertheless, when an hour had been consumed in telephoning to and fro, summoning the crew, and clearing away sand (which ought never to have been allowed to accumulate) this intelligent officer decided that it was no good to start.

The Board of Trade officer makes a number of suggestions on these facts, every one of which implies a censure of the management of the lifeboat service—e.g., that the Formby crew should live closer to their boat, that one superintendent should have control over all three of the boats in the bay, and that steam lifeboats, like that at New Brighton, should be placed at the other stations. The last suggestion, amounts, in my judgment, to a censure of the Institution, because steam lifeboats are no new invention, their utility is well known, and the Lifeboat Institution has ample funds to provide them. Let me remind the reader once again that the Institution has in the last two years alone put away and capitalised surplus income to the amount of about £98,000. If it does this while improvements in the present service are urgently needed, it is obviously sacrificing the interests of the present generation in order to form endowments for generations to come —a palpable misuse of funds which are for the most part contributed to meet the requirements of to-day. In the course of the above inquiry, again, a suggestion was made that in bad weather the steam lifeboat should be kept cruising about in the channel all night, to which the Chairman of the Liverpool branch of the Institution replied that "he did not believe the crew would do it." What is this but a condemnation of the volunteer system? If the proposed arrangement would conduce to the saving of life, and can only be carried out by a paid crew, then a crew must be paid, in the same way that a fire brigade is paid. Had it been within the province of the Board of Trade officer on this occasion to go to the root of the whole matter, the suggestion he would have made is that the Lifeboat Institution itself should be disestablished and disendowed. What happened in Liverpool Bay on October 10 was simply a breakdown all round of the voluntary system, and the result is only one proof among many that the Lifeboat Institution has undertaken a task which is beyond its competence and strength.

ALFONSO XII. AND THE SPANISH PRISONER.

The amazing industry and ingenuity with which the Spanish buried-treasure swindle is worked receives a fresh illustration in a correspondence forwarded to me from Ceylon. It is the old story of the prisoner, who has died in gaol, leaving his only daughter and her fortune in the care of a generous-hearted priest; but the story is told with some novel and interesting variations. The first communication is addressed by the said priest to an officer of H.M. Customs at Colombo—a good example of the world-wide extent of the field over which these swindlers work. The priest's letters, as usual, are authenticated by an official-looking stamp purporting to be that of the Eglesia Parroquial of S. Juan, Alicante. As his reverence remarks in one of his letters, "he cannot dominate the English language," and his attempts to do so are so unsuccessful that it is rather difficult at times to make out what he is driving at. The gist of his story, however, is that the deceased prisoner, and father of the orphan, was a gentleman named Gurrea, a very intimate personal friend of his late Majesty Alphonso XII. and of his first Queen, Mercedes. "Dead Queen Mercedes, and newly married the King and Queen Christina, Mr. Gurrea very soon perceived the greatest opposition in palace for consequenteatness of the King weakness." The truth seems to be that Señor Gurrea had been in the secret of some of the Royal indiscretions, and it was evidently owing to this that on his death-bed the King entrusted him with a casket, a letter, and a sum of 1,000,000 francs, to be delivered to "Lady ———," in Paris. The King died before his messenger got to Paris, and in consequence of the enmity against him in the palace, the Spanish Ambassador in that city received orders to arrest him as soon as he made his appearance there. A highly probable story all round. Señor Gurrea got wind of this diabolical plot—or says he did, for I have my doubts about his story—and consequently he departed with the 1,000,000 francs and the casket for Ceylon.

From this point the story proceeds according to the usual rule. No sooner does he get to Ceylon, than Señor Gurrea hears that his wife is very ill at home, and he accordingly buries all his treasures in the neighbourhood of Colombo, comes back to Spain, is arrested at the instance of the Queen Regent, on the charge of having stolen a casket belonging to the late King, and "was lately damned by an infamous guilt," which means, I suppose, that he was convicted and sentenced. Then, as usual, he dies in prison, and leaves his daughter and his secret in charge of the good priest. A plan of the "terrene" where the treasure is buried is, as usual, in a little valise, which has been seized with the rest of the prisoner's effects, and which can only be "retired" at the trifling cost of 20,739 francs. The priest does not want the whole of this sum advanced at once, but he must have "a sum of 7,000 francs, 250 sterling pounds," in order that he may make his arrangements, and come to Ceylon, and get possession of the buried treasure.

The remarkable feature in this story is that, among the batch of official documents which the priest forwards as evidence of his bona fides, is a copy of the probate of the will of the late Señor Gurrea, bound up in a printed wrapper, bearing numerous official - looking stamps, including a receipt stamp for the probate duty, and having in all possible respects the appearance of an official document. It is pretty clear from the text of all the documents that they are got up for use in any English-speaking country, there being not a word, except in the address of the first letter, to indicate whether the buried treasure is located in Ceylon or any other part of the world. Given a victim without sufficient brains to see the inherent absurdity of the whole story, it is very easy to understand how this trick may succeed, and the only chance of defeating the schemes of these Spanish brigands is for newspapers in all parts of the world to keep their readers informed as to the way the thing is done. I am glad to see that the provincial papers in different parts of England are now beginning to do this. The Western Morning News the other day gave a detailed account of a long correspondence which a tradesman at Truro has been carrying on with the Spanish prisoner and his confidential agent, the benevolent prison chaplain. Here again there was another ingenious version of the prisoner's story. He was an engineer who had been associated with M. de Lesseps, and had succeeded in amassing "swag" to the value of £98,000 in the Panama bubble, with which he had managed to escape to England on the eve of "le crash." This is one of the cases in which the treasure was not buried, but deposited in a bank, the vouchers and cheques to bearer requisite to obtain possession of it being concealed in the secret drawer of the prisoner's trunk. The trunk is, as usual, in the hands of the Spanish police, and to release it a matter of £58 was required. In this case, too, ecclesiastical-looking documents are forwarded by the priest who carries on the correspondence, and ultimately also a copy of the probate of the prisoner's will. This particular correspondence was carried on merely for the purpose of "drawing" the swindlers, but the Western Morning News mentions a recent case at Falmouth in which a confiding countryman narrowly escaped being victimised, having got so far as to put his remittance into an envelope, when a friend happened to enlighten him as to the trick. The authorities at Scotland Yard have circulated warnings against this swindle. Is it really out of the question for them, in conjunction with the Spanish authorities, to get at the various gangs who are running it?

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE M. ARAGO.

An eminent Egyptian statesman, who has come to Paris to be braced up by a cold winter, said to me the other day: "Though the tobacco of my country is so famous it is all—save the poor, coarse stuff good only for fellahs — grown in Turkey. Its fragrance and other virtues are due to the blend." The French may be called a Gallo-Latin-European blend. Hence their superiority. They marry readily with foreigners, provided, of course, the latter are well off. Strangers who can pay their way handsomely are made to feel themselves at home in France. The smallness of the French family of every class attracts Gibeonites from more populous countries. The street sweeping of Paris is done by Hessians, and poor people from the valley of the Moselle, between Metz and Treves. The influx of Badeners is also great. At the last Census there was a population here of 120,000 Belgians. There are 70,000 Italians in and around Marseilles, and many thousands of others engaged as navvies all over France. Swiss crowd into banks and wholesale houses. Basques and Aragonese do a great part of the agricultural work between the Garonne and Pyrenees. Victor Hugo was a product of a Germano-Celtic blend. His great-great-grandfather came from Holland and settled at Nancy, where he and his son and son's son married Lorraine women. The poet's father, General Hugo, married a Breton sea-captain's daughter. George Sand was of a Franco-Saxon and perhaps Hebrew blend. Thiers was of a Greco-French blend, and son of one of the oddest, most enterprising, keenest, and most unsuccessful men that Marseilles ever turned adrift on the world. Zola is Italo-French. So was Gambetta. Bonnat, the painter, is of Hispano-French descent. So was M. Arago, who died last week. His name meant "the Aragonese," as "Langlois" meant "the Englishman."

Arago, like most of his family, seemed stored-up sunshine. The astronomer, his father, and the uncle, Etienne, were young in feeling, spirits, and manner when on the downward side of ninety. I met Etienne at a grand ball the night he had reached his ninetieth year. He said, and it was true, that the only thing antiquated about him was his fondness for entre-chats and ailes de pigeon in dancing the quadrille. Emmanuel Arago had a redundant style of oratory and a sonorous Spanish voice. But out of the tribune he was genial and clever, and had a talent for telling short anecdotes, all drawn from his own experience. They were snap-shot affairs, gilded and adorned by his southern imagination, and related with spirit and a lively sense of fun. Yet the first impression on which his memory took hold was a tragedy. His father lived near the Observatory. One morning as the bonne was giving Emmanuel Arago his breakfast on a bench in the garden there, he and she were startled by a volley of musketry. Seated on their bench against the wall, they could hear bullets striking the wall on the other side, and then the discharge of a single shot. The bonne crossed herself and said "It's the coup de grâce." "What's that?" said the child who was not two years old. "They are firing into his ear to kill him out and out." The him thus finished off was Marshal Ney. All the grown-up members of the household ran into the garden. They had blanched and contracted faces. Tears flowed from the astronomer's eyes. He was no friend of Ney; but the military execution on the other side of the garden-wall made his blood run cold.

Emmanuel Arago was, as his father's son, brought up in the heart of the scientific world. Through the uncle, Etienne, he was also in the heart of the theatrical, artistic, literary, and conspiring worlds. That evergreen personage was manager of the old Vaudeville, in the Place de la Bourse, and in the thick of every artistic and revolutionary excitement. He had not merely stored up sunshine but saltpetre, which easily ignited. In the Revolution of July he armed a band of supers and students, headed by Emmanuel, with the weapons of his property-room, and ordered them never to face him again if they did not cover themselves with glory. Of course, they surpassed his fondest wishes, and he was drunk with delight. The uncle, Etienne, was, despite his fizz, most gentlemanly at bottom and shrewd. He managed not to let George Sand draw him into her polyandrous seraglio. She then fell back on the nephew, who perhaps might have been cast aside by her, "an old man though still youthful," if Etienne had not saved him by throwing the attractive Jenny Colon in his way.

I need not follow the political career of Emmanuel Arago beyond saying that it was consistent, one of spotless honour, and that he was, from 1848 to the day of his death, the favourite of the Eastern Pyrenees. He was true to his pledges, and that department remained faithful to him. He sat for it throughout the Second Republic, and was prevented, by ten years of exile, sitting for it through the Second Empire. He was, from the time he benefited by a general amnesty to his death, successively its member in the Corps Législatif, Assembly, and Senate.

Arago's earliest diplomatic experience was won in Berlin. He was sent there as full-fledged Ambassador at the age of thirty-three. It was thought that as his father's son he would have the valuable support of Humboldt. But as the King only thought of pleasing the Emperor Nicholas, he was coldly received, and Humboldt was afraid to show civility. But as any other French Republican would have been on a less pleasant footing, he stayed, and busied himself with studying German literature and the Prussian educational and military systems. But he had not time to gain more than a mere surface-knowledge. Louis Napoleon decided to attack the Roman Republic, and the Ambassador to the Court of Berlin threw up his place, in order to return home to attack the Prince-President. Not restricting his bellicose efforts to the Tribune, he had to fly abroad when defeated. This is why he knew so much of other countries. The father's name was a passport to learned circles in England, the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany, Zurich, and Geneva.

Arago was an old friend of M. Grévy and a patron of Gambetta at the Bar, when the latter was a young Briefless. One of the early diplomatic appointments made at the joint instance of Grévy and Gambetta was that of M. Arago as Ambassador to the Swiss Republic. He succeeded there Challemel-Lacour, who refused to live in a lodging house, and had had the delightful villa known as Hôtel de l'Ambassade de France built at the expense, of course, of the State, in the new quarter beyond the Aar. Arago led there a hospitable patriarchal life. Handsome furniture had been supplied for his predecessor from the Garde Meuble. The diplomatic post was bestowed as a "temporary mission." This enabled the titular Ambassador to keep the senatorial seat and pay, while drawing an Ambassador's salary. As the only Ambassador at Berne, he was the head member of the Corps Diplomatique. The Swiss became attached to the genial, amusing, and yet dignified old gentleman. He had a fatherly way that pleased plain people. There was no more Darby and Joan couple than he and his accomplished wife, whom every one admired and esteemed. Fourteen years were spent at Berne, where the married children and their families met every summer. The daughters had the gift of beauty and of natural gracious manners. One of them was, before M. Arago went to Berne, the wife of M. Benjamin Constant, the eminent painter. Arago would have probably died there but for two reasons. He frequently reported home that the St. Gothard line and the united efforts of Italy and Germany were ousting France in Switzerland. The French ought surely not to help their enemies by remaining inflexible on tariff questions raised by the Swiss. M. Méline, and the syndicates he represents, resented this. But the Ambassador might have survived their hostility, had it not been for the Russian furore three years ago. It was remembered that Arago defended the Pole, Berezowski, who fired at Alexander II. in the Bois, and brought the jury to allow "extenuating circumstances." Floquet's "Vive la Pologne, Monsieur!" had been condoned at St. Petersburg, but some bursts of eloquence about Poland in Arago's speech had not. Casimir-Périer broke him rudely. Arago might have been elected President, instead of Faure, were it not for the Berezowski case. That case, oddly enough, was brought about by a love affair. Berezowski, a mechanical engineer, worked in Baron Cail's forges. He fell in love with a foreman's daughter there, asked the girl in marriage, and was refused. He determined on suicide, but at the same time resolved to sacrifice his life to some great cause. While he was turning over in his mind how to do this, M. Floquet hailed Alexander II. in the Palais de Justice with "Vive la Pologne!" "Yes," cried the Pole on reading about it, "et mort au Tsar!" The resolution was taken to shoot Alexander as he was coming by a thronged road from a review. The ball meant for him hit the neck of an aide-de-camp's horse that plunged forward as the pistol was raised. When the last Presidential election was on, a visit from Alexander III. and Marie Feodorovna was hoped for at the French Foreign Office. The friends of Faure went about saying that they would not come to be received by the man who pleaded extenuating circumstances for Berezowski's attempt. Only eighty members of the Congress voted for Arago.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE English dear Lady Betty, are excellent people: when no one else abuses them, they abuse themselves.

The community is suffering from a severe attack of neurotic journalism. Scarcely a bitter line appears in any Continental journal, however obscure the paper may be, that is not at once despatched to London, reproduced in our newspapers, and comments are made upon it in the "leaders." The special correspondents of the news agencies must be at their wits' end to provide interesting intelligence, otherwise they would not forward, day after day, as they are doing, the unimportant attacks which appear in unimportant papers.

Idleness, however, may be the cause of their conduct, for it is, of course, immeasurably more easy to contribute columns of matter copied from the papers than it is to supply original news.

Be this as it may, the British public is tired of reading the continual insignificant attacks which have appeared in obscure Continental journals. The importance of anything in this world is precisely the importance which we attach to it ourselves. It is a mercy, therefore, that neither the British Government nor the British people care a rush what the second-rate French, Russian, or German papers publish about them.

The following letter has been addressed to me:—

"Sir,—Since Society commenced to take serious interest in City concerns, the conversation in the West-End clubs has been about nothing but stocks, shares, and 'swindles.' Some men gather in groups and discuss the future of African mines; others, with loud voices, dispute about brewery companies, soap companies, railway companies, and a number of other enterprises too numerous to mention here. I know of no West-End club which has not been for several years little better than a Belgravian stock-exchange. This was bad enough, but we appear now to be entering upon even a worse stage of the disorder. The West-End men, having lost prestige, money, their properties, and their sense of honour, are no longer of much use to the financiers of the City; they are therefore becoming agents for the sale of cigars, wine, horses, estates, pictures, works of art, agents for life insurance offices, and, indeed, agents for every conceivable commodity. Hardly have I entered any of my clubs now, but a member pulls a cigar artistically out of his case and, having insisted upon my sniffing at it, commences a long disquisition about the merits of the particular brand, the difficulty of obtaining it, and the special facilities which he possesses for procuring a limited number of the cigars for my consumption. To rid myself of the man I order five hundred, and upon his leaving me, another man swoops down and attempts to unload several dozen of 'exquisite champagne.' I cough. The cough is fatal, for from every part of the room my fellow-members rush at me and urge upon me the importance of insuring my life.

"But this is not the worst of it. It has been reserved for this generation to discover an altogether new way of paying old debts. Two thirds of my acquaintances are in debt to their tradesmen, and as they cannot pay these claims themselves, they work off the amount of their indebtedness by introducing their friends. As I enter the club, one man looks at me critically, then says, "My dear fellow! Where did you get that coat?" I tell him. He smiles sadly, then assures me that only Rippem, of Bond-street, can make coats. Somewhat discomfited at the discovery, I stroll into the next room, when another member comes up and confidentially—as if he were doing me a favour—says, "I say, old man, you really should not wear those boots. Go to Heel's, in Piccadilly. I will tell him that you are coming." It appears that everything that I eat, drink, or smoke, everything that I wear, and, indeed, everything that I buy, is bad; and strangely enough almost every member of the club is prepared to introduce me to different tradesmen, who will make an altogether new man of me.

"A month or two ago I had some thoughts of marrying. A younger man than myself was continually in attendance on the lady upon whom I had bestowed my affections. Upon consideration, it appeared to me that the intimacy might increase after my marriage, so I gradually estranged myself from the lady. You will scarcely believe it, but the youth had the impudence to call at my private address to offer to assist me in pressing my attentions—for a commission! They tell me that the women themselves now demand a commission before they consider a proposal! "Carlton."

"P.S.—I have this instant received the following letter, written to me by the mother of the lady who is referred to above:—

"'Dear Lord ——,—Pray consider this as being strictly private and confidential. I have reason to believe that the beauty of my daughter, together with the admirable qualities which she possesses, have made a serious impression upon your heart. If you are inclined to proceed further in the matter, I am prepared to assist you; but business is business. My terms are five hundred guineas upon completion of the transaction!'"

An astonishing report is current, to wit, that a celebrated advocate of women's rights has applied to Lord Salisbury for two nominations for women for the Foreign Office. As candidates for Foreign Office appointments must be under twenty-four, it is needless to paint too vividly the consequences which might result from the introduction of beautiful young women into that notoriously susceptible Department. Other notes than "Collective notes" and "Marginal notes" would be sure to occupy the attention of the oppressively-worked Foreign Office men Instead of the rustle of paper would be heard the rustle of petticoats, and curious protocols and unwise treaties might be completed in the corridors. "Reports," too, might reach the Queen which her Majesty would seriously object to.

This is another letter that has been addressed to me:—

"Surely some protest will be made against the latest foolish proposal which is engaging the attention of the authorities at the War Office. It is proposed to replace the bonnet of the Highlanders, the busbies of the Fusilier and Hussar regiments, and the cap of the Lancers by a hideous helmet modelled upon that worn by the New York police. It is to be hoped that such a ridiculous piece of vandalism will be strenuously resisted, and that the proposed 'universal head-dress' will be consigned to that oblivion which it amply merits. There is, however, one head-dress which might be appropriately worn by those who are in command at the War Office. It is inexpensive, simple, and suitable, and is constructed of paper.

"General."

The Exhibition of Twenty Masterpieces at the gallery belonging to the Messrs. Agnew, in Old Bond-street, is one of the most magnificent collections of the kind that have been gathered together for years. "The Sisters," by Hoppner, which contains the portraits of Marianne and Amelia, daughters of Sir Thomas Frankland, is to be engraved by Mr. Scott Bridgwater, who engraved the admirable "Miranda," after Romney. There is a contemporary engraving of "The Sisters," by William Ward, of which very few copies were printed, and a proof is now worth £300 in the market.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

It may be hoped that there will be a large and representative attendance of members of the Jockey Club at the special meeting which is to be held next Monday at Lord Derby's house in St. James's-square, for the purpose of discussing the new rule respecting the employment of handicappers, which will be proposed by the Stewards. It is eminently desirable that the rule should be passed as it stands, for the adoption of Mr. Lowther's curds-and-whey amendment would simply lead to jobbery and favouritism, and would entirely destroy any beneficial results which might be expected from the reforms which have been officially recommended. Every one knows that "hard-and-fast rules" are the only ones which are of any practical use, as they cannot be evaded, or ignored, or suspended, as caprice or interest may suggest.

If the Prince of Wales wishes to make some money without trouble or material risk, let him buy any sound and tolerably bred foals that come up at Newmarket next week, and then have a yearling sale at Sandringham next summer. If H.R.H. did not obtain a thumping average for his stock, the courses of sun and moon would have changed. I have been induced to make this suggestion by the recent announcement that one of the new "millionaires" (who are now as plentiful at Newmarket as apples in Covent Garden) has paid the Prince of Wales 5,000 guineas for a yearling colt by Donovan out of Pierrette. I suppose the purchaser regards the transaction as a sort of advertisement, or as bread cast upon the waters, to be found in some form or other before many days have passed, but if the animal in question had been bred by a plebeian Mr. Smith, and had been sent up for sale at Newmarket or Doncaster, it would have been considered as well sold if it had fetched one-twentieth of the ridiculous price which is said to have been paid for it.

The Prince of Wales has decided to send Thais to the stud, and she has left Newmarket for Sandringham.

There were large fields at both Warwick and Manchester, but at this period of the year nobody cares a groat about past running, so I shall not waste space in discussing any of the events at those meetings. Two horses which have been beaten during the last fortnight are already tips for the Lincolnshire Handicap.

There is something very provoking in the pertinacity with which the Jockey Club persist in going on with the Newmarket Stakes, a race which has never been a success from any point of view whatever, and it has always involved a large demand upon the fund. It must surely be obvious that under no conceivable circumstances could there be room for another big three-year-old race in the month which elapses between the Two Thousand and the Derby. The mischievous result of the existing plethora of valuable stakes open to three-year-olds was manifested this season by the breakdown of St. Frusquin, who was most foolishly over-raced during both the spring and the summer. The Newmarket Stakes for 1898, which closes this week, is a race for now foals, with £2,000 added, and it may be assumed with confidence that it will cost the fund at least £800, and probably a great deal more. There would have been more common sense and more evidence of a desire to improve the breed of horses if the Newmarket Stakes had been converted into a subscription race of at least £5,000 for now foals and yearlings, to run at four and five-years-old, the A.F. being the course.

The Newmarket Winter Sales will be the only sporting event of any general interest during the present month, although there will be cross-country racing nearly every day if the weather is favourable. The sales begin next Tuesday, and extend over four days. Of course there is a dreadful lot of sheer rubbish in the catalogue, but people who are blessed with discerning eyes may reasonably expect to pick up some bargains. Indian Queen, by Melton, who cantered away with the Cambridgeshire in 1894, is to be sold on Tuesday, and so is Marco, who carried off the same handicap last year. Glisten, by Sheen out of Lightfoot, by Muncaster, ought to make a valuable brood mare, and so also should Mr. Basset's Wise Virgin, by Wisdom out of Elizabeth, who won last year's Stewards Cup. Mr. W. Johnstone sends up five animals, including Falkland, who was expected in the spring to turn out a really first-class two-year-old. Another failure is the filly by Tristan out of Re-echo, for which Lord Ilchester gave 500 gs. last year. There are an immense number of miscellaneous lots each day, including stallions, brood-mares, and yearlings, but nothing worthy of special notice. On Wednesday Mr. Platt sends up seventeen mares from the Bruntwood Stud, of which ten have been served by Kendal, and one by Orme. There are also seven foals, four of which are by Kendal. Ambleside, by Petrarch out of Stray Shot (dam of Shotover), ought to be valuable as a brood-mare, but the Duke of Westminster weeded her out of his stud for some reason or other. I will refer next week to the Thursday and Friday lists.

The Doncaster authorities ought to think themselves remarkably fortunate in obtaining 222 entries for the St. Leger of 1898, considering that not a sixpence of money is added to the race, which is a sweepstakes of £25 each, p.p., and it is simply existing on its old prestige. Doncaster is now a very rich meeting, and the managers can well afford to display a decent liberality in their arrangements, instead of the beggarly meanness which the programme now discloses. Let £2,000 be added, with an entrance of £5, to be the only forfeit, if declared by the last Tuesday in the March after the race has closed, and the managers can stipulate for 300 entries. For every horse left in after that date have a sweepstakes of £30 each. If 200 horses were left in (and the number certainly would not be less), the race would be worth £8,000.

The amateurs' position in Association football is being made as unpleasant as possible. The authorities are very angry because Mr. Jackson did not get permission to play the Cambridge University team. If, as a fact, cases have occurred in which private persons have made money out of amateur teams, then one can quite see that some supervision is required. But the rules should not be of such a character as to make the grant of a permit an impossibility. To interfere with University football is to cast a slur on amateur sport. Some few years ago the Amateur Athletic Association was very energetic in legislating. New rules as to handicappers and handicaps were being passed. A University representative fortunately insisted that the University clubs should be exempt. The A.A.A. might do as it pleased elsewhere, but the Universities were quite able to do their own handicapping in their own way, and to carry on amateur sport in a proper manner. The exemption was at once granted. But in football everything is made to yield to the whims of professionalism by those who can see no good thing in any player who is not a hireling. Scratch teams and unaffiliated clubs are not only threatened with extinction, but the London Football Association is to be made to recognise professionalism. The poor amateur worm will turn at last, and the sooner the better. The amateur has only his supreme indifference to his own interests to thank for his present unsatisfactory position. A meeting of all the leading amateur clubs should be called at an early date to consider the position of amateurs and to take such steps as may be deemed desirable to secure the proper recognition of their position.

I have been favoured this week with copies of the Granta and the Cambridge Review. The former paper has raised a storm in a tea-cup because it ventured on the opinion that Barber, of Third Trinity, should not be ignored in the list of oarsmen entitled to a trial for a seat in the trial eights. As my rowing correspondent ventured to express the same opinion, he is favoured with the usual abusive letter about his ignorant impertinence in interfering in Cambridge rowing matters. He can only humbly say that his opinion is founded on that held by Mr. Lehmann, who is generally supposed to have some slight knowledge of rowing. The strain of the writer in the Review about those in authority knowing everything is all very well in its way, but it must be borne in mind that the long list of Putney disasters has been due in a great measure to bungling mismanagement. What wonder, then, that when there seems to be an opportunity of success a University journal should venture on a little criticism? The C.U.B.C. authorities may boast that they are indifferent to newspaper criticism. I cannot but consider that it is to some extent a grievous blot on undergraduate journalism that these papers have not had in the past either the courage or the ability — I cannot say which has been wanting—to point out the blunders that have been made in Cambridge rowing. Instead, they have without rhyme or reason cringed to the powers that be. It is not many years ago since the Granta in a most vituperative manner attacked my rowing correspondent, whose opinions were so far justified that of a certain crew it may be written, "They never rowed again." A little independent criticism is, therefore, to be commended. To suggest that in wishing Barber to be tried club rivalries are being roused is bunkum. For it was said he had a better record than a member of the same club who is rowing. No one wishes to hamper a President. His duties are difficult enough in all conscience, and a sensible President should not resent, but welcome, honest criticism in University papers. It is far better to have to deal with open complaint than with secret growlings and the intrigues of cabals. I have not the slightest doubt that Mr. Bell is quite equal to his duties, and he has a good counsellor in his friend Mr. Fernie. But it is not difficult to see the rock on which the ship may wreck unless a little self-abnegation is used. There is the nucleus of a good eight, and no doubt at least one prominent old blue will be able to give advice as to the best material to be picked from the trial eights, which, at the present time, are not very promising, and do not compare favourably with those at Oxford; but then they are not leavened with any good University oars.

Blackheath had not its full strength against Richmond, and therefore resorted to its usual policy of importation. This time it went to the Southwark and secured the services of a youthful three-quarter called Walmsley, who had played a good game for Kent against Middlesex. But this availed them nothing, for the Heathens never had a look in from start to finish, and Richmond gave them a lesson in first-class football. Schwarz played admirably at half, and the three-quarter line was very strong, while the forwards were irresistible. By this time Blackheath has probably realised that there is a screw loose somewhere. Probably the weak spot is that the second team is not a stepping-stone to higher things. At all events, the recruits, if any, do not seem able to do much against good company, and naturally good men will not join when they know there is no chance of promotion. On their previous form, the absence of Fegan, Maud, and Finlinson was not so great a loss as it appears. Their names and paper form are great, but on the field there is a great falling off this year. The Old Merchant Taylors are playing much better behind the scrum, and the consequence was they easily beat the Old Leysians who drew with the Scottish, who drew with Cambridge, who beat Blackheath, who beat the Old Merchant Taylors. This is a fair sample of the extraordinary form shown by Rugby clubs in the South this year. The Scottish were certainly lucky to draw with the Light Blues, who had not their full strength outside, and Mendelsohn, the long jumper, is not nearly up to the same form as Thomas at back, and, besides, he went lame. The Harlequins, for whom Wells was playing, had to put up with defeat at the hands of Monkstown, a leading Irish club, which had come off very badly against Oxford. Smith, the full-back, has not yet recovered from his smash up when playing against Cardiff His presence against Cambridge will make all the difference to Oxford, as his pace and kicking will be invaluable against the strong Light Blue attack. Mitchell played finely for Coopers Hill, who had a simple romp over Rosslyn Park, while Sandhurst beat Woolwich, neither teams being very strong this term. Bradbury scored twice for the winners. Newport, with the help of A. J. Gould, who, after retiring, is again playing regularly, simply walked over Cardiff.

Both Universities were playing Association football in town last Saturday. Alexander and Burnup forswore the company of the Corinthians, and it was chiefly due to their efforts that Cambridge scored so heavily against the Old Westminsters. The Casuals had a very fair team against the Oxford men, who should have done better than they did. Their shooting was very weak, Vassall being greatly at fault. Although these four leading amateur clubs were engaged, the Corinthians were able to draw with Sheffield United. The amateurs' defence was very good, while Smith put in one or two stinging shots, which Foulkes stopped admirably. In League matches Aston Villa have gone to the top of the tree. They had an easy win over Blackburn Rovers, whose team has been rather severely dealt with by its directors lately. Notts Forest did well to beat their visitors, Liverpool, although the latter were very unlucky to lose Holme through a wrenched knee.

Cycling Suits are a speciality at Ulster House, Conduit-street, London, W., where Ulsters, Overcoats, and Capes are kept ready for immediate use.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—While the tendency of gilt-edged investment stocks and of Home Rails was distinctly firmer during the past week, owing chiefly to the decline of rates in the Money Market, there has been very little activity in the other departments. People are commencing to talk already of the probability of business being hung up until after Christmas, and certainly the public are not to any extent on the war-path.

Stock Exchange Prospects.

I do not, however, think that there is much in this hackneyed cry, especially as there is every indication of continued improvement in trade in this country. The greater ease in the Money Market, moreover, will doubtless bring about some revival. Just at present Home securities are receiving the lion's share of the attention of investors, and Home Rails would already have scored a further advance were it not for apprehensions of labour troubles. The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants are pressing for better terms to goods guards, brakesmen, and signalmen; but it is hardly likely that this will lead to serious difficulties. Neither the employers nor the railway servants are likely to precipitate a strike in this, the busiest season of the year, and so close to Christmas. Home Industrial stocks continue to enjoy public favour, as illustrated by the success of the issues of new Bovril, Limited, and Paquin, Limited, both of which have been largely over-subscribed. The very marked improvement which had been in progress in the Kaffir Circus has not been fully maintained, a reaction having been brought about chiefly by a resumption of realising sales. It is, however, not probable that the recent low prices will again be touched, and the statement made by President Kruger in Pretoria furnishes proof of a strong disposition to help the mining industry, and to keep political matters straight. In West Australian Mines a steady business has been in progress, although quotations have also eased off in this section. This week the Lake View settlement takes place, and when this is completed it is probable that a revival will set in, the news from the goldfields being in every respect satisfactory. Inter-bourse securities have moved fitfully, and in South Americans the only substantial recovery has occurred in Argentine Government stocks, on rumours that Dr. Romero and ex-President Pellegrini have effected a compromise with reference to their respective proposals for dealing with the Debt. The weakest spot has been the Yankee market, in which a further material decline has been established, chiefly through the absence of all "Bull" support in Wall-street. The fact is there is a general disposition to await the opening of Congress, which takes place on Friday; but if, as may be expected, President Cleveland's message should prove encouraging, and pacific as regards Cuba, a sharp rally may be looked for.

Home Rails.

A further improvement took place in Home Rails in the early part of the week, Brighton "A" leading the rise. The more ample supply of money and lower rates, combined with excellent traffics, are inducing further investment purchases, and the increase in the returns is so steady that it is not surprising that public favour should be directed to this department. The only drawback is the fear that some labour trouble might arise, and the movement now started by the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants in favour of certain guards and signalmen has sufficed to arrest the upward movement, and to cause a slight relapse in some instances. Some concession will probably have to be made by the Railway Companies, but I do not anticipate any serious trouble. Traffic returns for the past week again show an increase of £80,830, which brings up the total increase for the present half-year to £977,400, a very favourable showing, which, as I foreshadowed some time ago, promises a considerable increase in dividends. With reference to the forthcoming dividends I may state roughly that a dividend of 7½ per cent. is looked for in Brighton "A," and one of 3½ per cent. in Dover "A," and in the case of these Deferred stocks the dividend for the whole year will be paid in January. Should the Great Northern be able to pay at the rate of 5 per cent. for the half-year on the Ordinary, this would make the dividend 4 per cent. for the whole year of 1896, and leave 2 per cent. for the Deferred. The Chatham Arbitration Preference dividend will be paid in full, and there should be nearly 1 per cent. for the Second Prefs. The Great Eastern dividend will hardly be more than 3 per cent. for the year; and amongst the Heavy division estimates for the current half-year are such as to foreshadow for the whole year of 1896 a dividend of from 7 to 7¼ per cent. on North Western, 6 per cent. on Midland and Great Western, and 6½ per cent. on North Eastern. On the basis of these dividends the Heavies are yielding from £3. 11s. per annum to £3. 14s. 6d. per annum; but the best yield is that on Brighton "A," which even at the present price of 182¾, deducting the accrued dividend, would yield nearly 4¼ per cent. Dover "A" would yield 3½ per cent., but, in view of the progressiveness of the line, and largely-increased traffics which are expected next year, the present return alone must not be looked at. I for some time singled out Brighton "A" and Dover "A" as the most promising speculations amongst English Railway stocks, and I still hold this opinion, there being a considerable margin for a further advance even on the present quotations. The rise in Great Eastern is being overdone, and is based entirely upon future progress, as even in the best of cases the dividend for 1896 could not work out to more than 3½ per cent., so that the yield would be under 3 per cent. There has been a temporary reaction in Metropolitan Districts, which are, however, firmer again at 27⅜; and, as the passing through Parliament of the deep-level express scheme seems to be assured, a sharp rally may come about at any time. The Scotch stocks are being kept down by rumours of possible labour troubles, but it is evident that these reports are being worked for a good deal more than they are worth by the ursine party. For the seventeen weeks of the current half-year the Caledonian had an increase of £26,893; the North British one of £36,700, and substantial dividends may therefore be looked for, especially as traffics in the near future are expected to again show considerable increases. I still consider, therefore, Caledonian Deferred Ordinary at 59⅝, and North British Deferred at 47¼, good purchases. With reference to the labour position, I gather from Scotch sources that the majority of the masters in the engineering and shipbuilding trades are disposed to meet the demands of the men by an offer to grant an advance of ¼d. an hour, and although they are not quite willing to diminish the working hours to fifty-three, it is expected that negotiations between both parties will gradually adjust the points of difference and facilitate an arrangement. No fresh feature is apparent with reference to the coal trade, and no serious trouble is anticipated there.

The Yankee Market.

Yankee Rails have been exceedingly dull and lifeless during the past week, and prices have further receded, although rates were easy at the settlement, and the account has been reduced in volume. Traffic returns have on the whole been unsatisfactory, partly owing to the retention of grain by the farmers, who are awaiting a further rise in prices, shipments consequently having fallen off. The effect of the revival in American trade has, moreover, not yet had time to show itself in the railway traffics. In the meantime there is a disposition to await President Cleveland's message to Congress, which will be issued in a day or two, and if the same should prove conciliatory as far as Spain is concerned, it is probable that a fresh revival will follow. Quotations of such stocks as Louisville and Milwaukee, at all events, are now again at a very moderate level; and there is a strong undercurrent in favour of low-priced stocks such as Atchison Prefs., Southern Ordinary, Union Pacifics, Norfolk Prefs., Denvers, &c. For Railroad bonds a steady demand has arisen, and it must be admitted that investors are fully justified in the favourable view which they are taking. I have received a number of inquiries as to selections of gilt-edged and second-class bonds, and herewith again give a list of such, although I would like to draw the attention of my correspondents to the fact that I gave a similar list in "My Letter-Box" in the last few issues:—New York and Putnam Four per Cent. bonds at 107½, yielding £3. 16s. per cent.; Lynn and Boston Five per Cent. First Mortgage Gold bonds at 102½ xd., yielding £5 per cent.; Northern Pacific Four per Cent. Prior Lien bonds at 87¼, yielding £4. 15s. 9d. per cent.; Alabama Midland First Five per Cent. Mortgage bonds at 95, yielding £5. 9s. 6d. per cent.; Baltimore and Ohio Five per Cent. Sterling bonds at 91½, yielding £5. 10s. per cent.; and Pittsburg, Cleveland, and Toledo First Mortgage Six per Cent. bonds at 103½, yielding £5. 18s. 6d. per cent.; an average yield of over 5 per cent. Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks have shown weakness in sympathy with the American market, the former being quoted 57¾, while amongst the latter the First Prefs. and Guaranteed have lost over a point. As soon as the Yankee market recovers, however, we may look also for better prices in these.

Foreigners and South Americans.

Interbourse securities have been quiet, and no further advances have occurred, with the exception of Italians, which have moved up to 91⅜, the fact that this country has extricated itself from its untenable position in Africa being considered encouraging. Spain is apparently making no headway in Cuba, and Spanish bonds are, therefore, again under a cloud, being quoted 58½. Turks have been fairly steady, but inactive, and operators appear inclined to await the settlement on the Paris Bourse before entering upon any fresh commitments. In the South American market the feature has been a sharp advance in Argentine Government stocks. I have repeatedly referred to the scheme of ex-President Pellegrini to resume the full service of the debt next year, instead of proceeding with Dr. Romero's unification scheme. Dr. Pellegrini's proposal has passed the Senate, and is presumably now before the Chamber of Deputies. Its real object is, undoubtedly, to thoroughly re-establish Argentine credit, and thereby raise the value of her bonds, with the view subsequently to enter into an operation for reducing the rate of interest permanently on the strength of the improved credit of the country. Rumours that a compromise has been effected between Dr. Romero and Dr. Pellegrini were responsible for a sharp upward movement on Saturday, in which the 1886 Loan benefited most, this being, as is well known, under the special protection of Messrs. Morgan. No one will regret the ill-conceived unification scheme, but it remains to be seen whether the scheme to be substituted will be practicable. Argentine Railway Debenture stocks are becoming quite favourites for investment, now that the country is prospering. We have Buenos Ayres Great Southern Four per Cent. Debenture stock at 121, Central Argentine Four per Cent. Debenture stock at 116, and Buenos Ayres and Rosario Four per Cent. Debenture stock at 109. Having investigated the position of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Debenture stock, which, by the way, is perpetual, I have come to the conclusion that at the present price of 108 this is particularly suitable for permanent investment. It will be remembered that the debenture capital of this Company was reconstructed in 1893, and so satisfactory has been the working of the line during the last few years that there is available for the service of the First Four per Cent. Debenture stock more than double the amount required. The satisfactory position will be seen at a glance from the following statement:—

Net revenue for year ending June 30, 1896...	£171,826
Debenture interest	81,017
Surplus ...	£90,809
Traffic receipts from June 30 to November 31	£150,826
Traffic receipts for same period of last year	115,260
Increase...	£35,566

It will be noted, therefore, that this is an especially well-secured Debenture stock, which, in the present dearth of gilt-edged investments, may be recommended as yielding £3. 14s. per cent. per annum. The next six-monthly dividend is payable on December 12, and there are behind these Debentures £1,315,000 Second Four and a Half per Cent. Debentures, quoted at nearly par, and £1,000,000 of Prefs. quoted at 92. Uruguay bonds have suffered from two causes. In the first instance, some minor revolt seems to be in progress in the north, to which, however, no importance is attributed. The announcement that the Uruguayan Government has given notice to the London and River Plate Bank to withdraw its note circulation made, however, a disagreeable impression, as it was viewed in the light of the thin end of the wedge for introducing a note issue by the New National Bank at Monte Video, and it would be as well if the Uruguayan Government were to make some statement on this subject. Guatemala have improved to 44½, but Colombians are easier at 21, pending the receipt of any reliable news as to the proposed settlement of the debt. With reference to Costa Rica, no further proposals have been received from the Government, but I cannot help thinking that, sooner or later, this defaulting Republic must take steps to come to an arrangement with the bondholders. Mexican Sixes have advanced sharply, the Old Loan being quoted 94½, and the New Loan at 92½, which is not surprising, considering the steady progress which is being made by this Republic.

The Kaffir Circus.

The hope which had been entertained in many quarters that the recent improvement in South Africans had come to stay has so far been disappointed, for although the settlement passed off satisfactorily and without any failures, renewed sales have taken the cream off the recovery which had taken place. Still, the wholesale throwing overboard of shares has ceased, and probably when the Paris settlement has been got over, no further weakness will at all events emanate from that quarter. In confirmation of the statement which I made last week as to the probable amount of the indemnity to be demanded by the Transvaal Government, President Kruger has made a statement at a public banquet in Pretoria to the effect that the claim will not be too big, and will exactly represent the expense incurred through the Jameson raid. It is also satisfactory to learn from the President's own lips that there is absolutely not the slightest disposition to tamper with the London Convention. His contradiction of the rumours of possible political trouble, and his promise to foster the mining industry because the more it flourishes the more the State would flourish, are sensible pronouncements. It is not likely that the Boers will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs; but at the same time it is to be hoped that further burdens will be taken off the mining industry in the Transvaal. The shutting down of the Langlaagte Royal, for instance, shows that it is difficult to work low-grade mines profitably under the present conditions. The repeal of the dynamite monopoly, and the reduction of railway rates, are measures which would greatly facilitate operations on the Rand. On the other hand, it appears that portions of the mine now being developed will yield higher grade ore. I repeat that the only serious drawback in the case of the better-class mines now is some scarcity of water. The ample supply of native labour, the reduction of wages, Scottish Widows' Fund Life Assurance Society.—Special Notice.—Participating Assurances effected before the 31st December, 1896, will rank for Six Full Years' Bonus Additions at the next Periodical Division of Profits. and the concessions with respect to the batteries working on Sunday, are all favourable developments; and as soon as the water difficulty has been overcome by the advance of the season, we shall see returns go up by leaps and bounds. Under the circumstances, I retain my view that well selected gold and land shares should be held for a distinct recovery, and that it is advisable to average holdings acquired at higher prices. It is probable that in the near future quotations will harden but gradually, but the concensus of opinion is in favour of a sharp upward movement when the year is turned. The Chartered Company has officially stated that the full amount of the new issue of shares has been subscribed, and that applicants who have applied for more than they were entitled to by their present holding will receive only from 40 to 50 per cent. The Chartered shareholders seem to have the courage of their opinions, but I should think all the same that there would have been a better chance of the market being worked up if the syndicate had had their way, unless Mr. Cecil Rhodes, on his return, goes in for a stock-jobbing operation. As I am being repeatedly asked by correspondents which stocks it would be best to average in, I herewith give again a little list from which such selections should be made:—Langlaagte Estate, New Primrose, Glencairn, City and Suburban, Robinson, Wolhuter, Randfontein, Johannesburg Consols, Barnato Consols, Buffelsdoorn, Henderson's Estates, New Crœsus, Kimberley Roodepoort, Lydenburg Estates, Oceana Consols, Mozambique, Modderfontein "B," Waterfall Estates, Woodstock (Transvaal), and Knights. It is now stated that the case of Pullinger v. Barnato in connection with the Buffelsdoorn deal has been settled, the litigants having come to terms. It is a pity that this result was not reached long ago. The news from the Chimes Mines that a 3-ft. reef, assaying 16 dwt. per ton, was met with in a borehole at a depth of 170 ft., is important, especially if the view taken by Dr. Hatch, that this is the main reef, should be confirmed. The Chimes Mines, Limited, it will be remembered, was formed by the Barnato Consolidated Mines, Limited, in September last year. Some uncertainty seems to be overhanging the date at which the Van Ryn will commence crushing, but this cannot now be far off. I wonder who is behind the new flotation of the Scottish Rand Company, Limited, which is now in progress, and has to deal with buildings and building stands in Johannesburg? The Potchefstroom Exploration is apparently as far off as ever from success. Diamond shares have been fairly steady, De Beers being quoted 29, New Jagersfontein 10½. I wonder what the promoters, who have apparently bought twenty-seven claims in the Leicester Mine, which belonged to the Cosmopolitan Syndicate (now in liquidation), propose to do with them? As they were purchased for a mere song, it is to be hoped that they are not to be off-loaded upon the public at a high price.

Golden West Australia.

Fluctuations have been the order of the day in the West Australian department, and although prices at one time improved sharply under the lead of Lake View Consols, which touched 8, the advance has not been altogether maintained. Yet there is absolutely no fresh news which is in any way unfavourable to the West Australian goldfields. In the case of Lake View Consols, a reaction was not due to advices from the mine, which are of the most favourable kind, but to the imminence of the special settlement, which takes place this week. As the quotation has fluctuated very considerably since the shares were introduced on the market, it had been expected that the settlement would be a somewhat laborious one, instead of which it passed off remarkably well, the bulk of the shares being taken up and paid for. The contango opened at 1s. 6d., and eased off to 6d. per share; while the quotation recovered to 7½. Particulars have been published of an arrangement which has been come to between the London and Globe Finance Corporation and its group on one side, and the London-Paris Financial and Mining Corporation on the other side. The London-Paris has just published a Directors' report and balance-sheet, showing a profit of £45,663, which it is, however, not intended to distribute. The Company proposes to extend the field of its operations, and not to confine itself to South African enterprises, which is distinctly a sensible view; and they have concluded an arrangement with the powerful group represented by the London and Globe Corporation, under which fresh capital will be obtained by the creation of 500,000 new shares of £1 each, of which 250,000 will be issued at par under the guarantee of the London and Globe Finance Corporation. Of these the London and Globe Corporation will receive 125,000, while the shareholders of the London-Paris Company will be offered the right to subscribe for the other 125,000 shares. Should 250,000 shares more be issued within a year of the date of the first issue, the London and Globe Corporation will also be entitled to guarantee that issue at the price of £1. 5s. per share, with a similar right to subscribe. There is more in this deal than appears on the surface. It is, of course, not an amalgamation between the two undertakings, but it means that the great South African financiers will also in future take a hand in West Australian matters, and will more particularly be ready to support the same by lending their money in the West Australian market. The London and Globe Company, moreover, acquires a Paris connection which it has not hitherto had, the London and Paris Corporation having a most influential French Board. With reference to the London and Globe Finance and West Australian Exploring and Finance Corporations' Deferred shares, to which I alluded last week, I may mention that there is only half the number of the Deferred shares to the Ordinary shares, while they will be entitled to half the profits, the payment of which will be announced at the next meeting. Therefore, as London and Globe Ordinary shares stand at 4⅛, the Deferred shares, instead of standing between 5 or 6 ought to be quoted 8 or upwards; and those who take an early hand in the deal in these Deferred shares are likely to fare well by doing so. It has pleased certain operators to put the market for London and Globe shares down on the publication of the statement as to its connection with the London-Paris Corporation; but it may safely be said that the able men in control of the group know well what they are about, and any one indulging in "Bear" sales on this point is likely to be badly caught. Advices from the West Australian goldfields are generally favourable, fresh discoveries being announced in several directions; but what the public want at present are crushings, and these are especially required in order to refute the absurd criticisms which have of late appeared in several of my contemporaries. I may as well state that according to the West Australian Goldfields Courier, the actual returns for the first nine months of the years 1895 and 1896 were as follows:—

	1895. oz.	1896. oz.
January to March ...	53,814	45,356
April to June ...	54,464	66,971
July to September ...	62,107	81,074
Total ...	170,485	193,401

It might be argued that the increase is not very large, but it should not be forgotten that the Goldfield is in its infancy, and that there has been serious trouble in getting machinery to the mines, the block at Fremantle at one time being beyond all description. Gradually the railway is taking the new batteries up to the mines, and early in the new year distinct progress will be made with crushing. The following are the crushings which have been advised

Cascarine Leprince.—The housewife's ideal laxative. A pure vegetable product, free from irritating effects, which not only relieves, but permanently cures, obstinate and chronic constipation. Its action is mild, painless, and certain, and its tonic properties insure a regular habit of the body. It is invaluable in chronic congestion of the liver, dyspepsia and indigestion, biliousness and sick headache, owing to its tonic influence on the digestive apparatus. The mildness of its action and its absolute freedom from irritating or disagreeable after-effects render it peculiarly suitable for women during nursing. It has secured on the Continent an ever-increasing popularity. Sample gratis on application to Francis Newbery & Sons, 1 and 3, King Edward-st., Newgate-st., London, E.C.

during the week, and it will be seen that amongst these there are several trial crushings from mines which have not hitherto made returns :—

The public issue of the Northern Territories Goldfields, Limited, is at hand; and considerable dealings have taken place in the £1 shares of this Company, both partly paid and fully paid, the partly paid (10s. paid) being quoted $2\frac{1}{16}$ premium, the fully paid $3\frac{7}{16}$. The premium appears to be justified considering the comparatively moderate capital of £300,000. It had been the original intention to make the capital one million, in view of the very large holding of the Company, which consists of six extensive groups of mines, with hundreds of working shafts, and a great deal of plant and machinery; while the claims extend over nearly 800 acres, and a large block of tailings is already available, assaying 3 ounces per ton. The auriferous wealth of the large tracts acquired by the Company has been proved by the reports of numerous experts, and it is estimated that over £100,000 has already been expended upon the development of the properties. What has rendered these mines of special value has been the discovery of a vein interlacing the usual quartzite of rotten, slaty schitose, exactly similar to that found in the richest mines in the Hannan's district. It will be remembered that this Company is brought out by a combination of the principal West Australian Finance Companies, to the number of fourteen, at the head of which is the West Australian Joint Stock Trust, Limited. The shares of the latter Trust have already gone ahead to $2\frac{1}{8}$ premium in anticipation of this issue, and the Founders' shares are quoted at 40. The Cue No. 1 is again to the fore with a crushing of 290 tons for 215 oz., the tailings assaying 9 dwt. per ton; and although this is a low-grade mine it is expected to pay well. The shares are quoted $\frac{1}{2}$, at which they are well worth picking up. The crushing of the Princess Royal is distinctly satisfactory, yielding as it does over 2 oz. to the ton. White Feather Reward shares have advanced to $1\frac{3}{4}$, on the cablegram stating that crushing is proceeding with twenty stamps, and everything working smoothly with sufficient water. Should the crushing prove satisfactory, these shares will probably rise sharply. Other shares which are worth attention are Great Boulder Main Reef at $1\frac{3}{8}$, Mawson's Reward at $\frac{15}{16}$, Robinson at $\frac{3}{4}$, East Murchison United at $\frac{13}{16}$, and Mount Margaret at $1\frac{3}{8}$. Lady Shenton have been steady, and should the next crushing prove as good as the previous ones, we may see a considerable advance on the present price of 2. Great Boulder, after rising to $6\frac{1}{2}$, are easier at $6\frac{1}{4}$; but Ivanhoe have been strong at $10\frac{1}{2}$. It is to be regretted that the legal formalities connected with the return of 4s. per share of the capital of the Hampton Plains are causing so much delay in its distribution; but, after all, the money has been deposited with the National Bank of Scotland, and by February next it will no doubt reach the hands of the shareholders. The trial crushing with the five new stamps of the Burbank's Birthday Gift, just announced by cablegram dated November 25, by which 35 tons yielded 3 oz. of gold per ton, exclusive of tailings, is distinctly favourable; and when the water supply becomes better, and more stamps are running, larger returns are expected. This news should prove very favourable to Burbank's Consols and Burbank's North. From the Burbank's Consols, moreover, Professor Frank Nicholas has cabled to the effect that he has discovered another reef on the property, the vein formation being 6 in. wide, and showing specks of visible free gold. Professor Nicholas adds that prospects are encouraging. From the Armadale a cablegram from Mr. Frank Nicolas is to the effect that the winding engine is started, and that the cyanide plant is on the mine. It is expected that this property will also give a good account of itself. With regard to the Great Boulder Main Reef, cable advices announce the discovery of a rich body of telluride ore at the 158-ft. level, the cabled assays varying from 3 oz. to 57 oz. per ton. The crushing of the Robinson Gold Mines is distinctly encouraging, 290 tons having yielded 558 oz. of gold, or 1 oz. 18 dwt. per ton. The report of the Mawson's Reward Claim, which has just been issued, marks a step in advance in these documents, as it is drawn up in tabular form, so as to show, at a glance, all the development work that has been done. A great deal of ore is in sight, which is expected to yield 2 oz. to the ton. As a battery of 15 head of stamps has been erected, crushing will doubtless shortly commence. The North West Australian Goldfields are also now apparently distinguishing themselves by regular crushings, the yield being fairly satisfactory.

The Lady Hampton Rig.

A good deal of excitement has recently been caused by the corner which has been created in Lady Hampton Consolidated Gold Mines, and I stated last week that, although I am not generally on the side of the "Bears," who deserve, as a rule, what they get, the Lady Hampton rig was too outrageous, the shares having been run up nominally to something like 300 premium. This, at least, was the fancy price mentioned by those who engineered the corner, for it stands to reason that no actual dealings took place at anything like that figure. The Lady Hampton Consolidated was registered on September 28 by Messrs. Edwards & Cohen, solicitors, of Coleman-street, with a capital of £250,000 in £1 shares, for the purpose of acquiring a West Australian property. The vendors were the Antipodes Exploration, but there is little doubt that Mr. R. P. Houston, M.P., held the chief interest in this concern. I do not know how much there may be in the rumour that the mine originally was offered in the market at a very low figure; but, to judge by the history of some West Australian Companies, this would not be at all surprising; and as the Company was considered largely over-capitalised, the jobbers had probably some excuse for banging the shares. There appears to be absolutely no truth in the allegation that the deal had been offered to one of the leading jobbers, and that his terms had been found too high. On the contrary, he maintains that he was never approached in the matter and did not know who was behind the deal, but that he and others sold the shares in order to stop the excessive flotations of new West Australian Gold Mining Companies. The promoters promptly decided to punish the offending jobbers, and there is no doubt that somehow or other "Bear" commitments were created to the tune of 10,000 shares, out of which the leading jobber above-referred to is computed to have sold 2,800. Against these the price has been run up by a combination of the promoters and other insiders. The Stock Exchange Committee had granted a special settlement for November 25. But when the curious dealings in the shares were brought to their notice, they deferred the settlement till the end of the year. In this they were undoubtedly justified, for the circumstances of this promotion and allotment call for special investigation. It should be shown in the first instance whether, as is alleged, the mine was bought for a comparatively small sum, say of £8,000 or £9,000, as against a purchase price of £190,000. Again they will have to consider whether the allotment was a bonâ-fide one, and whether the condition that the requisite proportion had been allotted to the public has been fulfilled. Should this not be the case, the Committee would be bound to withhold a settlement, and the dealings in the shares would thus be cancelled. "Bear" operators have frequently enough exercised a most pernicious influence upon the markets and upon individual concerns, and if they get into a tight place by attempting to wreck the property of others, and fail in this, there is very little pity for them. But it should not be possible for promoters to lay a trap for sellers of shares in concerns which are hugely over-capitalised, and the shares in which are not allotted to the public in a bonâ-fide manner. Whether this is the case in the present instance the Committee of the Stock Exchange will doubtless be able to ascertain. In the meantime there are rumours of writs for actions for libel and conspiracy flying about, but as far as I could ascertain no actual proceedings had up to Tuesday been taken. The whole business is, however, likely to bring more grist to the mill of the legal profession than to those interested in the deal. Latest reports are to the effect that a mistake has been made with reference to the Stock Exchange settlement, and that this was granted on the numbers of fully-paid Vendors' shares instead of on those of partly-paid shares. Should this report prove correct, the whole matter would end in a compromise or in smoke.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

A firm tone has prevailed in Indian Gold mines, and there have been improvements in Mysore and Nundydroog. Champion Reefs and Nine Reefs are also better, but Coromandel have eased off. Amongst Australian mines other than West Australian, Broken Hill Proprietary are firm at $2\frac{9}{16}$, and Mount Lyell are also better; while advances are marked in Wentworth, Gibraltar, and British Broken Hill. Declines are, however, shown in Mount Morgan and Bendigo. Aladdin's Lamp have been dull at $2\frac{3}{8}$. The Croydon Consols dividend has now been announced at 1s., making, with the previous dividends paid, 1s. 6d. per share, or £33,000 paid since May last. Crushings continue on a large scale, and for the fortnight 448 tons have yielded 2,055 oz. of gold. The full 15 head of stamps are now at work, and continuous crushings are anticipated. It is not surprising that, under these circumstances, the shares should have advanced to 11s. 6d., and a reaction to 10s. 6d., which has since occurred is, no doubt, only temporary. It is very gratifying to me that my readers, who have bought these shares from 3s. 6d. upwards, are faring so well with them. North Croydon Consols have been steady at 3s. 6d. In Charters Towers shares very little business has been transacted. New Zealand properties, on the other hand, are coming into demand; and advances are marked in Waihi, Waihi Silverton, New Zealand Joint Stock Trust, Komata Reefs, Komata Queen, Woodstock, &c. Taitapu, the favourable position of which I explained last week, have risen to $3\frac{11}{16}$, and should go considerably higher. From the Kuranui-Caledonian a cablegram has been received stating that the return from 60 tons was £625, which gives a yield of £10. 8s. 4d. per ton. The Mining Standard (Auckland, New Zealand) states that "Operations as reported last week are still in progress, although nothing of any very great importance need be expected until the rather heavy work of re-timbering, &c., is completed, when the manager will have more time to give to the work of getting out ore. We shall be the first to congratulate him should he drop on one of the old leaders which has made the Thames (world famous) as a goldfield." In the general foreign section business has been on a small scale. Pestarena have moved up, but Montana and St. John del Rey are lower. There has been also a relapse in Rio Tinto to $24\frac{3}{8}$. Grand Central, the well-known Mexican mine, appears to be doing well, and the price has advanced to $2\frac{5}{8}$. I hear, by the way, that a very important Mexican mine will shortly be issued under influential auspices, under the name of the Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico, Limited, which will acquire fully-equipped and developed mines and large blocks of land in the State of Sonora. A number of experts have reported most favourably upon the mine, which is described to have a true fissure vein of great size. Sixty stamps are at present working, which would suffice to earn a very large net profit, immediate dividends of 30 per cent. being foreshadowed.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

Septimus Parsonage & Co., Limited.—To acquire, amalgamate, and carry on the businesses of Septimus Parsonage & Co., of Mark-lane, E.C., Liverpool, and Dublin, wine and spirit brokers; James Violett, Bird & Co., claret shippers, Bordeaux; James Isles & Co., Scotch whisky blenders, Dundee; S. Parsonage & Fleming, brandy merchants and shippers, Châteauneuf, Cognac, France; and the land and buildings for the Highland Esk Distillery, this Company has been formed with a capital of £220,000, divided into 120,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and 100,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each.

This is an amalgamation of old-established concerns doing a good trade, thus effecting a large saving both in the management and in the advertising expenses. The Company also acquires the monopoly of selling in the United Kingdom the well-known wines of Messrs. Theophile Roederer & Co. for twenty-one years, and has just concluded a valuable contract with that firm for the sole agency for South West of France, Russia, United States, Canada, and other countries. It is stated that over 2,000 hotels, clubs, &c., besides a large number of wine merchants, are customers of the firm, and the estimate of the united profits, based upon former returns, foreshadows a large surplus after paying 10 per cent. on the Ordinary shares in addition to the Preference interest.

Atlantic and Danville Railway.—The Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, invite subscriptions for 678,000 dols. Five per Cent. First Mortgage Gold bonds. The principal and interest are payable in gold coin of the United States. The share capital is 3,200,000 dols. Five per Cent. Preferred shares and 2,500,000 dols. Ordinary shares. The price of issue is 92, at 4s. to the dollar.

Showell's Stockport Brewery, Limited.—This Company is formed to acquire the Brookfield Brewery, Stockport, and the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold licensed houses attached thereto. The capital is fixed at £200,000, divided into 10,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and 10,000 Ordinary shares of £10 each. There are also 2,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture bonds of £100 each.

S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited.—With a capital of £480,000, divided into 46,000 Five and a Half per Cent. Cumulative Preference and 50,000 Ordinary shares of £5 each, this Company proposes to take over the business of furniture manufacturers and dealers, upholsterers, decorators, &c., carried on under the title of S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited, at 181, Oxford-street, London; Bold-street, Liverpool, and Deansgate, Manchester. They also acquire the well-known Renaissance Galleries at 104, New Bond-street, London.

This business has been established for some years, and has been a very progressive one. It has branches in Manchester, Liverpool, and London, and the firm have been very successful during the past few years in competitions, the Hotel Cecil, Hans Crescent Hotel, and the Princes' Restaurant being amongst the many large orders recently carried out by them. From the standing acquired by Waring & Sons there seems to be every prospect of their continuing their successful career.

The British Motor Syndicate, Limited.—With a registered capital of £1,000,000, in shares of £1, this Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring various patents for motor cars, vans, bicycles, and other description of vehicles.

Motor cars are very much in the air still, and to ask so huge a capital for a Company dealing with undeveloped patents, which may at any time be superseded by others, is preposterous. To offer the shares at a high premium is placing a very low estimate upon the intelligence of the public.

Darby, Nott, & Co., Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire and carry on the Lion Iron Works, Barnstaple; Brecon Foundry, Brecon; Sheet Metal and Stamp Works, Hounslow; and twenty-one wholesale and retail ironmongery businesses situate in London and elsewhere. The capital is fixed at £200,000, in Six per Cent. Preference and Ordinary shares of £5 each.

The Credo Gold Mines, Limited is formed with a capital of £100,000 in £1 shares, to acquire mining properties known as the Credo, the East Credo, and the West Credo, in the Coolgardie Goldfields of Western Australia. £20,000 is reserved as working capital.

The Kapai-Vermont Gold Mining Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to purchase and extend the operations of the Kapai-Vermont Gold Mine, a dividend-paying property, equipped with machinery and cyanide plant, situate in the Kuaotunu Goldfield (Hauraki District), of New Zealand, comprising an area of thirty-seven acres. The capital consists of £150,000 in 150,000 shares of £1 each, of which 110,000 are offered for subscription.

The prospectus states that up to date 5,480 tons of ore have been crushed, producing 8,779 oz. of gold. The mine is taken over as a going concern, being equipped with machinery and cyanide plant, and, according to the reports of the experts, it will develop into a very valuable property, it being expected that the richness of the ore will increase greatly at the deeper levels. As it is proposed to erect additional machinery for the treatment of 150 tons of ore a day, a considerable increase in the profits may be anticipated.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents :—

Government, &c., Bonds.

Taffy.—The fund is accumulating, as usual; but it is not known what the amount of the surplus will be.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

American Subscriber.—This is a Colonial Bank of fair standing; but it is subject, like all other Banks of this kind, to fluctuations of business; and one cannot call it absolutely safe. G. T. Faith.—I cannot refer to back letters. You must repeat your questions. J. W. S.—Thanks for your letter. I have repeatedly given the advice to my readers to have nothing to do with "Our Own Investment System" of Douglas, Hungerford, & Williams, 5, Copthall-buildings, London, E.C. If, as you say, a commission of 5 per cent. is allowed to any one obtaining subscriptions, this makes my advice all the more urgent. An Innocent Victim.—I am sorry to hear you came to grief in Australian Bank shares. I gave ample warning before the crisis. At present you have no option but to hold. W. S. E.—Thanks for your letter. I should advise you to have nothing whatever to do with the outside concern in question, or with this publication.

Home Rails.

S. O., Manchester.—Thanks. As you say, both Brighton "A" and Dover "A" are bearing out my predictions; and this will, no doubt, also be the case with Coras and North British Deferred. Padimo.—1. I do not for a moment think that the dividend will be so high. 2. I think your calculation is too sanguine. Ray.—Your selection of Midland G. W. of Ireland Ordinary stock, Metropolitan District Five per Cent. Prefs., Dover "A," Caledonian Deferred, and North British Deferred is very suitable, and I do not think you can improve upon it.

American and Foreign Rails.

Retired Pay.—Yes, I certainly would advise you to hold Argentine Northern Central Five per Cent. bonds for a rise. Leominster.—I have never recommended these Brazilian railway stocks; but it seems to me that you have no option but to hold on the chance of a recovery. Lexicon.—You should hold your Ontario for a further rise. King's Own.—There is no reason for the decline in Argentine Northern Centrals, which should be held for a recovery. W. W., Leith.—There is nothing against this railway stock, but Chilian investments generally have given way. A. B. C. D. E.—I do not think much of this Company myself, but as you would forfeit your stock if you did not pay up, you had better do so and sell after. I still advise holding the Argentine stock in question. Sculptor.—It is certainly to be regretted that the United States Car Company has again to be reorganised; but I do not see how you can refuse the proposal. Central.—Certainly hold Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds. This line should be benefited by the renewal of the pooling arrangement. C. M., Kilburn.—Metropolitan Districts are at present very cheap. B. E.—Yes, gilt-edged American Railway bonds are quite safe if you are satisfied with 3¾ to 4 per cent. for your money. As a matter of principle, I cannot recommend individual stockbrokers. Your bank manager will doubtless do so.

Mining Shares.

P., Cheshire.—I already referred last week to Westralia and Randt, Limited, and to the W.A. Minerals and Finance Company, Limited, and am doing so again to-day. I should certainly not advise putting any money into these concerns. Vigilance.—The Lake View Consols is undoubtedly a very rich property, but the more important rise will probably only take place when the large crushings come to hand. You must yourself decide whether to hold the shares till then or to take your profit sooner. Scot.—At the present price this should be a fair mining risk; but it is no catch. Constancy.—It would appear that your letter must have miscarried. If you inquired after Randfontein and Porges Randfontein, both these shares are likely to improve. As requested, I forward the name of a smart firm of City solicitors in your envelope. Nelson.—No; I do not advise purchase of La Yesca now, as the management leaves a great deal to be desired. T. M. R.—1. No reason; favourable advices have been received. You should write to the Secretary. 2. You will have to await the report of the New Explorers' Syndicate, which is shortly to be issued. Ulster.—1 and 2. An outside concern whose system I do not like. I advise you strongly to deal only through a member of the Stock Exchange. 3. You should average your holding in Randfontein and Johnnies; they should go much higher. Mon Moore.—You should hold all your South African shares, including New Crœsus, for an improvement. John G.—I still have a favourable opinion of London and Continental Investment Ordinary and Deferred shares, and you should hold these for a rise. 2. The Directors' report of the New Explorers' Syndicate is expected shortly. 3. No option but to hold for the present. 4. I cannot really tell you, but am promised the information shortly; they should certainly be held. Taffy, Menai Bridge.—1. Amongst dividend-paying Australian shares, I should advise purchase of West Australian Exploring and Finance, Croydon Consols, Hampton Plains, West Australian Goldfields, and West Australian Joint Stock Trust Ordinary and Founders' shares. 2. I do not like these so well. Caledon.—You have done quite right, and your shares will further improve. Amongst the list mentioned, I should certainly prefer Oceana Consols (1), Woodstock-Transvaal (2), and Great Boulder Main Reefs (4). I do not think so much of the others. E. O.—From the circular which has just been issued you will find that the return of capital of the Hampton Plains cannot be made until February next for legal reasons. 2. A fair purchase at present price. 3. Yes; but you can do better in the shares mentioned in my letter. 4. Yes. Snipe.—There is nothing against this Company, but it is not so well suited for investment by English capitalists as the other shares of this group. High Pressure.—There is nothing against the New Bultfontein Mine, which is doing very well. Man.—Yes, you should hold. Violet.—You should certainly hold all your mining shares Nos. 1 to 8, and average South Australian Gold Trust (1), and Johnnies (3). I do not like Lisbon-Berlyn (8), and have always said so. No. 5 are very cheap now. Gamma.—1. I do not think that there is anything of the kind; 2 to 4 have also still plenty of chances. These shares are chiefly depressed through unscrupulous "Bear" selling. Boltonion.—1. You should hold your mining shares. 2. Both South Africans and West Australians are worth buying now. 3. You will find full information in my letter under "The Rally in the Kaffir Circus" and "Golden West Australia." J. F. S., Stockton-on-Tees.—You should hold both your mining shares Nos. 1 and 2 for an improvement. P. J. L., Dublin.—You should hold both South African shares for a rise, which is already in progress. Nemo, Sutton Coldfield.—1. I do not like this outside concern; you should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange. The supposed saving of the brokers' commission is altogether illusory. It would be put for you on the price. Amongst the shares mentioned, I should prefer Oceana (c) and Langlaagte (d). La Plata.—There is no market for these shares here, and I fancy that the concern has been wound up. You will have to inquire in South Africa. H. L. S.—I cannot trace anything about the African Gold Coast Trading Corporation, Limited, and there is no market for the shares. Enquirer, Banbury.—The reason why I advised purchase and holding of these shares is that the property is in an excellent position, adjoining the rich portion of the Randfontein Estate. The shares have fallen in sympathy with the general slump. Patrick.—1. I should consider this Colorado Mining and Investment Company's shares a very bad investment. 2. There is no market for them. 3. I do not know this personage. Johnnie.—There is no risk in the case in question, and you should hold these shares for a considerable rise. F. F., Ipswich.—You should hold your shares Nos. 1 to 4 for an improvement, and you had better average by buying some of the shares mentioned in my letter under "Golden West Australia." 5. Certainly hold Southern Ordinary for a recovery. C. A., Warwickshire.—I do not think much of this concern. C. G. H., Stoke.—You should hold your shares for an improvement, and average by buying some of the shares mentioned in my letter under "Golden West Australia." Bottler.—You should hold your African Estate shares for a rise. You say you have bought Lake View at $1\frac{7}{16}$. Do you mean the old Lake View shares, which have since been converted into Lake View Consols? If so, there is a little fortune in them, Lake View Consols being now quoted 7⅜. Amongst your list of mining shares to purchase, I should prefer Nos. 3 to 7, and 9 and 10. Argus, Glasgow.—London and Globe Finance shares have since rallied very considerably, and you should hold for a further rise. Hold No. 2 for an advance. Yorkshire.—No dividend can be expected yet; but both are promising mines. B. H.—Yes, W. A. Joint Stock Trust (1), and the mining shares Nos. 2 and 3, should be held for a rise. A. N., Sunderland.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you, Nos. 1 to 6, I should prefer No. 5; and for the rest you can do better in the shares mentioned in my letter. No. 4 should recover again; I explained the position fully three weeks ago. No. 6 should also be held. Pirites.—I should advise you to hold your shares for a recovery. But.—You will do well to hold all your South African shares Nos. 1 to 4 for a recovery; they are well selected. C. H. P.—From the information I have received, the rinderpest is not likely to affect the sound Witwatersrand mines. Working Man, Gateshead.—I do not think it would be advisable for you to speculate on the Stock Exchange. Pharaoh.—You should hold your shares; there is still a prospect of a recovery. W. M. C.—The shareholders ought to combine against the atrocious proceedings of the Directors of the Abercorn Reefs, who are now trying through Burgoyne, Watts & Co. to enforce calls, which they ought never to have made. The shareholders should act for themselves. Roseland.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you, I prefer Nos. 1, 3, 6, and 7. The others are undesirable. W. C. S.—Yes, you should certainly hold both the mining shares Nos. 1 and 2. Despondent.—No option but to hold your mining shares, and you should certainly average Adler's Consolidated. Ceripa.—Amongst the mining shares Nos. 1 to 4, I think No. 4 is worth buying; but you can make a better selection from the shares mentioned in my letter. Lex.—You are quite right to take your shares Nos. 1 to 12 off the market, and hold for a distinct recovery. I must, however, except Sam's Wealth of Nations, which is not a desirable concern, and has now been pulled up for want of capital. Falkiner.—Yes, you should average Langlaagte Star. Goldfields of Lydenburg are likely to recover. Contango.—Outside brokers; I should advise you to deal only through a member of the Stock Exchange. Hampton Plains are a good purchase. D. R.—The rights are one Porges Randfontein for every five Randfontein shares. You are therefore entitled to twenty Porges Randfontein. Onyx.—I hold an unfavourable opinion of the Queensland Menzies Gold Mining Company and of the Queensland Lady Sherry. Cathedral.—No option but to hold Nos. 1 to 9 for a recovery. Clerk, Dundee.—No; I do not advise purchase of Corsair Consolidated. Bond 7.—All your Mining shares Nos. 1-19 should be held for a recovery. No. 20 is a Paris firm which is touting for orders for lottery bonds, but generally charges far above the market value. If you want to buy such bonds, you should do so through a respectable London firm of foreign brokers. Taxin.—1. Thanks for the circulars of syndicate touts. I have already criticised their doings. 2. Hold the South African shares for a recovery. I am glad you are doing so well in Croydon Consols on my advice. H. M., Gainsborough.—1. I do not recommend purchase of these Development and Finance shares. I have never recommended these West Australian shares, and do not think much of them. You should combine with the other shareholders. De Trop.—Hold West Boulder. 2. No, I do not advise purchase of Brownhill Proprietary. Ignorans.—Both Bertram's (Luipaards Vlei) and the Knysna Mines, Limited, have been in liquidation for some years. The Liquidator of Bertram's is the Official Receiver, 33, Carey-street, W.C.; and of the Knysna Mines, Messrs. J. S. Prince & W. S. Stronge, 313 and 314, Winchester House, Old Broad-street, E.C. You should apply to these gentlemen for further information.

Industrial Investments.

D. W.—I do not think much of this Steel Company, as the future is somewhat problematical. One who has Suffered.—I quite agree with you that Triticine, Limited, is not a concern in which investment is advisable. Redruth.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you, Nos. 1 and 2 are preferable. Cero.—I do not think it would pay you to give more than par for these Three per Cent. debentures. Wakefield.—I am glad you are doing so well in Leeds and Wakefield Breweries, which you bought at 11½, and which now stand at 13¼. I do not, however, advise purchase at this increased price. G. T.—I have always had an unfavourable opinion of the United Alkali Company; but there is no reason to get out of the debentures in a hurry. Haddon.—I do not think much of these Stores, and should take an opportunity to get out. Lady O.—I am afraid that this matter has been arranged so long ago that it would be useless to attempt to upset it now. Regiment.—I do not think there is any hurry to get out of these Cycle shares. The Publishing shares are very speculative; and against the Beeston Rim Company's shares I have warned my readers many a time. You do not seem to read my remarks regularly. K. T. G. C.—I have asked the question concerning the strange proceeding on the part of the Secretary of the Beeston Tyre Rim Company in to-day's letter under "Various Investments." I certainly consider this a very unusual proceeding on the part of the Directors. Syphon.—I really cannot help you by "recommending a promoter who would take up two of the best English patents for syphons;" and I am certainly not aware that English brewers contemplate sending out their beer in syphons instead of small casks. Clementina.—The best breweries amongst those mentioned by you are Nos. 1 and 6. West Cheshire.—No. J. P., Portman-square.—I do not recommend the investment. S. F. Z.—Yes, Financial Times Ordinary shares at £3 each look very promising. According to the last balance-sheet the Company paid a dividend at the rate of 25 per cent. per annum, thus at the present price yielding a return of 8 per cent.; while a surplus of 10 per cent. has been placed to reserve. Dundalk.—1. No, I do not know this firm. 2. These Meat shares are a fair investment. C. H., Fulham.—1. No catch. 2. Outside dealers. You should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange. 3. No. W.—No, this class of Dock stocks is not at all progressive.

The luxury of a bath is incomplete without the addition of Scrubb's Cloudy Household Ammonia, which refreshes and exhilarates.

Mixed Investments.

Beno.—It is not advisable to sell your mining shares at present; await a recovery first. I do not like Simpson's Lever Chains at all, and have always said so. Erebus.—1. After the heavy fall I hardly think it advisable to sell; but it is not a very good investment. 2. No, I should not advise you to sell Costa Rica "B" bonds now, as a settlement will, no doubt, come about sooner or later. Tasman.—1. The amount was transferred from the reserve fund to make provision for possible losses, but the shares, at present price, are a good investment. 2. No option but to hold now. E. H. G.—1. No particular reason for selling these debentures. 2. The business of the Lydenburg Exploring and Minerals Company has undoubtedly been hindered by the disturbed state of the country; but if you write to the secretary, Mr. J. D. Kennedy, 25, Abchurch-lane, E.C., he will doubtless give you every information. 3. There is nothing new about these Diamond shares. F. M. B.—1. I have not a favourable opinion of these Stores and the shares are not quoted on the Stock Exchange. 2. Yes; hold for a recovery. 3. If copper further improves, yes. 4. No. Bunkered.—1. These Brewery debentures are a good investment, and there is no reason for your anxiety. 2. A fair speculative risk, but no catch. 3. The interest on the debentures is safe enough. Walker.—These shares have declined in the general South African slump, and should now be held for a recovery; also keep the other shares. Fair City.—1. Yes, these Brewery Preference shares are accumulative, and there are some arrears to be made up. Write to the Secretary, at 35, Copthall-avenue, E.C., for full particulars. 2. Hold; but do not average. You can do better in other West Australian shares. 3. Yes; hold. Auld Reekie.—I am not an advocate of Chartered shares; but it might be advisable to hold now, so as to recover some of your loss. No option but to hold your shares Nos. 2 to 5 for a recovery. On No. 6 you should take a fair profit; and I do not approve of Premier Cycles (7). E. C.—1. Yes; you would participate in the sale of the undertaking. 2. Yes; they are fully paid. Sports.—1. Outside brokers, whose character I certainly should not like to guarantee. You should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. You should certainly buy Langlaagte Estate and West Australian Exploring and Finance (3). No. 4 (North British Deferred) are an excellent purchase for a speculative investment. S. W. J.—Take a good profit in Komata Reefs. Hold Southern Ordinary for a rise. A printer's error, of course. Franz.—1. Allsopp Ordinary are just moving up; hold for a further rise. 2. Yes, they will recover, buy more to average. 3. I have a bad opinion of United Alkali. 4. Hold Louisville. Sagax.—1. A very good selection for permanent investment. 2. Not quite gilt-edged, but nearly so, and no reason to trouble about the attack. 3. In order to increase your yield you might exchange a portion of the holding into Brighton "A," which will give you nearly 4 per cent, and into Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Debenture stock. With reference to the latter, see remarks under "Foreigners and South Americans." I do not recommend the last alternative stated by you. Mexicus, Dublin.—1. The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company is doing well, and there is no reason to sell. 2. Hold. Egypt.—1. Quite high enough. 2. No catch. Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Debenture stock at 108 would be preferable. Industrious.—No reason to make the change. Starfish.—1. Good prospects. 2. I do not recommend the investment. 3. Nitrate Rails will probably recover, but I have still a very unfavourable opinion of Qu'Appelle, Long Lake, &c. Hospital.—1. There is nothing against the Chilian Railway stock; and, after the fall, you had better hold. 2. A fair mining risk, but I do not think much of it. Wexford Oyster.—1. Yes, a fair mining risk. 2. They have already paid a 25 per cent. bonus. 3. Yes.

Various Investments.

Consols have distinguished themselves during the past week by a rise to 112⅜ for the account, and it was generally anticipated that the Bank of England would take its stock back on which it had borrowed in order to make its rate effective. This, however, does not appear to have been done yet, judging from the contango of 3½ per cent. at the Consol settlement. There is, however, but little probability of any stiffening in the Money Market. On the contrary, greater ease is anticipated, as it is practically certain that no more gold will go to the United States; while there is actually a prospect of return shipments from that country next year. No other gold demands are at present in sight, and rates of discount, which have now dropped to 3¼ per cent. for three months' bank bills, may therefore recede further; until towards the end of the year the usual requirements of the season may cause rates to stiffen temporarily. Silver is slightly easier at 29⅞, but Rupee Paper has recovered to 63⅛. An important announcement has been made to the effect that the profits of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company have been on a very large scale. It had been anticipated that the profits for the year would amount to £400,000; but an inspired statement has now been put forward that the realised profit for the year has been £1,450,000. This will not only provide large sums for reserve, but give a big dividend to the Deferred shares; and it is not surprising that Dunlop shares should have advanced thereupon, the Ordinary rising to $1\frac{3}{16}$, the Deferred to $1\frac{9}{16}$. Humber shares have been steady, the Ordinary at $1\frac{1}{4}$, the Preferred at $1\frac{1}{16}$, the Extensions at $1\frac{5}{16}$. Singer Cycles remain at $1\frac{1}{16}$, Beeston's at $3\frac{1}{2}$, and Simpson's Lever Chains at 7s.; but, as my readers are aware, I have no favourable opinion of the two last-named. In Gladiators (Clement, Humber, & Gladiator, France), business has taken place at $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ premium; and Swift Cycles have been firm at $\frac{1}{16}$ premium. Bagot Tyre shares have taken a jump to 7 premium on rumours of a corner. This does not, however, appear to be one of the illegitimate corners, such as have lately become fashionable; but it is understood that ample allotments were made at the time of the flotation of the Company, and that the "Bear" sales were made subsequently by persons who were determined to depress the market. These sales were met by large purchases on the part of the insiders, and the present squeeze is one which the "Bears" entirely brought about themselves, and for which they will have to suffer severely. I wonder what is in the wind with reference to the Beeston Tyre Rim Company, Limited? The secretary, Mr. Charles Osborn, is sending out postcards to the following effect:—

Sir or Madam,—Kindly inform me the lowest price you will take for your shares in the Beeston Tyre Rim Company, Limited, and oblige—Yours faithfully,

Chas. Osborn, Secretary.

When the shareholders thereupon ask what the secretary will give for the shares, they are met with the reply that he was merely instructed by the Directors to ask what the shareholders would take for their shares; and that if they do not care to make an offer, there is no necessity to trouble further in the matter. It is now officially announced that the new issue of Bovril, Limited, has been very largely over-subscribed, although the issue of the allotments has caused sales by "stags," and temporarily depressed quotations. The Ordinary and Deferred are quoted par to $\frac{1}{16}$ premium, the Preferred at par. Amongst Brewery shares Allsopps have taken a jump to $175\frac{1}{2}$, but there is no change in Guinness, which are quoted 540. A steady business is passing in other home brewery shares, but American brewery shares are temporarily neglected. Dealings have commenced in the Ordinary shares of the Financial Times, Limited, at £3 to £3. 2s. 6d. This Company comprises not only the Financial Times, but also important trade papers which are yielding large profits; and the trading for the half-year ended July 4 last showed a net profit of £21,071. After deducting a dividend at the rate of 25 per cent., a sum of £10,390 was left to carry forward. From the balance-sheet it appears that the Company's assets in cash and investments amount to £50,000. The Ordinary shares at £3 yield a return of 8 per cent., with a surplus of 10 per cent. to reserve, and are therefore a promising industrial investment. I have received the following complaint from a holder of £4,000 in Ordinary shares of the Hotchkiss Ordnance, Limited:—

Referring to the reconstruction of the Hotchkiss Ordnance, Limited, the recommendation of the Committee, endorsed by the Directors, on the above subject, has been placed before the shareholders; also a circular from the Directors which points out that, while they have been paying dividends on Preference shares, and Income-tax, amounting of £3,920 on the accumulated reserve fund, there has actually been a loss made through depreciation of goodwill, patents, &c., estimated at £360,000. This appears to be £78,000 more than the entire profits divided amongst the shareholders since the Company was formed. The reconstruction scheme seems to be formed on a very unfair basis so far as the Ordinary shares are concerned, for while the Preference and Ordinary shares stand on an equal footing as regards capital, the Preference shareholders are to get a cash bonus of 8s. and the par value of their shares, but the Ordinary shares are depreciated by 80 per cent. The only fair basis for reconstruction is to treat the shareholders as if the Company had gone into liquidation, when, after deducting all mortgages and outstanding debts, the net balance would be divided equally between Preference and Ordinary. In estimating the present value of the business, the former course of trying to keep up the inflated value of patents and goodwill (which must now be becoming rather stale and tending towards expiration) must be carefully avoided. The net average earnings of the Company, taking a bad year with a good one, will not, in my opinion, exceed, per annum, £40,000, out of which must be paid for redemption of debentures, £15,000, interest on same, £7,300, expenses of management and contingencies, say, £5,700, making £28,000; leaving for division among shareholders, £12,000. This would pay a dividend of 6 per cent. upon a capital of £200,000. I would suggest writing £600,000 off present capital, which would reduce the face value of the shares to £2. 10s. each, and I would adopt the recommendation of the Committee that all the shares should be Ordinary. As an equivalent to the share reduction, I would write off the sum of £594,218 appearing in the balance-sheet of 1895 for patents, goodwill, &c. The remaining £5,782 might be safely written off the Howard Torpedo, or otherwise, according to the judgment of the Directors. The error which the Directors and Committee have fallen into is that they think Preference shareholders are entitled to be paid dividends out of capital. Dividends, even to Preference shareholders, can only be paid out of profits, and where there are no profits, nor ever likely to be any (as this Company stands at present), they have no claim whatever. Is there not a possibility of some portion of the £3,920 paid for income-tax on reserve fund being recovered if applied for at once?

On the face of it, my correspondent has a serious grievance, and although it is not possible to proceed in the reconstruction from the point of view of the Ordinary shareholders alone, a modification in the reconstruction scheme would certainly appear to be called for. With reference to Motor Car flotations, I need hardly repeat the warnings which I have so often given. The industry has not yet arrived at a stage at which profits can be relied upon, the patents being altogether undeveloped and likely to be superseded by other inventions. I hear that the prospectus of the Minerva Nailless Horseshoe Company, Limited, will shortly be issued. At the inaugural dinner held at the Hotel Cecil last week some very favourable statements were made by men who are breeders of horses, or otherwise in a position to judge. It is rumoured that Messrs. Hampton & Sons will shortly be converted into a Limited Company. J. Edwards & Co., stock and share dealers, Talbot House, Arundel-street, London, W.C., are again to the front with their alluring prospectuses, in which the boast is made that they have closed twenty-two "operations" at profits ranging from $17\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. to $214\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Extracts from numerous letters, speaking favourably of the results of their "operations," are also given; but these would gain a great deal of force if the full names and addresses were attached.—Your affectionate Uncle, MOSES.

QUEER STORY.

PRISCILLA'S PROBOSCIS.

THE Misses Priscilla and Paulina Pastern were two very good-looking girls. The former was even beautiful; the latter might be more properly described as vivacious and pretty. Miss Paulina had a nose slightly tip-tilted, a mouth made to laugh with, roguish brown eyes, a dimpled chin, a pink and white complexion, and the most beautiful set of front teeth. Miss Priscilla was of a more sedate, statuesque type. Her eyes were sweet, but serious. Her mouth, beautifully shaped, but rather adapted for the sentimental than the humorous. Her chin was not dimpled, nor was her nose tip-tilted. They were the mouth and chin of a Greek goddess—chiselled on the lines which Phidias loved to embody in marble. Nor was the Parian stone itself clearer than Miss Priscilla's complexion. But it had one drawback.

It was a small drawback. To some it might seem hardly worth mentioning. Yet it made Miss Priscilla's existence a misery and her daily life a burden. That beautiful nose of hers—in spite of its Hellenic shape and Phidiasque proportions, that nose which usually was white and clear as the friezes of the Parthenon—was subject, in certain conjunctions, to spells of discolouration. At odd times, on various occasions—and those times and occasions always the most distressingly inconvenient—the marble hue of her nose would warm into a ruddy tinge; graduating in depth of colour adown the bridge, and shaded from a palish pink above to a hot and flaming purple at the tip.

Now many people when they happen not to be looking their best, when violent exercise has made their complexions spotty, or an ill-ventilated drawing-room has caused their eyes to appear dull and boiled, often remain in ignorance of the temporary disfigurement, and their happiness and self-appraisement are not thereby impaired. But, unfortunately for Miss Priscilla's peace of mind, she could never remain in ignorance. There were always present internal sensations to warn her of the external change. She first felt a mild sensation of warmth, a sort of tepid wave, begin to circulate through her nasal veins. From tepid, the wave grew warm; from warm, hot; from hot, boiling; until the blood felt to seethe and bubble in her nose, at a temperature well above 212 deg. Fahrenheit. And the more she was conscious of this distressing sensation, the more distressing and violent did the sensation become.

Miss Priscilla had sought medical advice; but had sought it in vain. A physician in Harley-street, at two guineas, had afforded her no more relief than had the family medical man at five shillings. The one had assigned the affection to indigestion; the other to tight lacing; and each had prescribed a treatment in accordance with his view. Miss Priscilla followed either set of regulations most faithfully. She abjured sugar, bon-bons, pastry, made dishes, port wine, tea, and a hundred other favourite foods; she consumed vast quantities of camomile, rhubarb, terebene, peppermint, sarsaparilla, and lactopeptine. But with no advantage. She bought stays three sizes too large for her, and even these she laced so loosely that the silken cords at the back, even at her fullest expansion, were never taut. She wore a waistband into which a moderate-sized coal-heaver might have inserted his fist. She even—for the physician had hinted that this might have something to do with it—she even gave up garters and adopted suspenders. But to no purpose. Her nose burned as heretofore.

Then, finding no alleviation from doctors, she took to doctoring herself with patent medicines. Innumerable well-advertised remedies became a part of her daily diet. Never did she perform a toilet without applying some highly advertised lotion to her nose. But they all failed. Whether compounded of arsenic, sulphur, milk, glycerine, honey, or oatmeal, they all failed. Whether costing half a guinea or a modest sixpence, they all failed. Miss Priscilla was reduced to a condition verging on despair.

To aggravate her misery, her own and only sister—the being who, by all natural laws, should have felt for her the most—evinced a shocking want of sympathy with Miss Priscilla. She would treat Priscilla's nose as a huge joke. It was to her a perennial source of amusement—something handy to laugh about when no other source of laughter presented itself. As surely as they went out together to a function, so surely did Priscilla say to her sister beforehand—"Now, Paulina, if my nose begins to burn, for Heaven's sake don't emphasise the fact by staring at me"; and, so surely as Priscilla's nose did begin to burn, Paulina invariably contrived to catch her eye, and then tapped the tip of her own snub proboscis in expressive pantomime. On these occasions poor Priscilla felt on the verge of insanity. To be conscious of looking horribly unbecoming—and sure the Venus of Milo herself would look unbecoming with a red nose—was bad enough. To have this consciousness aggravated by the antics of an unfeeling sister was almost intolerable. And many and many were the tears of rage that Miss Priscilla shed over it. But neither tears, nor rage—nor, for the matter of that, entreaty or high disdain—could induce the vivacious Paulina to abate her unsisterly conduct. The fact was, this sprightly young lady's sense of humour was extremely keen, and Priscilla's nose tickled it irresistibly.

Now, without in the least meaning to imply that the Misses Pastern were fishers of men, we must assert the simple historical fact that they entertained a natural and laudable desire to secure, each for herself, an eligible husband. It was in this matter, especially, that Priscilla's nose caused her the deepest chagrin. For never did she find herself in the company of a gentleman whose interest and admiration she particularly wished to excite, but her nasal veins invariably started to throb and burn; and doubtless they did so all the more because of her painful anxiousness to obviate this catastrophe. Viewed from a logical standpoint, and regard being had to the proper requisites of a good wife, the little affair of a nose's colour might reasonably be treated as immaterial. But reason and courtship have no inalienable affinity, and the eligible parti has yet to be discovered who will propose to a girl while her nose is burning a fiery purple before his eyes.

That this assertion is not made without the book, Miss Priscilla's experiences abundantly prove. Save for the one drawback of her discoloured nose—and that discolouration only temporary, fitful, intermittent—this charming girl had every quality of face, form, and manner that is most attractive to the opposite sex. Expressive eyes, a sweet mouth, a well-shaped head and neck, silky chestnut hair, a divine figure (when she found out that loose stays gave her no relief, she soon discarded them), an irreproachable foot and ankle. Her voice was soft and musical. She had a delightful, cooing laugh. She was modest—but not too modest; sympathetic—but not too sympathetic; innocent—but not too innocent. In fact, a man's girl to the very tips of her filbert nails.

And was all this to go for nothing just because of one trifling disorder? Was this whole galaxy of grace and beauty to be utterly outweighed in the scales by the trifling counterpoise of a few surcharged blood-vessels? Alas! it seemed so. And it seemed as if poor Miss Priscilla must make up her mind to the inevitable. For a week or two she did make up her mind to it. She let it be known among her friends that a tabby cat and a grey parrot would be the most acceptable presents they could make her on her approaching birthday. She left off going out. She embroidered half a chair back in crewels. She talked about taking up parish work. Perhaps she would actually have done so. But now an event happened which scattered her resignation to the winds; which drew her from her retirement, in a whirlwind of excitement and rivalry, determined to conquer or die in the fray matrimonial. The event was this. Paulina had become engaged to a baronet!

To be outstripped by a rival in any competition is irritating to any one; but most of all is it irritating to a girl in the competition for eligibles. And if the successful rival be a girl's own sister, it sensibly aggravates that girl's irritation. Not that Priscilla was jealous. Tut! what a ridiculous idea! Jealous of Paulina? Well, well! But Paulina was growing conceited and needed a lesson. It would do her good to learn that some girls can—if they like—marry as successfully as some other girls. Baronets were well enough. But there were bachelor peers about; and one bachelor peer had, before her retirement, shown signs of being smitten with Priscilla. What if she really exerted herself now and managed to secure him? He was distinctly eligible; a baron, of old creation, with a respectable estate. He was youngish; fairly good-looking; a smart man of the world. To be a baroness would be very nice. To put Paulina's nose out of joint would be nicer still.

The baron in question—anybody's baron at the present minute; but whom she determined to make Priscilla's—was Lord Morden. During the few weeks that he had known Miss Pastern, he had been attracted by her beauty; but only in a butterfly sort of way. For Lord Morden was not a marrying man. He valued himself on being a lady-killer, and prided himself immensely on his own looks and appearance. He was also very critical and exacting in his ideas of female beauty, and only cared to philander with those girls whose charms were exceptional. Before her retirement from Society, he had never happened to see Miss Priscilla with her nose badly a-burn. But, as ill-luck would have it, at the very first ball that she attended, after her re-entry, and while she was actually flirting with her (prospective) baron, that troublesome nose fell a-throbbing and a-tingling, and blushed its very deepest and most startling purple. In this condition her face was anything but prepossessing. My lord was a great stickler for complexion. He prided himself very particularly upon his own. And his æsthetic taste was instantly offended. Of course, he had sufficient breeding not to drop Miss Priscilla too suddenly; but drop her he ultimately did, to her deepest annoyance and chagrin. The chagrin would have been considerably enhanced, had she happened to hear a criticism on herself which his lordship expressed to his next flame. It was a cruel criticism. It was to the effect that Miss Pastern was one of those in whom "distance lends enchantment to the view."

But, though defeated in the matter of the baron, Priscilla had no intention of sitting down by Paulina's baronet. She was determined to marry, and to marry well. But she now understood clearly that, before she could conquer an eligible, she must conquer herself; and that a complete and crushing victory over her own proboscis was an essential preliminary of matrimonial success. But how was that to be achieved? She thought and thought, and schemed and schemed. At length one fine morning, unknown to any one, even to her own family, she slipped out and paid a visit to Mme. La Rougière, of Bond-street, whose advertisement, appearing weekly in the Queen, the Gentlewoman, and other ladies' journals, promises, on behalf of Madame, to make all and every complexion entrusted to her "a thing of beauty and a joy for ever."

Madame proved to be a fat and rather common personage who spoke with a Cockney accent, and interlarded her remarks with phrases Gallic in intention, though British in pronunciation. She seated Miss Priscilla in a big chair, examined her nose critically through a pocket microscope, and handled the feature freely with her podgy fingers.

"Ha," she pronounced, "Nothing wrong with the cuticle. No. It is one of these many cases of burning nose—nay broolant—which are brought to me almost daily. It is a most obstinate affection. Has Maddermoselle tried internal remedies?"

"Every possible concoction," said Miss Pastern. "And each as inefficacious as the other."

"Ha! well. There is only one really safe and certain course to pursue. And that is rather a concealment than a cure. Is Maddermoselle engaged—fiancey?" inquired La Rougière, with an odious, familar grin.

"No," said Priscilla, shortly.

"Ah, well—but Maddermoselle must not be offended—annoyay. Most young ladies who come to me come in order that they may succeed in finding husbands. Naturellyment. And to such as have burning noses—nays broolants—I advise one certain and sure course to be adopted—adoptay, until, at any rate, the husbands—marees—are secured."

"And what is that course?"

"To have the nose enamelled," said Madame, with something between a moue and a grin.

"And—and—can that be done so—so—as to defy detection?" inquired Miss Priscilla, anxiously.

"Yes; most certaingment. Young ladies—jewns demoselles—for whom I have done it, have told me that even when the fiancy's nose has touched theirs (and such things do happen with fiancys!" interpolated Madame, with a hateful smirk) "the enamel has escaped discovery. But one thing should be understood. The enamel needs frequent renewal. Maddermoselle should come here on each occasion previous to her balls or parties, and have her nose fresh enamellay.

"I am going to a ball to-morrow night," said Miss Pastern, after a minute's thought. "Shall I come to you to-morrow afternoon?"

"Tray bee-en. I have engagements from three to five-thirty. Will you come at five-thirty?"

"Yes," said Priscilla, rising to go.

"My fee for consultation is twelve and a half francs—ten shillings," Madame reminded her.

Priscilla paid the objectionable creature half a sovereign and departed.

Madame was a most repulsive person to be fingered by. But Priscilla could not help herself. It seemed the only way. And if she would conquer, she must be prepared to stoop.

Next afternoon, at the appointed time, Priscilla (on a pretext of buying gloves for the ball) repaired to the premises of Mme. La Rougière. She was rather before her time, and the commissionaire in the lobby requested her to step up into the waiting-room. The buttons at the head of the stairs would show her the way. Many important issues, witness the pages of history passim, have been known to hinge on the most trifling accidents. It was so in this case. And the accident was surely of an absurdly trifling kind. It was just the fact that the buttons happened to have run out for his tea. Not finding him at the head of the stairs, but thinking that she knew the way to the waiting-room from her previous visit, Priscilla opened a door on her right and went in. As a matter of fact, the waiting-room lay just opposite, on the left; and the room which she had entered was the operating chamber of Mme. La Rougière.

Madame was, at this minute, in the act of operating. Her patient was a gentleman. She had just completed the first part of her process—the careful cleaning off of some old cosmetique—and the gentleman's real face was now ruthlessly revealed. It was an unprepossessing face—pale, putty-coloured, blotchy. For a minute Priscilla failed to recognise the owner of that highly undesirable complexion. Then the truth dawned on her. She recognised the head, the moustache, the features; above all, the eyes, now fixed upon her own in a horrified stare. The putty-skinned man, with the spotty complexion, was indeed her own faithless admirer—my Lord of Morden!

MUSIC.

THE FEES OF OPERA SINGERS.

THE squabbles among the various members of both opera companies now in the United States are chiefly interesting as throwing some light upon the fees which some of these spoilt darlings of the public are, or are supposed to be, paid. There is, it is true, a sceptical impression abroad that an operatic vocalist occasionally has two contracts—one for the benefit of the newspaper paragraphists, who must dabble in sensation, and another, on a more modest scale, with the manager himself, for real business. So much is this the fact that as to one of the Christine Nilsson contracts, which her first husband, M. Rouzeaud, thought himself capable of making without the intervention of her astute but costly agent, the late Henry Jarrett; old Maurice Strakosch, her then manager, stoutly declared, with his hand on his heart, that he believed her salary should be reckoned by dollars instead of pounds; while his brother Max was not so sure that the figures did not refer to francs. But, as a rule, even when temper runs high, there is a sort of unwritten law that the game must be played, and neither party must contradict the statements as to artists' fees, as those often fanciful figures are given by the paragraphists. It is, therefore, quite possible that the sums mentioned as those contracted to be paid to certain vocalists, some of whom are eminent, while of others their very names are unfamiliar either in England or the United States, are derived from the newspaper rather than the genuinely business contract. Even, however, after making due allowances for exaggeration, it is pretty certain that the business of directing an opera season is by no means, as the saying runs, "a game of marbles." M. Jean de Reszke, as we learn from a letter signed by Madame Nordica, and published in the American papers, receives in New York the bagatelle of £240 a night plus a share of the gross receipts when they exceed a certain sum. M. Jean de Reszke admits the soft impeachment, but declares that this is the salary he has always received in New York, and that the sum has never been raised. He repels Madame Nordica's suggestion that he has been paid as much as £800 a night, and asserts upon his honour that the highest amount he ever received was £600 for one evening at Boston. The protest is amusing. But even a fee of £240 a night (with collaterals) will tend to explain why eminent operatic tenors can afford huge estates in Poland, with castles and racing studs.

Mme. Melba, it appears from Mme. Nordica (and I do not suppose Mme. Melba will care to contradict her), receives £240 a night, and this sum, we know, she has asked for England next year. Mme. Calvé, according to Mme. Nordica, manages to support life on £280 a night, and thus, besides the indispensable castle, can also indulge in a farm, which, as everybody knows, costs rather more than a yacht. Mme. Nordica herself was to receive £200 nightly, although as Mr. Grau has explained she had consented to give a certain number of concert performances gratuitously, which slightly reduced the fee. Mr. Grau, however, honestly adds that, when news arrived of Frau Klafsky's death, Madame's terms went up like a balloon; I suppose for the same reason that if Mr. Lloyd were to carry out his scheme of threatened retirement, Mr. Ben Davies might keep a horse instead of a bike. Passing to Mr. Mapleson's company, it seems, from formal letters written to the American papers as to their reasons for suddenly leaving the Imperial Opera Troupe, that Mme. Harielée Darclée, the soprano, and Signor De Marchi, the tenor, were to receive the one £220 and the other £180 a night. Mr. Mapleson does not contradict the figures. A certain sum was paid the artists before they left Europe, and the matter in dispute is whether this amount was a guarantee, or the payment for a few performances in advance. This is, of course, mere academical argument, although the fact that these singers (unknown by the way, to England) can afford to throw up an income which an archbishop might envy, indicates the strength of the artistic position.

It is, indeed, a mere matter of arithmetic to estimate the nightly receipts opera directors must command who have to pay such high salaries. For example, on the first night of the New York opera season, "Faust" was given with M. Jean de Reszke at £240, Mme. Melba at £240, M. Edouard de Reszke at £120, and M. Lassalle at £100; while the band and chorus were estimated to cost at least £250, so that the expenses were nearly £1,000 before the curtain was raised, to say nothing of the fees of the Siebel, the Brander, and the conductor, the cost of music, dresses, scenery, and so forth. The fees of artists are annually increasing, and, indeed, cynics insist that the voice of a prima donna or of a great tenor is treated by its owner like wine, its value materially enhancing as the article grows older. Before long, indeed, we shall probably again arrive at the position in which opera was found at the break up of 1884, when, owing mainly to the extravagant salaries paid by the late Mr. Abbey in America, opera in London became practically impossible until a new company of younger and less expensive vocalists had been formed.

Last week I was able to publish a letter from the well-known song composer, Mr. Jacques Blumenthal, in reference to the name "Blumenthal" printed by Mr. George Cottle (or Lansdowne Cottell) in the list of teachers at his London Conservatoire of Music. I remarked then "perhaps now I shall hear from M. Riviere, Mr. Plowitz (Cavour), Messrs. Jewson, Maycock, and T. Harper, Dr. J. M. Bentley, and others." I do not know whether these gentlemen really wish it to be understood that they are connected with this delectable Conservatoire. But Mr. Plowitz, at any rate, has very properly disclaimed, and the following letter which I have received from him will throw a curious light upon the crooked methods adopted by the Porchester-road gentleman in drawing up his so-called List of Professors:—

> I am surprised to find that my name has already been mentioned twice in your valuable paper in connection with Mr. Cottell's Conservatoire. When I came to London years ago quite as a stranger, I received (before I started "Concert Direction Ernest Cavour"), one day a letter from Mr. Cottell, in which he asked me to call. Not knowing at the time anything about the different London schools of music I called there, and was offered by Mr. Cottell the conductorship of his orchestra, with a comparatively good salary. On returning home, I spoke to some of my new English friends, and I wrote the same evening that I would not accept any appointment at this school. Since then I have never seen Mr. Cottell or his Conservatoire, nor have I ever given any lessons at the London Conservatoire. I should be much obliged if you would kindly publish this letter.

Under these very candidly-stated circumstances, it seems to me a piece of impudence for Mr. Cottell to insert Mr. Plowitz's name in the latest editions of his prospectus now being distributed. Mr. Plowitz is therein mentioned as a teacher of harmony, composition, and counterpoint, and also as a teacher of the pianoforte, while Mme. Plowitz is down as a teacher of solo singing.

I have also received the following very proper letter from Messrs. W. S. Riley & Son, whose premises in Corporation-street are advertised in Mr. Cottell's prospectuses as the "Birmingham and Midland Districts Branch" of the London Conservatoire:—

> After reading the correspondence relating to Mr. Cottell, we gather therefrom that he is employing methods that are somewhat open to objection. Prior to this we knew absolutely nothing regarding Mr. Cottell, nor were we aware that he was the subject of considerable correspondence in the columns of your paper. Our transactions with him have been simply these:—A short time ago he applied to us for a teaching-room, and we agreed to let him one of our rooms, which were built exclusively for this object. We may here mention that this is a general thing with us, and other teachers are using rooms here for similar purposes. We do not, however, accept any responsibility whatsoever, regarding them or the methods they may employ. Assuming the charges brought against Mr. Cottell to be correct, it has been a matter for our serious consideration, and we have decided to request him to obtain a room elsewhere. We shall be obliged by your publishing this in extenso in your next issue, so that our position in the matter may be clearly defined.

I have not, by the way, yet received any communication from several eminent ladies and gentlemen whose names are mentioned in Mr. Cottell's prospectus under the omnibus title of "Committee, Patrons, and Subscribers to the Concerts" of the London Conservatoire of Music. As these noble and other names undoubtedly form an incentive to young people to pay their money to the Conservatoire, either as so-called "free" scholars or as "secretaries," it is highly desirable that the "Committee, Patrons, and Subscribers to the Concerts" should explain their real connection, if any, with an institution of which so much has been said by various correspondents in TRUTH during the past few weeks. Mrs. Ronalds, particularly, is so well known in musical life, that her name might be supposed to be a guarantee of the worth of the institution. I can hardly imagine that either this honoured lady or Lord and Lady Carrington, Lord Battersea, Lord N. de Rothschild, the Duchess of Wellington, the Countess of Strafford, Canon Harford, Sir W. T. Marriott, Lady Altman, Lady Miles, or Lady Jane Kenny-Herbert will particularly appreciate their names being used in connection with this London Conservatoire of Music, after reading the tolerably full account of it published in TRUTH on November 12.

Mr. Lansdowne Cottell will, by the way, have an opportunity of telling his own story of the Conservatoire and the "free" scholars, in the witness-box next Tuesday week at the Marylebone County-court.

Over forty concerts have been given in London during the past week, some of them of considerable importance. The autumn season, however, is approaching its close, although the Christmas recess promises to be a comparatively short one, and the portentous news has been published that at Queen's Hall alone there are 700 "bookings" ahead. One of the best attended concerts last week was for the enormously long Beethoven programme given by Mr. Eugene d'Albert. Many pianists could doubtless play five Beethoven's sonatas at a sitting, but few of them, like the young Scottish pianist, can invest them with special interest. At Herr Sauer's recital on the following day the chief works were Brahms' sonata in F minor, very finely played, and a selection of pieces of display. The encore system at this concert attained its reductio ad absurdum. There were a couple of encores in the course of the programme, but at the end of the concert the pianist sat down to an apparently fresh recital. There were certainly three further encores before I left the Hall. How many occurred afterwards I am unaware.

There were eleven concerts last Wednesday, besides a performance of Cimorosa's "Matrimonio Segreto," by some students Dvorak's new string quartet in G op. 105, presented by Mr. Gompertz, is rather an unequal composition, the slow movement of which is apparently the best. Dvorak, however, just now seems to be writing too much. At the Guildhall School Mr. Cummings has directed the first student's orchestral concert given for some years. I am not going to criticise this performance, save to say that Miss Maude Clough showed very great promise as a vocalist, and that the young gentleman who tried "Let Me Like a Soldier Fall" had apparently endeavoured to adopt the provincial reading of the song. He has a good voice, but needs a better style. Mr. Laurence Kellie has given a successful vocal recital at which several of his own songs were heard, the audience being largely composed of ladies. Mr. D'Albert made his final appearance this season at the Popular Concert on Saturday, playing Schumann's Fantasia in C, and, of course an encore piece. On Sunday he left for Germany. The symphony in F minor, written by Richard Strauss when that now very advanced composer was a young musician of seventeen, was produced for the first time in England at the Crystal Palace on Saturday. It is redolent of Schumann and even of Mendelssohn rather than of Liszt and Wagner, the two composers whom Strauss now chiefly affects. On Monday Lady Halle and Signor Piatti made their first appearance this season at the Popular Concerts, taking part in Dvorak's quartet in F on American negro themes. But the audience was small, and, indeed, the Monday Popular Concerts seem in public estimation to take second rank to the Saturday Pops.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Youth, I am bound to admit, has its compensations. Not the least of these is a powerful mental digestion. This fact has been made clear to me by the necessity I have been under of executing your commission and making a selection from the Christmas volumes provided by the publishers for your juvenile friends. The consequence is that I am afflicted with a severe mental dyspepsia. I am absolutely surfeited with incident. Nearly all the writers of boys' books have come to the conclusion that the average boy requires incident, and each has set himself seriously to work to supply the demand. One and all have succeeded. Buccaneers and pirates have shed their "dreadful" form, and present themselves in brave array of crimson and gold. Midshipmites and privateersmen fight and conquer in every quarter of the globe. Indians don their war paint unabashed, and English boys hold their own at all times against overwhelming odds. Never was there such a glorification of juvenile jingoism. Yet the one man who, of all others, perhaps, is best able to hold a youthful audience in thrall, has chosen to give his story a comparatively quiet background (1). An ancient tin-mine, unworked within the memory of man, situated near a village on the Cornish coast, and within easy reach of two boys, is quite sufficient for Mr. G. Manville Fenn's purpose in the making of one of the most attractive books for boys that was ever written. For all the quiet setting, there is in it, however, no lack of adventure, while the reality of the two boy heroes is undeniable. But to turn to those who are bound to reap success by less legitimate, if equally amusing means.

I find, first of all, a large number of stories of the sea. Of such I can confidently recommend Mr. Hume Nisbet's contribution to seasonable fiction (2). There is no vulgar realism about it. There are two heroes, both boys until the end of the book, when the stronger of the two, a veritable prince among pirates, satisfies the exigencies of romance by an acknowledgment of maidenhood. It is only in cold blood that one dares question the probabilities of Mr. Nisbet's situations, in which plenty of reckless rollicking rovers, handsome, chivalrous, dauntless, wallowing in wealth and blood, and doating on danger, are always on hand. The story will do for boys to whom the improbable is far more attractive than the actual.

Slightly more chastened in style is a narrative of the adventures of a young gentleman of good family, one Jack Ballister (3). This youth had the good fortune to be kidnapped at the instance of a wicked uncle and carried off to the Virginian plantations in the year 1719. Nor did his good fortune end at that. He fell in with a famous pirate, Captain Edward Treach, otherwise known as Blackbeard, out of whose hands he successfully rescued the inevitable fair maiden. The boy is not yet born who will not envy him; and if, as I fancy, this is Mr. Howard Pyle's first contribution to boy's literature, he is to be congratulated upon a most successful effort. A still quieter, more boyish, story is one chronicling the events which occur to Jack Vernon, naval cadet, upon his first voyage aboard H.M.S. Candahar (4). The "heathen Chinee" in this instance supplies the decorative background for the thrilling experiences, while the life on board ship gives opportunity for plenty of more humorous incidents than accompany mere fighting. Yet fighting, when it is as productive as that which falls to the lot of another of the season's heroes, one George Bowen by name, is not to be read without envy. The time of the story (5) is the first decade of the nineteenth century, and the occasion of the fitting out of the privateer in which the heroic George performs innumerable deeds of valour is the Napoleonic wars. Nothing can withstand him. All that the sea can offer in the way of adventure he endures, and his crowning reward, after capturing a belated Spanish galleon laden with 800 ingots of solid gold of the trifling weight of half a hundredweight each, and roughly valued at three millions sterling, is the offer of a commission in the Royal Navy. There must needs be plenty of thrills in a narrative of this sort, and there is not a dry chapter from start to finish. The same may be said of Mr. Ascott R. Hope's story of school and holiday life (6). Salt breezes blow through its pages, and it is an eminently healthy book for the boy of twelve. Another thoroughly delightful story for boys of the same age is "The First Cruise of Three Middies" (7), in which, without undue sensationalism, and also without sickly sentimentality, there is to be found any amount of breezy adventure amongst the slavers and pirates on the African and China stations. Finally, I am glad to notice that this year Mr. Henty has made a contribution to the stock of stories of the sea with a chronicle of the adventures that fall to the lot of a youthful follower of Lord Cochrane (8). His hero has a full share of that ill-balanced Admiral's feats of daring on behalf of the oppressed nationalities of South America, with a considerable addition on his own account. There is no need to question Mr. Henty's facts. His work is always conscientious. Sometimes it seems to have been almost painfully so, but in this book at least there is no halting for technical descriptions of battle-fields. It is full of entertainment from cover to cover, and quite one of the best of the long series which has made Mr. Henty's name familiar in every British household. So much for jackets of blue. When the youthful hero dons a coat of red, Mr. Henty is again well to the fore. I already begin to foresee the day when he will have told all the stories of the manifold British wars, and the list of his books will have an additional value as a complete historical catalogue. This year he has added three to the list. One is a story of the first Burmese war (9). It is not quite Kipling's conception of life "East of Suez," but still there is plenty of country colour and a vivid glance into the life of the Italians of the East. A second (10) deals with the Zulu and Boer wars in 1879 and 1881. Yet a third (11), a capital type of the military historical romance, tells the story of the life of a young English esquire in France during the earlier portion of the long and bloody feud between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy, a feud which had a brief intermission, during which the combined factions met defeat at Agincourt by vastly inferior British forces. Naturally Mr. Henty's hero was there; on occasions like this it is absolutely essential that he should be present, and no boy to whom this book is presented will ever regret the fact. A thoroughly good romance, again, is to be found in "The Emperor's Englishmen" (12). This individual is a veritable glutton as regards fighting, and he will dispose of his four Russians before breakfast with a facility which even D'Artagnan would have envied. It is no wonder, therefore, that he manages to gain distinction in the service of his master, the Czar Paul, successor to the great Catherine. As if to show his versatility, the author of this romance has selected South Africa as the scene of a second book (13). It is of altogether a different type. Lions and Matabele keep the energies of the twins who venture amongst them pretty fully employed, and even Selous would have to look to his laurels when these youthful hunters are abroad on the veldt. In case, however, South African affairs should seem stale to the palate of your young friends, there is yet plenty of choice of adventure amongst more unknown races and less explored countries. Mr. Mansford, for instance, has broken entirely new ground by a story of adventure amongst the Nagas (14). These inhabitants of Assam are savage enough to make life amongst them as precarious as the most hardened adventurer could desire, and the exploits of the Englishmen who went amongst them, fought under their banner, and brought back a great store of rubies as their prize, leave the reader almost breathless. Then tempted by the success of their "Orchid Seekers" in Borneo last season, the authors have been led to supplement the story by a second. Sequels are not invariably successful, but there is no doubt, fortunately, about this one (15). The search for the floral treasures of Costa Rica is interrupted by a multiplicity of hairbreadth escapes. The orchid seekers fight shoulder to shoulder with the prototype of Dr. Jameson's raiders, the Falange Americana, under William Walker. They incur unheard-of perils at the hands of the Guatuso wild men of the woods, but they come scatheless through everything, and add numerous specimens to the list of known orchids. No boy will be ungrateful for this most interesting narrative. Nor will any one be inclined to regret the fact that Mr. Kirk Munroe has chosen to rescue the Indian from the decadence into which, fictionally, as well as actually, he has fallen. In a charming story (16) he narrates the events of the Seminole war, which was undertaken by the United States in 1835. A healthier book could not be given to any boy, and not the least attractive feature is the sympathy for the oppressed and cheated red men with which the whole story is instinct. To turn to an altogether different type of romance, let me commend to your notice the translations of Jules Verne's works which Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. have prepared (17). Any of these are sure of a welcome, and the edition has the advantage of being both cheap and handy. Further, a budget of good things is to be found in the volume with which Mr. Gordon Stables appeals to his admirers. The story has a quiet setting, but nevertheless there is no lack of incident. I imagine that out of this list you should have no difficulty in suiting the tastes of each of your adventurous young friends; but if you still doubt, let me recommend to you one of those handsome volumes edited by Mr. Miles (19), without which to a good many boys Christmas would seem incomplete. There is in the 500 pages every variety of adventure. Mr. Miles has also prepared a companion volume for girls, equally crammed with good things (20). Finally, for your own edification, let me commend to your notice a book which, though primarily intended for boys, is not without interest to their parents (21). Of the making of prigs in fiction there is no end; but the author of this little book has chosen to describe the unmaking of one, and to those to whom the only child is a little god, and their name is legion, the book may be said to have an educative value. —Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—You have no idea how very Christmassy the West End of London looks. The streets are filled with people, and as to the roadways, there are blocks in the traffic just as though it were the height of the season.

I shall be so rejoiced when the motor cars come really in. Oh, the poor horses! Just before Christmas is their worst time of all in London, and probably in all other cities and large towns, and the roads are often very slippery with early frosts and late. I saw one poor animal down at the Marble Arch the other day, a man in an extensively skirted overcoat sitting on its head. I wonder the horse was not suffocated. As to the overloaded drays and vans, there is plenty for some practical philanthropist to do in making it illegal for any dealers, coal-merchants included, to overload their horses. It is cruel to the drivers as well, adding immensely to the trouble and anxiety involved in their day's work, and often lengthening it far into the night. When a horse falls under a heavy load it is not always a very easy matter to get it up again, and the poor animal must be more or less demoralised by the fright and the shaking.

Richard says that the horrid smell of petroleum is the chief objection to the motor cars he has seen. If some clever person were to invent a means of deodorising it, what a huge fortune he would make!

I saw such a sweet frock in Bond-street on Saturday. The skirt was cloth in a military scarlet, bordered with brown fur. Over this fell a complete overskirt, in silver-grey camel-hair vicugna, caught together at the back, so that a touch lifted the whole of it, displaying the vivid red of the underskirt, which was full walking length, but did not touch the ground. I suppose the upper grey was really a polonaise. A short sacque sealskin fell straight to the hips back and front, and had long leg-of-mutton sleeves. The hat was grey felt with black and scarlet trimmings.

They have had such a good idea at 68, New Bond-street, the home of the 4,711 Eau de Cologne, in shaping small scent bottles in a curved form to suit the waistcoat pocket, and filling them with perfume. The girls have discovered that they just fit in to their coat pockets, and as they are stoppered with the little screw caps that let out a drop or two at a time, these tiny bottles are well suited to crowded assemblies, railway carriages, and so on, where the atmosphere is apt to become heavy and disagreeable.

Another good idea is that of making half-sized tablets of the best soaps. In country houses, where guests often stay only a couple of days at the week-end, large tablets must constantly be wasted, as fresh soap must be provided for each comer. Consequently, the dainty little ones are much appreciated by châtelaines who look to the ways of their household. Besides, the small size is much more graspable, to coin a word. The large one is very slippery, and are apt to shoot out of a tiny hand, and, after much noise and rattling of soap-dishes and sponge-basins, to ensconce themselves invisibly in some corner, almost as inaccessible as a modern pocket.

Lettuce soap is among the most delightful for the skin, being very soothing and comforting in extremes of heat and cold. "Au suc de Laitue" is its technical name. Almond-cream soap is another non-irritant preparation, and is liked by men for shaving with. Rose and Lettuce is yet another. Does not the name sound nice? A little change in spelling would suggest two girls in a garden of long ago.

A demand has arisen for the old-fashioned musk soap, and this is put up in boxes containing four tablets. Another Oriental favourite is Turkish rose, but this is very costly, being perfumed with attar of roses, the decoction that, when well made, is said to cost in production a guinea a drop.

The newest perfume is Carnation. Maréchal Neil has become a favourite; but to my idea there is nothing so delightful as the Rhine Violets. Beautiful sachets and cases for perfumes have been prepared for Christmas presents, the former in flower-painted satin, the latter in leather, satin-lined. In these any choice of perfumes may be obtained, or, if preferred, only one kind is put up in them. In the same way the soaps can be assorted—rose, violet, and lily, or otherwise, just as the purchaser orders.

Clare, who loves violets, is busy by the fire making little silk sachets to hold some powder that she bought during our examination of all these dainty things. I prefer heliotrope, and Bee inclines to roses and lilies, but can never decide which she likes best.

We looked in at the lovely show of rare Oriental china now on at Duveen's, in Bond-street. Most of it was the property of Mr. Orrock, the well-known collector. I am not at all learned in this branch of art, but, like most other people, I know what I like. Masses of blue and white china always appear to me to be rather chilly in effect, but this accusation could scarcely be brought against the lovely things shown in cases on a third floor room at this well-known art collector's. Some hawthorn jars with the graceful blossoms straying over the blue background, are among the most valuable in the whole. Something like £1,000 were paid for five pieces.

"Long Eliza" seems an odd name for china. It comes somehow from the Dutch who were the first nation to trade with the Celestial Empire. It is now a well-known technical term for very fine china. That which we saw on Friday consisted of tall vases with a blue and white background, some set with plaques of famille rose, others with famille verte, the background being brightened with a straying design in gold. A vase with lovely pinks warm and sunny, with brown stems and a few pale yellow flowers on a ground of ivory white is a very costly specimen of the famille rose. Close by on a chimney-piece is a quaint old vase, with flat sides, showing pictures in panels on a dull blue ground. An immense blue jar is in the double aster pattern.

This is the finest collection known of blue and white china. The most valuable of the whole is a set in tiger-lily design. A group of five vases in the double aster pattern is also of great value. I wish you could go to see for yourself these beautiful things. I fell deeply in love with a set of famille verte cups and saucers in eggshell china. Two large dishes, one painted with a design representing a Chinese wedding, are the finest known. The figures are beautifully executed, and the composition of the whole might give some of our impressionist artists points, though probably they would disdain to avail themselves of any hints from so far an antiquity.

I have often wanted to tell you about the Red Spider Association, a benevolent little society which styles itself "The Ladies' Work Order Association." The object is to assist women of small income to obtain a fair sale for their work, giving them the full benefit, with the exception of the necessary charges for postage. You may not, at the first glance, understand all this implies; but I could, if I would, enlighten you as to the very different methods pursued by some other Associations which deal with women's work, and under whose management a very small portion of the ultimate price reaches the pockets of those who are supposed to be most benefited. The principle of the "Red Spider" is to obtain orders for work, not to offer articles already made, with the inevitable consequent loss. There is no entrance-fee, and the ladies have not to buy their own materials. When an order is given out, all that is necessary to complete it is handed over to the worker. The only deductions from the payments consist of one penny in the shilling. To give you some idea of the variety and character of the skilled labour employed, I may mention the darning and repairing of linen, mending and cleaning old lace, miniature painting, restoring pictures and marqueterie, mending fans and old china, beginning fancy work for ladies and finishing the same, besides the usual embroidery. A sale is to be held at Mrs. Hugh Bonham Carter's house, 53, Rutland Gate, on Monday next, when the Red Spiders hope to get some people to look for their Christmas gifts among the work done by the ladies. If you know anybody likely to be in London on that day you may tell them that they are certain to find both pretty and cheap articles for presents, and if you want any of your old lace mended you cannot do better than send it to the headquarters of the Association, the address being the same as the above.

I think you will agree with me that this "Mincemeat and Rice Méringue" is delicious, and particularly suited to people who cannot eat pastry:—

Throw 3 oz. of Carolina rice into 1 pint of boiling milk, add a piece of cinnamon, replace the lid, and simmer the rice for two hours. Now take it from the fire, remove the cinnamon, and work in the yolks of 3 eggs, 1 oz. of butter, and 1 oz. of pounded sugar. Line a fancy fire-proof dish 1 in. thick with the rice, put ¾ lb. of mincemeat in the centre, cover with the remainder of the rice, and bake the pudding in a moderate oven for half an hour. Whip the whites of the 3 eggs to a stiff froth, and mix it carefully and lightly with 3 tablespoonfuls of fine sugar, cover the pudding with the méringue, and return it to the oven to bake a delicate brown colour.

Try these "Paupiettes of Venison à la Windsor." It is an entirely new and original dish:—

Trim the fillet of a loin or a neck of venison into pieces 2 in. long and 1 in. thick, sauté them with a couple of minced shalots, a table-spoonful of chopped parsley, a sprig of thyme and a piece of butter, then remove from the fire. Meanwhile, cut a firm savoy cabbage in halves and parboil it for five minutes in salted boiling water, lift it on to a sieve and run cold water on until it is quite cold, drain it on a cloth, separate the leaves, cut out the Obesity.—The happy knack of forming a symmetrical contour and a perfect foundation for a well-setting gown is the especial art of Mesdames Sykes, Josephine, & Co., Anatomical Corsetières, 280, Regent-street, Oxford-circus, London, W.

It has been remarked over and over again that, for Autumn and Winter wear, a lady never looks better and more suitably clad than in a Redfern Gown. Messrs. Redfern's New Models are now ready. Inspection invited.—26, Conduit-street, W.

stem and envelope a piece of the venison in each one, secure them with thread and place them, in an upright position, on slices of bacon in a stewpan, add a couple of shalots, a bouquet of herbs, 2 cloves, 6 peppercorns, a blade of mace, and sufficient stock to nearly cover the paupiettes. Bring the stewpan to the boil on the stove, then place it in the oven to simmer for two hours. Now fry a minced shalot and a slice of minced lean bacon with a piece of butter in a stewpan, mix in a dessert-spoonful of potato-flour and the stock from the paupiettes, which must be perfectly free from fat, stir until boiling, then add a dessert-spoonful of red-currant jelly, a glass of port wine, the juice of half a small lemon, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and a little salt. When the sauce is well boiled, squeeze through the tammy and return it to the paupiettes to warm, remove the thread, arrange them on a hot dish and pour the sauce round.

These "Croûts with Oysters" are very dainty, and suitable either for a luncheon dish or as a savoury:—

Blanch a dozen or more good oysters, strain, and remove the beards. Reduce the liquor by boiling to half its original quantity; then mix it with two tablespoonfuls of good white sauce, add a cream, a pinch of salt, a pinch of cayenne pepper, a dessert-spoonful of chopped parsley, and a squeeze of lemon juice. Cut six or seven round pieces of bread from a tin loaf, about ½ in. thick and 2 in. in diameter; make an incision with a round cutter three parts through the bread and ¼ in. from the edge. Fry the crouts a delicate colour in a little butter; drain, and remove the centre piece with the soft interior. Dissolve 1 oz. of butter in a stewpan and break in 4 eggs, season with salt and pepper, and stir briskly over the fire until the egg thickens. Now place one large or two small oysters in the centre of each of the fried crouts, moisten with a little of the sauce, cover with a spoonful of the buttered eggs, and dust them with a pinch of Marshall's coralline pepper. Arrange them in a circle on a hot dish, and pour the sauce round.

Chatto & Windus's New Books.

CYNTHIA: a Daughter of the Philistines.

By Leonard Merrick, Author of "This Stage of Fools," &c. 2 vols. 10s. net.; and at every Library.

"The record of Humphrey Kent's literary failures and monetary shifts is varied and interesting, and his exploits in the character of a 'ghost' will probably be entirely novel to a good many readers. The moral lapse and its sequel are very delicately handled, and three interesting varieties of human nature — Humphrey, Cynthia, and the Other Woman — are admirably delineated."—Scotsman.

"Great with a greatness alike of conception, of arrangement, and of language. . . . From the wealth of rich achievement and richer promise that is in this posthumous volume, it is impossible to draw any other conclusion than that the finished 'Weir of Hermiston' would have been the supremest outcome of its author's genius, a book to be numbered among the few precious books of the century."—Daily Mail.

THE ROYAL CHRISTOPHER.

By Justin H. McCarthy, Author of "A London Legend." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

REVENGE!

By Robert Barr, Author of "A Woman Intervenes," &c. With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 6s.

"Let me recommend to the bored, and the sleepless, and the problem-racked, a pretty collection of stories, 'Revenge!' Mr. Barr's ingenuity in inventing horrors of every complexion that could be credited to the desperate motive announced in the title is altogether remarkable. There is no bungling throughout the collection; they are all clever stories."—Sketch.

BARKER'S LUCK,

And other Stories. By Bret Harte. With 39 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"Much in the present volume contains what Bret Harte can give us in perfection—studies of character abounding in those unforeseen touches of insight that reveal a tender and beautiful humanity surviving in lawless natures that have gone to wreck; genial humour, his surpassing touch in descriptive passages—all are to be found here. . . . It is a very good specimen of the master's art."—Daily News.

DEVIL'S FORD,

A Millionaire of Rough-and-Ready, and Snowbound at Eagle's. By Bret Harte. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Bret Harte is always delightful, and often fascinating. . . . In 'Devil's Ford, &c.' the author seems to us to have been very happily inspired, and the book is as strong, as vivid, as brilliantly dramatic as anything he has lately done. . . . The true glamour of romance illumines these delightful pages. . . . Our readers must acquaint themselves at first hand with this admirable specimen of Mr. Bret Harte's virile genius."—Speaker.

A CAPFUL O' NAILS: a North-Country Story.

By David Christie Murray, Author of "Joseph's Coat." Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"There is an intensity of feeling about the story, with a purpose that very often fulfils the same function as art. The story of the agitation is told with all Mr. Christie Murray's fidelity to life and vivacity of description. He has produced a wonderfully realistic and pathetic romance of English life."—Morning Leader.

IN THE KINGDOM OF KERRY,

And Other Stories. By B. M. Croker, Author of "Diana Barrington," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A fascinating volume of short stories, slight and simple in point of plot, admirable in style. Mrs. Croker writes with sympathy, knowledge, and conviction; and this, her latest effort, will add to a reputation that is already well advanced."—Vanity Fair.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY VIGNETTES.

By Austin Dobson. In THREE SERIES, each complete in itself. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. each.

"The characteristic of Mr. Dobson appears to be a singular power of perception and appreciation. It would be difficult to name another contemporary critic with such nicety of observation, and with such a happy faculty of discovering and pointing out the peculiar merits of works well known to all, but in which Mr. Dobson is able to point out some fresh beauties or a new charm of thought or expression."—Athenæum.

MIGHT HAVE BEEN: Some Life Notes.

By Dr. Joseph Parker. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Dr. Parker has the inestimable faculty of saying a great deal in the briefest possible compass. This new book of his is a collection of pithy, miscellaneous notes, in which he touches upon all manner of topics and personalities, from Her Majesty the Queen to the friendly policeman, from Henry Ward Beecher to Sir Henry Irving, from George Eliot to John Oliver Hobbes. The book, which is full of genial charity, is one that may be taken up at any odd moment and always enjoyed."—Daily Mail.

DIARY OF A CITIZEN OF PARIS DURING "THE TERROR."

By Edmond Biré. Translated by John de Villiers. With Photogravure Frontispieces. 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth extra, 21s.

"The two handsome volumes before us purport to be the diary of a citizen of Paris during 'The Terror.' M. Biré's work is, therefore, a history of the French Revolution from the convocation of the National Convention until the fall and execution of the leaders of the Gironde. The vast amount of material at the author's disposal can be imagined, yet we venture to assert that there is not an unnecessary line, not a suspicion of padding in these tomes. They give a life-like, breathing picture of the most grotesquely terrible epoch in the history of modern times. . . . For every entry in his diary this conscientious citizen gives chapter and verse for his information, derived for the most part from the daily newspapers of the time, or from the minutes of the Convention. Not the most microscopic detail escapes being labelled with its reference. The imposing list of authorities quoted guarantees the research ads the labour of the historian. . . . . M. Biré has given us a work which, in these days of shallow impressions and histories churned out while you wait, we should receive with gratitude. It is scholarly without being pedantic; it in picturesque without being inaccurate. It can be consulted as a text-book and read as a romance. The English translation is excellent."—Pall Mall Gazette.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

TWO VERY SUCCESSFUL NOVELS.

THE CAREER OF CANDIDA. By George Paston, Author of "A Study in Prejudices." Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph says: "One of the most robust and refreshing stories of the fast waning years. It tackles more than one thorny social problem with admirable courage, and challenges Mrs. Grundy to mortal encounter, but there is not the least verbal offence in it, not even to the most priggish of novel readers."

THE STORY OF ALINE. By Mrs. Edward Ridley. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mr. Andrew Lang says: "'The Story of Aline' comes to me as a happy surprise, a thing rich not only in promise, but in fulfilment, and endowed with a rare poetic quality."

CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., LONDON.

BICYCLE GYMKHANA and MUSICAL RIDES, by Major Walter Wingfield, the Inventor of Lawn Tennis, with Diagrams and Instructions how to Arrange and Practice them.—To be obtained from the Author, 100, Buckingham Palace-road, London, and all Booksellers, price 5s. net.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

"As we have said more than once, Messrs. Digby, Long, & Co. have earned for themselves a reputation as publishers of high-class fiction."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

NEW NOVEL BY THE PRINCESS DE BOURG.

1. THE AMERICAN HEIRESS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Aberdeen Press (First Review) says:—"One of the most delightful female characters in recent fiction; Kitty Fauntleroy is, indeed, a creation. The story is a refreshingly healthy one."

2. A WOMAN'S CROSS. By Mrs. Alice M. Diehl. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. Second Edition.

"Far above the average of modern novels, and should undoubtedly be inquired for—and read."—St. James's Budget.

NEW SENSATIONAL NOVEL BY FERGUS HUME.

3. A MARRIAGE MYSTERY. By the Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c. Crown 8vo, pictorial cloth, 3s. 6d.

Notice.—The Large First Edition Sold Out Week of Publication. Second Edition Now Ready, and Third Edition in Preparation.

NEW NOVEL BY J. E. MUDDOCK.

4. WITHOUT FAITH OR FEAR: The Story of a Soul. By the Author of "Stripped of the Tinsel," &c. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 6s. Second Edition.

BY KATHLEEN BEHENNA.

5. SIDARTHA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

 The interest intensifies with each successive chapter, and is finally wrought up to an overpowering climax. It is quite impossible, once begun, to lay down this fascinating novel unfinished.

NEW BOOK BY MRS. E. LYNN LINTON.

6. 'TWIXT CUP AND LIP. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Second Edition.

NEW STORY BY EDWIN PALLANDER.

7. ACROSS THE ZODIAC. A Story of Adventure. In pictorial cloth, with a Frontispiece. Cr. 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Just Out.

 The interest intensifies from page to page, and holds the reader spellbound until the very last line. The closing catastrophe is probably the most daring and splendid achievement yet made in fiction of this class.

NEW NOVEL OF CLERICAL LIFE.

8. A MAN AMONGST MEN. By Fred. Holmes. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

 Opening in the idyllic peace of a typical rural parsonage, the reader is introduced to the hero of this interesting story of clerical life. The work is remarkable for its many daring questionings.

NEW WORK BY CAROLINE GEAREY.

9. TWO FRENCH QUEENS. Elizabeth of Valois—Marguerite of Valois. By the Author of "Three Empresses," &c. With portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Just out.

10. THE HISTORY OF A SOUL. By Kathleen Behenna. Beautifully printed on hand-made paper. Demy 8vo, artistic cloth, gilt edges, 5s. net. [Dec. 1.

LUCAS MALET'S NEW NOVEL.

The Carissima.

By LUCAS MALET, Author of "The Wages of Sin," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. Third Edition.

"The interest throughout the story is intense and perfectly sustained. The character drawing is as good as it can be. The book is wonderfully witty, and has touches of genuine pathos. It is much better than anything else we have seen from the same hand."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Carissima.

"Lucas Malet has insight, strength, the gift of satire, and a captivating brilliance of touch; in short, a literary equipment such as not too many present-day novelists are possessed of."—Daily Mail.

"We cannot think of readers as skipping a line or failing to admire the workmanship, or to be deeply interested both in the characters and the plot. It is likely to add to the reputation of the author of 'The Wages of Sin.'"—Glasgow Herald.

The Carissima.

"Undeniably cleverly conceived and cleverly written."—Birmingham Post.

"The whole thing is told with an air of vraisemblance, which is accentuated rather than otherwise by the author's light touch and never-failing humour. The characterisation is excellent. The 'Carissima's' father and mother are delightful portraits, and that of her fellow-conspirator carries unquestioning conviction."—Daily Chronicle.

The Carissima.

"This fine and brilliant story . . . contains one of the most brilliant studies of a woman we have met with in a tolerably long acquaintance with the modern novel. The Carissima is a splendid conception."—Westminster Gazette.

"There is no gainsaying the force of the book, or its extreme cleverness."—Daily News.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

The Wages of Sin.

By LUCAS MALET. Crown 8vo, 6s.

By ARTHUR MORRISON, Author of "Tales of Mean Streets." Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Since Daniel Defoe no such consummate master of realistic fiction has arisen among us as Mr. Arthur Morrison. . . . A tremendously powerful dramatic presentation of human life. . . . Nothing shows the power of Mr. Morrison's genius more than his enabling us to understand and sympathise with people whose lines are outside the pale of morality. . . . Hardly any praise could be too much for the imaginative power and artistic perfection and beauty of this picture. . . . There is all Defoe's fidelity of realistic detail suffused with the light and warmth of a genius higher and purer than Defoe's. The work abounds with humour."—Scotsman.

A Child of the Jago.

"Mr. Morrison has achieved an astonishing success. Take it as a whole, as a picture of a phase of life, and you must admit that it is a masterly achievement—a triumph of art. It is a distinct advance upon his earlier book, 'Tales of Mean Streets,' because, it seems to us, it is truer, more convincing, less dispiriting. The book is a masterpiece."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Child of the Jago.

"A masterpiece of truth and simplicity. Never, to my knowledge, has childhood, under a social curse, been drawn with such poignant tenderness and pity. The poor little ragamuffin is brimming with human affections and animal spirits. . . . All this has a veracity and depth of observation that make your average story-telling a pitiful makeshift."—Mr. L. F. Austin, in The Sketch.

A Child of the Jago.

". . . . It is not one of the least among Mr. Morrison's achievements that, without ever hinting at the fact, he makes us feel that the very vilest among his vile characters are not utterly without one or two decent human qualities. The power displayed is magnificent."—Black and White.

"This masterpiece. . . . Wonderful imaginative power joins with a faultless fidelity of detail. . . . Mr. Morrison has touched his high-water mark."—Aberdeen Free Press.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated in the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distant by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which can remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficient capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, can obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, fence, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees and vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application. The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.

At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.

Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intention of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.

Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.

Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.

Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to increase their incomes.

The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.

The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.

All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—

"JEREZCONA" COMPETITION. Rider Haggard SERIES.

A TRIAL OF LITERARY SKILL.

FIRST PRIZE, £3. 3s. And TWELVE CONSOLATION PRIZES, each of Half-a-Guinea.

SEE RULES BELOW.

TO NAME THE NOVELS FROM WHICH THE FOLLOWING QUOTATIONS ARE TAKEN:

1.—"It is those damned Lions, Sir," answered Job, in a tone which suggested an odd mixture of a sense of personal injury, habitual respect, and acknowledged fear, "and they are swimming here to heat us," he added nervously, picking up an "H" in his agitation.
Title..... Chap.....

2.—Presently they met, and the executioners turned round, looking towards the King as though for orders. "Kill," said the King. "Kill," squeaked Gagool. "Kill," re-echoed Scragga with a hollow chuckle.
Title..... Chap.....

3.—"Therefore I say that the name of Macumazahn and the name of dead Umslopogaas, ay, and the name of Kara, my servant, who aided him to hold the stair shall be blazoned in letters of gold above my throne, and shall be glorious for ever while the land endures. I, the Queen, have said it."
Title..... Chap.....

4.—"No," said Augusta, "there is no date; I could not bear any more tattooing. It was all done at one sitting, and I grew faint."
Title..... Chap.....

5.—How shall we win back the love of noble Antony, who is bewitched of cunning Octavia, and tarries long from us.
Title..... Chap.....

6.—"Thou fool," whispered Swanhild in her ear, "how can these help him? No troll could live in yonder cauldron. Dead is Eric, and thou art the bait that lured him to his death!"
Title..... Chap.....

7.—"So, Frank Muller, so. Ten years ago you said to yourself: There are three things worth having in the world—first, wealth; secondly, women if they take your fancy, or, better still, one woman, if you desire her above all others; thirdly, power."
Title..... Chap.....

8.—"Why do you want to marry Eva, Mr. Plowden?" asked Florence, ignoring this piece of information; "you are not in love with her."
Title..... Chap.....

9.—"Here lies the Lily's stalk, O King!" said Umslopogaas, pointing with the axe, "but if her flower blooms on any air, it is not here."
Title..... Chap.....

10.—"Zibalbay," said the cry. "It is Zibalbay come back, or the ghost of him, and with him the Lady of the Heart!"
Title..... Chap.....

11.—"Oh," said the squire, "I have nothing to say against Quaritch; indeed, I like the man."
Title..... Chap.....

12.—"Angela," he said, "what has made you so different from other women? With all whom I have known, love is an affair of passion or amusement, of the world and the day, but yours gazes towards Heaven, and looks to find its real utterance in the stillness of Eternity!"
Title..... Chap.....

13.—"I tell you, Mr. Rock, that I have no more notion where she has flitted to than a babe unborn. If any one knows, it's old Levinger or Sir Henry!"
Title..... Chap.....

14.—Yes, there, on the very spot where more than twenty centuries before she had slain Kallierates the priest, Ayesha herself fell down and died.
Title..... Chap.....

15.—"Is it a dream, Wambe, great lord and chief? or"—and she lifted her clenched hands and shook them in his face—"hath a woman's vengeance found thee out and a woman's wit o'ermatched thy tyrannous strength?"
Title..... Chap.....

Mülhens' "Rhine Violets"

No. 4711. TRADE MARK.

DISTILLED FROM FRESHLY GATHERED RHINE VIOLETS.

A SCENT OF RARE FRAGRANCE.

A VERY ECHO OF NATURE.

CAUTION.

Owing to the phenomenal success of this popular Scent, some perfumers are offering essences of their own manufacture under the name of "RHINE VIOLETS." The public must not be deceived, but insist upon "MULHENS'" brand, which is distilled from the flower itself. Don't accept any bottle not bearing Ferd. Mülhens' name. This alone ensures genuineness. Ferd. Mülhens, of Cologne, is the originator of this exquisite perfume, and was the first to introduce it into England.

The Fashionable Press of London are unanimous in praise of it.

These consist of 25 fully-licensed, 51 on Beerhouses, and 3 off licenses. There are also 17 licensed Houses held on short leases. In addition to this licensed property there are a number of Houses and Shops. These properties were purchased by the Brewers' Investment Corporation, Limited, in the year 1889 from the Trustees of the late Charles Marsland. The Brewery and the plant was subsequently sold to Walter Showell & Sons, Limited, the Houses being retained by the Brewers' Investment Corporation, Limited. On the amalgamation of those Companies in September, 1894, under the title of Showells Brewery Company, Limited, the Houses referred to were taken over and have since been conducted by that Company.

The Directors of Showells Brewery Company, Limited, however, experience some difficulty in managing a separate Brewery, and a large number of Houses so far away from their Head Office in Birmingham. They also anticipate they may be compelled to check the legitimate expansion of the trade attached to Stockport and its neighbourhood, owing to the development of their business in the districts immediately surrounding their own centre, where they can find ready and profitable employment for the bulk of their capital. Under these circumstances they have decided to dispose of the Stockport Brewery and Houses to a separate Company, and it will then have the advantage of direct local management, and of being provided with the additional capital necessary for its extension.

The Company will acquire, free from any Mortgages, the valuable and extensive Freehold Brewery in complete working order, the Goodwill of the business, and also the Plant, Rolling Stock, Horses, Stock-in-Trade, Book Debts, and Loans as at the 3rd of October, 1896, together with the Freehold, Copyhold, and Leasehold Houses, Fittings and Fixtures belonging to the Brewery, and such of the Fixtures and Fittings thereiu as are the property of the Vendors.

The Houses are situated in a thickly populated manufacturing district, and are conveniently placed for delivery from the Brewery.

In addition to the tied trade an increasing free trade is now being done, and a profitable business may be expected from the sales of Bottled Ales and Stouts, a department which has been lately added and has proved very successful.

The Brewery is in the centre of Stockport; it has an excellent supply of water obtained from an artesian well of great depth, the yield from which renders it independent of any outside supply. The whole is in good repair, and admirably adapted for extension.

Mr. A. W. Pigott, who has been closely associated with the management for the past eight years, has undertaken to act as Managing Director. The Company will therefore take over the whole of this undertaking without any interruption of business, and without change in the present staff, and thus secure the same careful and energetic management which has hitherto conduced to its success.

The business will be taken over as from the 3rd of October, 1896, the Company receiving the profits from that date subject to the payment of five per cent. interest to the date of the completion of the purchase.

The Liabilities of the business on the 3rd of October, 1896, will be discharged by the Vendors, who will also guarantee the payment of the Book Debts and Loans to customers shown by the books of that date.

The purchase money has been fixed at £250,000, payable in cash. The present issue of Capital and Debentures will give the Company £30,000 in cash for working Capital in addition to the amounts receivable in Book Debts and Loans, and as the Company does not undertake any liabilities, this sum is considered sufficient to meet all immediate requirements for extensions.

The books of the Brewery have been examined by Messrs. Robert C. and H. Haworth & Co., Accountants, of 19, Cooper-street, Manchester, who report as follows:—

We have examined the profits of the Brookfield Brewery, Stockport, with the houses attached thereto, carried on by Showells Brewery Company, Limited, in conjunction with their Birmingham business, and after making the necessary adjustments, we certify that the profits, including the Rentals from Houses, have been as follows:—

1890	£9,579 11 3½
1891	11,196 16 2
1892	10,129 11 2
1893	11,646 4 5
1894	11,600 9 1
1895	12 944 19 10
1896	14,840 6 9

Depreciation upon the Plant and Machinery, Casks and Rolling Stock, has been deducted before arriving at the above profits. We find that the output from the Brewery for the same period was as follows:—

	Barrels.
1890	16,015
1891	16,984
1892	16,560
1893	17,720
1894	17,979
1895	17,989
1896	19,234

ROBT. C. and HY. HAWORTH & CO.

23rd November, 1896.

The profits and sales of beer appearing upon the above certificate show a steady increase, and those of last year, apart from any further increase which may be expected from the employment of additional capital, would be sufficient to provide on the present issue, the following:—

4% on £140,000 Debentures...	5,600	0	0
5% on £70,000 Cumulative Preference Shares	3,500	0	0
	£14,840	6	9

The Directors confidently anticipate that with local management and additional capital, there will be a considerable expansion of the Company's business, and consequent additional profits available for dividend on the Ordinary Shares.

The Vendors, who are also the Promoters of the Company, will pay all costs and expenses connected with the formation of the Company, and the transfer of the properties.

The only Contract entered into is the Contract of Sale from the vendors to the Company, namely: An Agreement dated the 17th day of November, 1896, and made between Showells Brewery Company, Limited, of the one part, and John William McLoughlin, of Stockport, in the County of Chester, Assistant-Manager, as Agent for and on behalf of a Company about to be formed and registered, and intended to be called Showells Stockport Brewery, Limited, of the other part.

A Copy of such Contract accompanies the Prospectus. The Report of Messrs. Haworth & Co., and the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, may be inspected at the Offices of the Company's Solicitors.

Applications will be made in due course to the Committee of the Stock Exchanges in London, Birmingham, and Manchester for a Special Settlement and Official Quotation for the Mortgage Debentures and the Preference and Ordinary Shares.

Applications for Debentures and Shares should be sent with the deposit, payable on application to the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, Stockport, and Branches.

If fewer Debentures or Shares are allotted than are applied for by any applicant, the balance of the deposit paid will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment, and any surplus will be returned.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Company has been formed to acquire, as and from 1st October, 1896, the following businesses:—Septimus Parsonage & Co., 79, Mark-lane, London, E.C.; 67, Lord-street, Liverpool; and 17, Fownes-street, Dublin, Wine and Spirit Brokers and Irish Whisky Blenders; James Violett, Bird, & Co., Claret Shippers, Bordeaux; James Isles & Co., Scotch Whisky Merchants, and Blenders, Dundee; S. Parsonage & Fleming, Brandy Merchants and Shippers, Chateauneuf, Cognac, France; and the Land and Buildings for the Highland Esk Distillery, hereinafter referred to.

Messrs. Septimus Parsonage & Co. have had intimate and profitable business relations with Messrs. James Violett, Bird, & Co., for several years, and, while all the above businesses have been successful, it is believed that, by working them in combination and under the control of the Board (consisting, with two exceptions, of experts), with Central Offices in London, still greater progress may be made in the future.

Large extensions are contemplated at home and abroad, and important economies in working and management are contemplated, especially in agency and distribution expenses, and calculations have been made which warrant the Directors in stating that the advertising of their different brands may be considerably extended without increased outlay, each firm having previously separately conducted its own advertising and trading operations.

The property and assets to be taken over have been valued, and the profits ascertained, on behalf of the Vendors, by Messrs. Coltman & Baker, surveyors and valuers, of 3, John-street, Theobald's-road, London, and on behalf of the Company by Mr. George Westall, accountant, brewery surveyor and valuer, and wine and spirit trade expert, of St. Stephen's Chambers, London, E.C. They have personally visited and inspected the properties, &c., and value the freeholds, plant, machinery, rolling-stock, book debts, goodwill, &c. (including £20,000 to be retained out of present issue), at £194,053 5s. 5d., and the land and buildings (when completed) at Craigo, near Montrose, at £26,000, making a total of £220,053 5s. 5d. They also certify that the net profits of the first three businesses for the past three years show a progressive increase, being as follows: For year 1893-4, £11,199 10s. 8d.; 1894-5, £12,501 16s. 8d.; 1895-6, £13,964 5s. 11d., the business of Messrs. S. Parsonage & Fleming having only been recently established (although a moderate profit has been made) has not been taken into account.

In addition to the certified profit for the year 1895-6, the further profits anticipated to accrue from the extensions and amalgamation is estimated at £13,979, making a total of £27,943 5s. 11d. The dividend of 6 per cent. on the Preference Shares and 10 per cent. on the Ordinary Shares would leave a surplus of £10,743 5s. 11d., which, after payment of Directors' fees, will be available for a further dividend on the Ordinary Shares, and for the purpose of building up a reserve fund. The present actual net income nearly exceeds twice the amount required for dividend on the preference shares.

Under the contract for the purchase of the business, the stocks-in-trade and book debts are guaranteed by the vendor not to be less at October, 1896 (the date at which the businesses are taken over), than £40,408 17s. 1d., the amount at which they have been valued, and which, with the £20,000 above-mentioned, forms an ample working capital of £60,408 17s. 1d.

HIGHLAND ESK DISTILLERY, Montrose.—The Company have secured large and suitable premises, situated near Craigo, on the River North Esk, about two miles from the Port of Montrose, and near to the Craigo, Dubton, and Kinnaber Junction Stations, and to the North Water Station on the Bervie Railway, which will immediately be converted into a Highland Malt Distillery. There is a fine natural water supply from the neighbouring Grampian Mountains, the full rights to which are acquired by the Company.

The buildings and site of the distillery have been favourably reported upon by Mr. Chas. O. Doig, Consulting Distillery Engineer and Architect, Elgin, and a most satisfactory analysis of the water has been made.

This Distillery will be of the greatest value as a profit-earning medium, the enormous and ever-increasing demand for Highland Malt Whisky having rendered within recent years the business of the Distiller very lucrative, and, with the means of distribution already possessed by Messrs. Septimus Parsonage & Co. and Messrs. James Isles & Co., the success of the Distillery is believed to be assured. A contract has been entered into for the construction and equipment of the Distillery (guaranteed to produce an output of 5,000 gallons of Highland Malt Whisky per week), which will be finished by the 1st of July, 1897, and a sufficient sum of money to cover the contract price will be reserved by the directors, and paid to the Vendor on completion of the Distillery.

The purchase price fixed by Mr. Septimus Parsonage, who is the Vendor and Promoter of the Company (and who makes a profit on the re-sale, which it is anticipated will only cover the expenses of forming and floating the Company up to allotment and the transfer of the different properties to the Company), for the whole of the properties above-mentioned is £200,000, payable as to £33,000 in ordinary fully-paid shares, and as to £40,000 in fully-paid preference shares, and as to £127,000 in cash or shares at the option of the Company.

Full Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the bankers, solicitors, brokers, and auditors of the Company, and the contracts, and the original reports of the valuers and of Mr. Doig, may be seen at the offices of the solicitors.

The Atlantic and Danville Railway Company has been recently reorganised under the auspices of a London Committee. The previous Bonded indebtedness of the Road was $4,952,000 First Mortgage 6 per cent. Bonds, upon which a cash assessment of 25 per cent. was made to provide funds for the retirement of Car Trust and Receiver's Certificates and all other claims. This assessment produced $1,238,000, which discharged all claims, and left about $200,000 for permanent improvements. Against this assessment a similar amount of the above Bonds have been given (of which the above issue forms part), the remainder, $262,000, being held on behalf of the Company by the Trustees under the Mortgage as a reserve for future improvements, the whole amount being a first charge upon the entire undertaking and assets of the Company.

The Company owns and operates 281 miles of Railway, viz., 230 miles main line and branches, standard gauge; 51 miles James River Division, narrow gauge; and about 28 miles of Sidings, running from Norfolk, Va., where it connects with all the Railroad and Steamship Lines entering that Port, to Danville, Va., having connections with the Southern Railway, Atlantic Coast Line, and Seaboard Air Line, with all of which there is a considerable interchange of traffic.

The road owns all its terminals and entire equipment, consisting of 28 Locomotives, 752 Cars, Steam Tugs, Barges, &c. It has no floating debt, and has considerable cash assets over all liabilities, available for such improvements as may be thought desirable.

The net earnings for the year ending June 30th, 1895, were ...	$102,950.89

Annual Interest required on the $1,238,000 Bonds (which constitute a charge of less than $5,000 per mile)	$61,900

The surplus Revenue over fixed charges has been, since the reorganisation, devoted to permanent improvements upon the Road, acquisition of equipment, &c.

Attention is directed to extracts from the Report made by the President and Treasurer of the Road to the Committee of the New York Stock Exchange, and also to the copy of the Bond (see Appendices A and B).

The $1,238,000 Bonds are already quoted on the New York Stock Exchange; and a quotation has just been granted by the Committee of the London Stock Exchange.

Copies of the Mortgage Deed can be obtained on application to Messrs. Tamplin, Tayler, & Joseph, Solicitors, Ingram House, Fenchurch-street, E.C.

The Subscription List will be opened on Wednesday, the 2nd December, and closed on or before Friday, the 4th December.

Applications must be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus, and lodged, together with the amount of deposit, at the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, 75, Cornhill, E.C.; or at Manchester, Liverpool, and Branches.

The allotment will be made as early as possible after the closing of the Subscription List. If no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full; and if only a portion of the amount applied for be allotted, the balance will be applied towards the amount due on allotment.

Failure to pay any instalment when due renders any instalment paid liable to forfeiture.

The Businesses have been established an average of 48 years, and the Customers holding regular accounts number many thousands.

The Vendors are so well satisfied as to the success of the Company, that they stipulate for the allotment to them, and agree to accept in part payment for the businesses and properties to be transferred, Ordinary Shares to the amount of £50,000.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire, carry on, and further extend the old-established and profitable wholesale and retail furnishing and general ironmongery depots, iron foundries, and metal works enumerated in full prospectus, comprising two foundries, one sheet metal works, and twenty-eight ironmongery depots, situate in London and various important provincial towns.

The businesses have been carefully examined by Messrs. Bromhead & Co., the well-known metal trades' valuers and accountants, of Newgate-street, London, E.C., who certify that they are all situated in good commercial centres, and are without exception thoroughly sound paying concerns.

There can be no doubt that the amalgamation must largely increase the turnover and the amount of profits earned, as the system to be adopted by this Company has proved highly beneficial in other trades, as is shown by the profitable nature of such concerns as Liptons, the Aerated Bread Company, Limited; the Home and Colonial Stores, Limited; the International Tea Company, Limited; and many other Companies, the Shares of which now stand at high premiums.

The businesses have been most carefully selected with a special view of obtaining only old-established, absolutely genuine, and profitable concerns, and of such a nature, that by reason of amalgamation with the foundries and works, many classes of goods can be supplied direct from the factories to the shops. In this way the Company will secure both the wholesale and the retail profits, and will further, having regard to the magnitude of the concern, be able to purchase goods in large quantities, thereby securing better terms than are obtainable by individual retailers.

In addition to the large retail trade, there are orders in hand at the present time to the amount of £26,190, including contracts for her Majesty's Government, Portland and elsewhere; her Majesty's Government (Brecon Prison); her Majesty's Government (Shrewsbury Prison); the Duchy of Cornwall; the Dorset County Asylum: Corporation of Wrexham; Barnstaple Town Council; Wrexham Gas Company, &c., &c.

The Foundries and Works contain complete plants for the turning out of wrought-iron work, sheet iron, zinc and tin goods, as well as every facility for producing special or heavy castings, ornamental roofings, &c. The Barnstaple depot consists of a capital foundry and general iron works, as well as an extensive wholesale ironmongery warehouse, with offices, &c. The Hounslow works are situated in the High-street, Hounslow, and contain, in addition to a powerful engine and shafting, an almost unique set of high-class shearing and punching machinery, presses and dies, drilling and bending machinery, &c., &c. The Brecon Foundry and Works have been successfully carried on for 50 years, and are large and completely fitted. The wholesale depot at Clapham Junction is spacious, and the business has an extensive connection, while the whole of the remaining premises are in good condition, well-stocked and fitted with well-made fixtures and fittings; the plant including 44 horses and 85 vans, trolleys, floats, and trucks, &c., &c.

The businesses will be transferred to the Company as going concerns, and all liabilities up to completion will be discharged by the Vendors.

The whole of the establishments have been personally inspected, and the books examined by Messrs Bromhead & Co., the well-known and old-established Metal Trades' Valuers and Accountants, who furnish the following report:—

97, Newgate-street, London, E.C., 19th November, 1896.

To the Directors of Darby, Nott, & Co., Limited.

Dear Sirs,—We have examined the premises and books of the Lion Foundry, Barnstaple; the Brecon Foundry, Brecon; and the Hounslow Metal Works, Hounslow; together with 28 wholesale and retail ironmongery depots about to be acquired by you (the list of which is signed by us, and sent herewith), and beg to report as follows:—

We find, without exception, each of the businesses to be a thoroughly good paying concern. They are all well-known, having been established, on an average, 48 years.

The depots are situated in main thoroughfares and excellent business positions in the respective towns. All the premises are in substantial repair; the plant and fixtures modern, and in a thoroughly efficient state. The stocks-in-trade we find to be well kept, and of a good class. We value the same, with the fixtures, machinery, and plant, at the sum of £95,140.

The present annual sales we find to be £170,472, showing a steady increase on previous years, and the total net profits now actually being earned, after payment of all expenses, amount to £23,010 per annum.

There can be no doubt that a further and much larger turnover can be done with the additional capital and advantages that your Company offer.

The plan you are about to adopt of purchasing goods in large quantities will undoubtedly very considerably increase the present profits, besides which, inasmuch as you will hold extensive stocks of every article in your head depots, you will be enabled to supply these goods more quickly to your various branches.

The works and foundries included in the list of businesses to be acquired, form an important addition to the Company, inasmuch as they are able to turn out a large number of articles for sale in the depots, as well as special castings, &c., to the order of architects, builders, and others. The customers holding regular accounts with the various depots number many thousands.

We are convinced that these businesses form a very valuable group, and that, as a Company, they are capable of great extension.

Yours faithfully,
BROMHEAD & CO., Metal Trade Valuers and Accountants.

The present annual profits, as certified by Messrs. Bromhead & Co., amount to...	£23,010
To pay 6 per cent. on £100,000 Preference Shares will require...	£6,000
To pay 10 per cent. on £100,000 Ordinary Shares will require...	10,000

Leaving a balance of	£7,010

for management, Directors' fees, &c., without allowing for any increase of profits by the additional trade or saving by amalgamation, or by obtaining in many cases (owing to the acquisition of the metal works and foundries), the wholesale as well as retail profits. From the above certified figures, it will be seen that the present net profits are sufficient to pay the Preference dividends nearly four times over; consequently the Preference Shares, which are cumulative and preferential, both as to capital and dividends, form an exceptionally sound investment; while the Ordinary Shares (half of which are taken by the Vendors in part payment for the businesses and properties) must commend themselves to investors as highly remunerative.

Mr. G. F. Darby, of Clapham Junction, Mr. C. J. Foster, of Dorchester, and Mr. W. J. Nott, of Brecon, three of the Vendors, who are thoroughly practical men, well acquainted with the trade, have consented to join the Board after completion of the purchase, and their extensive and valued experience cannot fail to prove of great advantage to the Company.

It is intended to retain the entire staffs of the various establishments, and in nearly all cases the late proprietors have consented to remain as managers of the respective branches on terms very favourable to the Company. By this means the connections will be retained, and the system of business, which has enabled the concerns to obtain their present success, will be continued, except so far as the supply of goods is concerned from the factories and foundries to be taken over.

The great and growing demand for Shares in sound industrial undertakings is shown by reference to the following concerns, the Shares of which stand at considerable premiums:—

John Barker & Co., Limited, Five per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £7.

Hy. Bucknall & Sons, Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £7¾.

D. H. Evans & Co., Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £1¼.

Harrod's Stores, Limited, Five per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £7.

Home and Colonial Stores, Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £6¾.

Lovell & Christmas, Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £7.

Maple & Co., Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £1⅝.

T. R. Roberts & Co., Limited, Five per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £1⅛.

Thos. Wallis & Co., Limited, Six per Cent. Preference Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £8.

Thos. Wallis & Co., Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £14.

D. H. Evans & Co., Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £2.

Aerated Bread Co., Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £9⅛.

Maple & Co., Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £3⅝.

Harrod's Stores, Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £5¾.

Lovell & Christmas, Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £5, are now quoted at £9¾.

Jones & Higgins, Limited, Ordinary Shares, issued at £1, are now quoted at £2¼.

The price to be paid for the whole of the plant, machinery, tools, and stock (which alone are valued at £95,140), together with the leases and goodwill of the wholesale and retail businesses, foundries, and metal works, has been fixed at the sum of £126,580 in cash, together with an allotment of 10,000 fully-paid Ordinary Shares of the Company, leaving the sum of £23,420 available for additional working capital.

For Contracts, see Full Prospectus.

Prospectuses and forms of application for Shares may be obtained of the Bankers, Brokers, or of the Secretary, at the Offices of the Company. Applications for Preference and Ordinary Shares should be made on the forms accompanying the Prospectus, and forwarded to the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, 112, Bishopsgate-street, London, E.C., or any of its Branches.

November 19th, 1896.

The Subscription List will open on Thursday, the 3rd December, and will close for both Town and Country on or before Monday, the 7th December.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to purchase and extend the operations of the Kapai-Vermont Gold Mine, a dividend paying property equipped with machinery and cyanide plant situate in the Kuaotunu Gold Field (Hauraki District), of New Zealand, comprising an area of 37 acres or thereabouts, and a Battery site and allotment of 4 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches. The reports issued to the Shareholders of the existing local Company in 1895 and 1896 have been independently confirmed by Captain W. H. Argall and by the Manager, Mr. Robson.

Mr. Hornibrooke's Report of April 25th, 1896, which is confirmed by Capt. W. H. Argall in his report of May 9th, 1896 (copies of which reports accompany the prospectus), states that the Otis mill started crushing in January, 1895, and up to April 4th, 1896, had put through 4,000 tons of ore (or at the rate of say 70 tons per week), from which 7,282 oz. of gold was won, equal in value to £15,291. 12s. 6d.

Advices from the property of the 26th September last state up to that date 5,480 tons have been crushed, producing 8,779 ounces of gold.

The Directors cabled to the New Zealand Company, who are now in charge of the mine, on the 9th November last, asking the following questions:—

"Let us know tonnage crushed, ounces yielded, value, cost working since January."

The reply received on the 11th November read as follows:—

"2,985 tons crushed, 3,505 ounces, £2. 10s. per ounce, cost per ton for Mining 11s. 9d. Considerable reduction will be made when I can increase output. In order to facilitate systematic working, part of ore is from old workings old Company."

It will be seen from the above cables that the Mine with the present inadequate and insufficient machinery is crushing at the rate of 82 tons per week, giving a net profit for the nine months of £6,977. 8s. 5d. It seems that poor ore was used from old workings.

The object of the present issue is to purchase the Kapai-Vermont Property as it stands, and to provide the additional crushing machinery and appliances as recommended by Captain Argall to increase the output of gold as well as to carry out the further works of development recommended by Captain Argall and Mr. Hornibrooke.

The reports show that the reserves of ore in sight, apart from further development, are ample to supply the requirements of much larger crushing machinery, and the Directors are advised that by erecting additional machinery for the treatment of 150 tons of ore a day the present net profit can be proportionately increased, and that on a safe estimate dividends of from 60 to 70 per cent. per annum can be earned on the capital.

The Mine is well known and acknowledged to be one of the best in the district. Mr. Henry M. Cadell, B.Sc., F.R.S.E., F.G.S. (Vice-President Mining Institute of Scotland), who inspected the gold fields of New Zealand, states, in a paper read by him before the members of The Mining Institute of Scotland, at Kilmarnock, on December 7th, 1895:—

"Kuaotunu.—The Kuaotunu Gold Field has as yet been comparatively little prospected, but it is at present yielding satisfactory results to the Companies that can treat the ore on a good system. There are several reefs, the best of which—the Try Fluke—runs in a north north-easterly direction past the eastern side of the Kuaotunu township.

"The best reef runs through the property of the Try Fluke and the Kapai-Vermont Companies, and these mines deserve special mention on account of the merits of their system of treatment of the ore, and of the success with which their operations have been attended.

"The Kapai-Vermont Company treat their ore by dry crushing in an Otis mill, and direct cyanidation as at Waihi, and this system appears to be working with most satisfactory results, about 90 per cent. of the assay value of the ore being extracted."

Attention is invited to the accompanying reports of Mr. Henry P. Hornibrooke and Mr. James A. Walker, made to the Directors of the local Company, which has been, and is now, working the Mine. From these reports it appears that the reef now being worked is well opened by adits, galleries, and shafts.

In a telegraphic report received and made on behalf of this Company, Captain Argall states that the lode was struck in the lower level on the 30th April last, which greatly enhances the value of the property. In confirmation of this statement Captain Argall cabled through the manager, under date 9th July, as follows:—

"Kapai.—In my opinion Mine will develop into a fine property, am convinced there is a brilliant future before the Company. I have great reasons for supposing at the lower level and deeper levels the richness of ore will increase greatly."

An extract from a cable received from the Manager, November 17th, states that the stopes above the lowest level are now producing large quantities of ore of good quality, varying in width from 7 feet to 8 feet. The Chairman of the New Zealand Company states that the mill value of the ore in lowest level will average over £4 per ton.

The ores are being successfully treated by the process now in use at the Mine, and the percentage of gold extracted is high, 90 to 98 per cent. (vide James A. Walker's Report, 2nd September, 1895). The district is well timbered, there is a sufficiency of water, a good stream flowing past the Mine, coal can be delivered at the Mine at a cost of about 22s. per ton, and as the climate is favourable, work is carried on all the year round. Labour is abundant and cheap, and the general conditions for working the Mine are extremely economical.

The port of Kuaotunu—a regular port of call for steamers from Auckland and the town of Thames—is about three miles distant from the Mines, which are approached by a good metalled road.

At the town of Thames there are well-equipped engineering works which afford excellent facilities for the manufacture and repairs of mining machinery.

A contract, dated 26th October, 1896, has been entered into between the Kapai-Vermont Gold Mining Company (no liability) of New Zealand, as Vendor, of the first part, Sydney Harry Johnson, of the second part, and John Whittaker for this Company, of the third part, for the purchase of the property described for the sum of £125,000, of which £40,000 is payable in cash, £40,000 in fully-paid Shares, and the balance in cash or fully-paid Shares, or cash and fully-paid Shares, at the option of the Directors, leaving £25,000 to provide additional working capital.

The above is the only contract to which the Company is a party.

The Promoter has made arrangements and entered into contracts with various persons for assistance in the promotion of the Company, and in regard to the expenses thereof, which may constitute contracts within the meaning of the 38th Section of the Companies Act, 1867. Applicants for shares shall be deemed to have notice of all such contracts and arrangements, and shall accept the above statement as a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the aforesaid Section.

The Contract, dated the 26th October, 1896, above referred to, the original Reports, Cables, and copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association may be inspected at the Offices of the Company, No. 1, St. Helen's-place, London, E.C.

Applications for Shares may be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus or by letter, to be sent to the Bankers or Secretary with the prescribed deposit. In case no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned without deduction, and when the number of shares allotted is less than the number applied for the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on the shares allotted.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Bankers or of the Secretary of the Company.

London, 28th November, 1896.

The following cable, dated November 25th, 1896, has been received from Mr. T. Hardman, a member of the Local Board:—"The mine has been worked by shafts to a depth of 45ft., 50ft., 60ft., 67ft. Reef 2ft. 6in. wide and assays 17oz. per ton. Expect to reach water level in fortnight."

The LIST of APPLICATIONS will OPEN on TUESDAY, the 1st day of December, and CLOSE at 4 p.m. on THURSDAY, the 3rd day of December, 1896, for TOWN, and at noon on the FOLLOWING DAY for COUNTRY.

Applications having been already received for 20,000 shares, the Directors intend to proceed to Allotment on the Closing of the Lists.

The following is an extract from "The Western Australian Gold Fields Courier," Coolgardie, of June 27th, 1896, by the well-known mining engineer, F. C. B. Vosper, M.A.I.M.E.:—

"I made a detour to visit 'The Credo,' which is perhaps the most remarkable mine in Western Australia, and therefore specially calls for description. It is situated four miles west of Broad Arrow, in the midst of low ranges, the surface rocks of which present no remarkable features. Within the area of the mine, however, a change is experienced, though even here the surface affords no indication of the remarkable features beneath. The Credo leases cover 36 acres, and are intersected by a reef running a few degrees east of north. This reef is embedded in the hardest of hard diorite, which presents some extraordinary phenomena. In places throughout the hard rock large patches of auriferous pyrites are found, the pyrites occurring in large and regular yellow cubes, which give the rock an unusual appearance. The reef is only from 14in. to 18in. thick, yet it carries not only gold in abundance, but copper in all its forms, zinc, galena, iron (in sulphides, hematites, limonites, spathic, crystals, and carbonates), arsenical pyrites, kaolin, siderites, silicious sinters, thermal taffa and ash, and finally hexagonal crystals of quartz, which, although elsewhere devoid of gold, are here filled with the precious metal. The reef is most regular in its form, and it is difficult to account for the heterogeneous character of its contents. The reef bears evidences of hydrothermal origin, but it is certainly an unusual phenomenon to find the presence of so many minerals in such comparatively undisturbed country. There are five shafts sunk on the lode, of which the No. 1 is down 57ft., No. 2 20ft., No. 3 (the main) 52ft. (with a crosscut of 20ft.), No. 4 48ft., and No. 5 62ft., the whole mine being pretty thoroughly and systematically opened up. The gold is very equally distributed among the various ores, and the quantity visible is so large as to prove the mine most wealthy. Although the matrices present such a variety, the material is not refractory, and the gold being absolutely free. The mine must be regarded as a most valuable and promising property."

PROSPECTUS.

OBJECTS.

This company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and working the mining properties known as the Credo, the East Credo, and the West Credo, in the North-east Coolgardie Goldfield, West Australia, and for the other purposes specified in the memorandum of association.

PROPERTY.

The property comprises three leases, numbered 876 E, 1,352 E, and 1,353 E, having a combined area of about 36 acres, and situated about four miles from the Broad Arrow township, and 38 miles from Coolgardie.

RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH.

The new railway to Menzies will pass within four miles of the property. There is already a telegraph station at Broad Arrow.

REPORTS.

Four reports have been made upon the property by the following reliable and well-known mining engineers, viz.:—Dr. Chewings and Messrs. Robert Gibson, P. J. Robertson, and G. A. Stockfeld.

The following are extracts from the reports which are printed on page 3 in extenso.

From Dr. CHEWINS' Report:—

"The Main Reef has been best exposed in Nos. 1 and 2 shafts. It is there seen to vary between 9 and 18in. in width. . . . . I see no reason to suppose that this reef will not prove permanent in depth. It looks as permanent at the bottom of the shafts as at any other place in the workings. It is known to exist along its strike (viz., N.E.) for nearly 300ft. Further south than this the reef is likely to increase in size. . . . . Very rich specimens of gold, in quartz and ironstone and siderite, are met with every few feet. I have have seen these in both the shafts, and at intervals right down them. On a former visit I had the pleasure of taking out the finest gold siderite specimen I have ever seen. On my last visit a very rich place had just been struck in the bottom of No. 1 shaft. The reef here is split into two, and the rich gold was in the western portion, which was 9in. wide. Good gold had been obtained in the eastern vein (which is 10in. wide), just prior to my visit. The veins are converging, and will make together again in a few feet. . . . . .

"The first prospectors dollied over thirty ounces of gold from the few tons of ore they took out of the mine. Two or three rich specimens were taken for exhibition, and the balance, some twelve tons (or most of it) was taken to the Mount Burgess Battery, and treated there. Taking the results together, the ore that has been treated to the present runs about six ounces of gold to the ton.

"I am of opinion that if this mine is worked properly it will prove to be a good payable one."

From Mr. ROBERT GIBSON'S Report:—

"No. 1 shaft has been sunk to a depth of 42ft., the first 32ft. being in soft decomposed rock, and the remaining 10ft. in schistose country. The width of the reef varied from 16in. to 10in. in the soft country, and averages 8in. in bottom of shaft, where it shows splendid coarse gold the whole length of the shaft. Bulk sample, from which all the free gold showing was excluded, gave the magnificent return of 80oz. to the ton. . . . . .

"No. 2 shaft is 3 chains N.E. of No. 1, and is 19ft. deep—the reef in bottom of shaft showing 10in. of stone. Bulk sample giving a return of 2oz. to the ton. . . . . Towards the south-west boundary a costeen exposes a gold-bearing ironstone formation, 30ft. in width, which is well worthy of further development. . . . . .

"In concluding, gentlemen, I wish to congratulate you on possessing an extremely rich and valuable property, and one which I have every confidence will prove highly payable as development proceeds. I have much pleasure in recommending it as a sound and remunerative investment."

From Mr. P. J. ROBERTSON'S Report:—

"The lode is very rich, averaging 2ft. 6in. throughout, and improving as it goes down to a depth with every appearance of permanency, showing good gold from top to bottom in both these shafts, with the same result in the stone now in grass. From a fair sample taken by myself I got a return of 37oz. to the ton. . . . . .

"There is an ample supply of timber on adjoining Crown lands for all mining purposes. . . . . .

"In conclusion, I have no hesitation in saying that in 'The Credo' you have one of the most valuable properties on the field, and can honestly recommend it as a thorough mining venture."

From Mr. G. A. STOCKFELD'S Report:—

"These Leases are admirably situated in a well-timbered country, where an abundant supply of timber for mining and fuel purposes can be procured at a comparatively low cost. A splendid dam site is available about one mile east from the property, having a good catchment area, and water to supply a sufficient number of stamps can be impounded at this spot by the construction of a good tank. . . . . A general sample taken from the reef in the bottom of this shaft (No. 1), and not picked or selected in any way, gave the magnificent return of 56oz. of gold to the ton. . . . . .

"I may say I have rarely had the opportunity of inspecting a more interesting reef or one more likely to prove a permanent and rich producer of gold. . . . . In conclusion, I can highly recommend 'The Credo' as being a valuable and genuine mining property, and one which should reflect the highest credit on all concerned in its development."

Copies of the above-mentioned reports, and cable, and of the "Western Australian Goldfields Courier," of 27th June, 1896, can be seen at the offices of the solicitors to the company, and on them all the foregoing statements made in this prospectus are based.

PURCHASE.

The price to be paid by the company for the property has been fixed by the vendor at £80,000, payable at the option of the directors of the company in cash or fully paid shares of the company at par, or partly in cash and partly in such fully paid shares. The vendor will pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the establishment and formation of the company down to the first general allotment of shares (except ad valorem stamp duty on agreements and assurances of the property).

AGREEMENTS.

The agreements entered into are (a) agreement dated October 24, 1896, between Reginald Chanter of the one part, and Frank George Smalpage of the other part for the sale of the property by the former to the latter; (b) agreement dated November 27, 1896, between Frank George Smalpage of the one part and this company of the other part, for the resale of the property to the company, and payment of the formation and promotion expenses.

There may be other agreements (to none of which this company is a party) which may be contracts within the 38th Section of the Companies Act, 1867. Applicants for shares shall be deemed to have full notice of such agreements, and to have agreed with the company as trustee for the directors and other persons who may be liable to waive any claims they may have against them for not more fully complying with the requirements of that section.

The above specified agreements (a) and (b), and a copy of the memorandum and articles of association, may be inspected at the offices of the company's solicitors.

Applications for shares should be made upon the accompanying form, and forwarded to the bankers of the company, together with the amount payable on application. If no allotment be made the deposit will be returned in full, and when the number of shares allotted is less than the number applied for the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment.

Prospectuses and forms of application for shares can be obtained from the bankers, solicitors, and at the offices of the company.

London, November, 1896.

THE CREDO GOLD MINES (Limited).

FORM OF APPLICATION.

To the Directors of THE CREDO GOLD MINES (Limited).

Gentlemen,—

S. J. WARING & SONS, LIM.

S. J. WARING & SONS, 181, Oxford-street, London, and at Liverpool and Manchester; and the RENAISSANCE GALLERIES, 104, New Bond-street, London, W.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893.

SHARE CAPITAL, £480,000,

DIVIDED INTO

46,000 Five-and-a-Half per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £5 each	£230,000
50,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each	250,000
	£480,000

There will also be issued £130,000 First Mortgage Debenture Stock, bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum.

The Debenture Stock will be redeemable at any time after September 30th, 1906, at the Company's option, on six months' notice being given, at 110 per cent.

The Debenture Stock will be secured on the freehold and leasehold properties, plant, &c., of the Company valued in Liverpool and Manchester by Mr. W. Thomson, and in London by Messrs. Vigers & Co., exclusive of goodwill, at £59,854

And by a floating first charge on the undertaking, and on the stock, book debts, cash in hand, and other floating assets; which will, when the Company commences business, amount together to £292,275. The Company, by the Trust Deed, covenants that the value of the stock-in-trade, good book debts, and cash in hand, shall not, during the currency of the security, fall below 250,000

The £130,000 Debenture Stock will thus be secured upon assets of the minimum value of £309,854

The interest on the Debenture Stock will be payable half-yearly, on June 30th and December 31st in each year. The Preference Shares are cumulative as to dividend, and rank for Capital in priority to the Ordinary Shares. The dividends will be payable half-yearly, to June 30th and December 31st in each year. Preference Shareholders will be entitled to attend and vote at meetings of the Company at which any question affecting their rights or privileges is to be considered. The first payment of interest and dividend on the Debenture Stock and Preference Shares to June 30th, 1897, will be computed from the due dates of the respective instalments.

None of the Ordinary Shares are offered for Subscription, the whole being taken by Messrs. Waring and the other Directors and employés. Messrs. Waring reserve the right to apply for and be allotted £60,000 in Preference Shares.

The Debenture Stock and the Preference Shares are now offered for subscription, the Debenture Stock at £105 per cent. and the Preference Shares at £5. 5s. per Share, the instalments being payable as follows:—

	Debenture Stock.	Preference Shares.
On Application	£10 0 0 per cent.	£0 10 0 per Share.
On Allotment (including premium)	45 0 0 ,,	1 15 0 ,,
On January 18, 1897 ...	50 0 0 ,,	3 0 0 ,,

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire the business of furniture manufacturers and dealers, upholsterers, decorators, &c., now owned by or carried on under the title of S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited, at 181, Oxford-street, London, Bold-street, Liverpool, and Deansgate, Manchester; and also to acquire the business of the well-known Renaissance Galleries, 104, New Bond-street, London, and the greater part of the stock-in-trade thereof, and to acquire the freehold and leasehold interest in certain premises in Liverpool and London, in which the Company's business is carried on.

The business of Messrs. Waring was originally established in Liverpool in 1845, as that of wholesale cabinet makers. In the last four or five years they have absorbed a number of similar businesses in Liverpool, and have secured most of the important public contracts given out in the North of England, such as the furnishing or decorating of—

Courts of Justice, York.
County Council Buildings, Derby.
School Board Offices, Salford.
Birkenhead Town Hall.
Senior Conservative Club, Liverpool.
Morley Hotel, Manchester.
Queen's Hotel, Southport.
Exchange Hotel (L. & Y. Ry.), Liverpool.
Bootle Town Hall, &c., &c.

In 1891 Messrs. Waring extended their business to Manchester, and in 1893 opened business in London. In the short space of three years the London business has reached large dimensions, and it is still increasing. The greater portion of the decorating and furnishing of the Hotel Cecil on the Thames Embankment, the entire decorating and furnishing of the Hans Crescent Hotel, Sloane-street, S.W., and the entire decorating of the Prince's Restaurant, Piccadilly, are three out of many large orders secured in open competition with the largest metropolitan furnishing firms, and by reason, Messrs. Waring believe, of the superior merit of their work and manufactures.

The firm have recently been entrusted with the furnishing of the Hôtel Regina, Cimiez, Nice (a portion of which has been let to Her Majesty the Queen for the spring of next year), and of the Terminus Hotel, Bordeaux, which is under the control of the Compagnie Wagon Lits.

Amongst important contracts now on hand may be mentioned the fitting up for Messrs. Laird Brothers of the four new mail steamers for the Holyhead and Kingstown service of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, decorating and furnishing at the Queen Anne Mansions, decorating Sheen House (the late residence of the Comte de Paris), and numerous important private contracts which, as will readily be understood, cannot be specified here.

It will be seen, therefore, that the business of Messrs. Waring & Sons has been continuously progressive, and it is still rapidly expanding. The Company is at present one of the largest retail cabinet makers in the United Kingdom.

The Messrs. Waring have all been practically trained in the business; they will, as heretofore, take a most active part in the management; and (with the exception of a small proportion to be taken by other Directors and by employés) they will hold all the Ordinary Shares in the Company.

Messrs. W. H. Walker & Co., Chartered Accountants, Liverpool, certify as follows:—

"42, Castle-street, Liverpool, November 18, 1896.

"To the Directors of S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited.

"DEAR SIRS,—We have acted as Auditors to Messrs. S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited, since February, 1893, and have also examined the books and accounts of the Renaissance Galleries, 104, New Bond-street, London, for the seven and a half years ending June 30, 1896.

"Owing to the development of Messrs. Waring's business, the opening of new branches, and the time and preliminary expenses incurred in connection therewith, the returns prior to January 31, 1895, form no criterion of profits. Their London Branch was only opened in 1893, and the Manchester Branch settled on its present basis in 1895.

"After payment of expenses of every description, including all expenditure of advertising, making provision for bad and doubtful debts, and all needful depreciation of assets, and without anticipating profits on work in hand (but before charging interest on loans and other matters which the capital of the new Company will render unnecessary), we are satisfied that the combined profits for the period from January 31, 1895, to June 30th, 1896, of the businesses amounted to not less than £60,000, or at the rate of £42,353 per annum.—Yours faithfully,

"W. H. WALKER & CO."

The business for the four months from June 30th, 1896, to October 31st, 1896, shows a very large increase (over 40 per cent.) compared with the business for the corresponding period of the previous year. Apart, however, from any increase, and taking the above profits, namely		£42,350
The sum required to pay—
Interest on the Debenture Stock amounts to	£5,850
Dividend on the Preference Shares	12,650
Leaving for Directors' remuneration, Dividend on Ordinary Shares, Reserve Fund, &c.		£23,850

The present Company takes over the business and property of Messrs. S. J. Waring & Sons, Limited (the old Company), as a going concern, from June 30th, 1896, subject to all liabilities on that date, and takes over the business and the greater part of the stock of the Renaissance Galleries as from the date of completion of the purchase thereof. The profits of the businesses from the respective dates named accrue to this Company.

Application will be made in due course to the Committees of the Stock Exchanges in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Dublin, for a special settlement and official quotation for the Debenture Stock and the Preference Shares.

Applications for the Debenture Stock and Preference Shares should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and sent with the deposit payable on application to the Bankers of the Company:—Messrs. Leyland & Bullins, Castle-street, Liverpool, and branches, or to their Agents; Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock, & Co., 15, Lombard-street, London; Messrs. Williams Deacon and Manchester and Salford Bank, Limited, Mosley-street, Manchester, or any of their branches; the Bank of Ireland, Dublin, Belfast, and branches.

Full prospectuses can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and Auditors.

No. 181, Oxford-street, London, November 25, 1896.

List Opens ten o'clock, Monday, November 30th; Closes on Wednesday, December 2nd.

MOTOR CAR DIVIDENDS.—This is the Original Parent Syndicate of the whole Horseless Carriage Trade now Beginning.

This Syndicate is sole owner of all the principal British motor car master patents of known and admitted value. None may manufacture nor use in this country any of the latest and successful types of motor cars, made by Daimler, De Dion, Bollée, Panhard & Levassor, and Peugeot-Daimler, Pennington, and numbers of other patents, without first purchasing licenses or paying a royalty. . . Large sums are already being received in cash by this Syndicate from manufacturers for licenses to make motor cars in this country. . . The royalties and sums of money now offering for this permission are far more numerous than ever before! . . . Increasing dividends and bonuses are therefore being regularly paid to our shareholders. The £1 shares are freely dealt in at £3 upwards. Fabulously high prices are certain to be realised in the near future. The Syndicate is still acquiring latest and most valuable patents.

THE BRITISH MOTOR SYNDICATE, LTD.

(Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893.)

Registered Capital, £1,000,000, in £1 Shares, which can now only be obtained at a premium.

PRESENT PRICE, £3, payable 10s. on application, £1 10s. on allotment, and £1 one month after allotment.

The proposals to buy from this Syndicate licenses to form Companies to build motor cars under our master patents, and the purchase moneys to be paid to the Syndicate in connection therewith now exceed £800,000 (eight hundred thousand pounds). These immense sums being profit, are divisible upon completion amongst the shareholders. This Parent Syndicate has already received in cash for licenses during the last 12 months upwards of £200,000 from motor-car manufacturers in this country, now daily increasing.

Since the passing of the Act authorising the use of motors, the orders and inquiries received for motor vans and cars have become so numerous that it will be a long time before the various works, now working early and late, under our licenses, can possibly overtake or keep pace with them.

Success Certain.—Business Houses Decide.—Messrs. Peter Robinson, Messrs. Liberty & Co., Whiteley's, Harrod's Stores, "Vel Vel" Drapers, D. H. Evans & Co., and other leading established commercial houses have already decided upon vans driven by motors instead of horses, and given orders for their immediate construction. This is conclusive proof of the remarkable events about to take place, and the increasing revenue to this, the parent, syndicate. Surprising developments will shortly be announced.

Patentees.

HENRY P. HOLT, of Crossley Bros., Manchester, "Otto" Gas Engine Makers.
GOTTLIEB DAIMLER, Inventor Daimler Motor Carriage (Master Patents).
W. WORBY BEAUMONT, the "Engineer."
M. BOLLÉE, inventor Bollée Voiturette.
E. J. PENNINGTON, inventor Pennington Motor.
COUNT DE DION, inventor De Dion Motor Cycle.
WALTER C. BERSEY, inventor Electric Cab and Carriages.
J. J. HENRY STURMEY, editor, Autocar; and many others.

Directors.

Thos. Humber, Founder Humber Cycle Company.
Thos. Robinson, Great Horseless Carriage Company, Limited (Director of).
Lord Norreys, The Road and Path Cycling Association (President of).

Brokers—Ernest T. Hooley, Nottingham; Chapman & Rowe, Stock Exchange, London.
Bankers—The London and Midland Bank, Cornhill, and Newgate-street, London E.C., and other Branches.
Solicitors—Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co., 17, Throgmorton-avenue, E.C.
Consulting Engineer—Frederick R. Simms, C.E., Amberley House, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.
Secretary and Offices—E. F. Peirson, Chartered Accountant, 59, Holborn-viaduct, London, E.C.

The position of this Syndicate is so unusual in relation to the control of almost the entire motor car industry in this country, that the directors fear lest their statements should be misunderstood. It is doubtful if any such prospects have ever been before any Company.

It is just one of those occasions when the superiority of engineering over animal power enables great fortunes to be made.

The directors are of opinion that no such sums of money have ever been received from any patent monopoly, as the payments now beginning to be made to this syndicate for royalties and licenses from manufacturers of motor vans and carriages under the original motor car patents, of which those of any known importance belong solely to this Syndicate.

The leading motor car companies here, including the "Daimler" Company, the "Great Horseless" Company, and others, are already working under licenses from this Syndicate. The payments already received from this source alone exceed £200,000.

The following increasing dividends have been paid:—

May.—10 per cent., or at the rate of 30 per cent. per annum.

July.—30 per cent., or at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum.

September.—100 per cent bonus in shares of licensed companies—which, if taken at market prices, equals a total of over 100 per cent. per annum on the issued capital.

The above is sufficient to indicate the extraordinary value of the assets of this Company.

This British Motor Syndicate was originally formed by a few capitalists, including the Managing Director of the Humber Cycle Company; the President of the Motor Car Club, and the purchaser of the late Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company and its patents. The object was to obtain in this country a complete monopoly to the Syndicate of all motor car patents deemed of any value. £40,000 was first given in cash for the German inventions, including the original Daimler patents, admitted to be the foundation of the system. More than £40,000 was next paid in cash for French inventions, including those of Messrs. Bollée, De Dion and Bouton, Loyal, and others. Over £160,000 has been expended in cash and shares for British and American inventions of immense value, such as those of Henry P. Holt, of Crossley Bros., Manchester, whose vast experience of gas-engines is well known; W. Worby Beaumont, of the "Engineer;" Henry Sturmey, of the "Autocar," and others.

The varied demands in connection with the new traffic are so overwhelming, that quite a number of huge works and factories will still be wanted to deal with the different branches of light and heavy kinds of vehicles for motor traffic everywhere. All these new works will require to pay royalty to this the parent syndicate before they can use our patents.

High prices can be freely obtained for motor vans for quick delivery, and this excitement will rapidly increase, as it is now doing in Paris, as their convenience and economy becomes further known.

That the motor is as certain to supersede animal power as the railway and steam power has done already is no longer a matter of any doubt.

The superiority of machinery over animal power is so certain to be appreciated that no investment could be safer or more certain to rise in value. Our fathers built their fortunes out of the introduction of machinery. Motors are now far beyond the experimental stage, and may be seen working in different parts of the country with that economy and precision for which machinery is well known.

Horses work for a few hours only, motors keep on incessantly. Horses shy and take fright, motors cannot. Horses tire, and go more slowly, motors run full speed day and night. Horses fall down and run lame, motors never slip anywhere. Horses eat as much resting as working, motors require nothing when at rest. Horses sicken and die, with entire loss, motors can be renewed in any part.

The following proposals are now before the Syndicate for new companies, representing large amounts in purchase moneys. If successfully carried through, they again return to the Syndicate more than its own capital: London Electrical Cab Company, London Motor Omnibus Company, Liverpool and Manchester Motor Service, Limited, Metropolitan Motor Railway Company, Belfast Motor Car Company, Dublin Parcels Express Motor Company, Irish Motor Light Railways, Limited, West Australian Motor Service, Limited, South African Town-to-Town Transit, Limited, Manchester and District Motor Light Railway Company (connecting the outlying suburbs upon a system many times cheaper than tramways), Middlesex Railway Extension Scheme, Highland Motor Railways, Edinburgh and Glasgow Motor Van Delivery, Limited.

Surprising developments will shortly be announced.

The following facts have been attested and winessed by hundreds of thousands of spectators of the Lord Mayor's procession and the great London to Brighton ride of our motor carriages:—

Attention Required.—Motor carriages will run from 50 to 100 miles with each charge of fluid.

Speed.—A speed of from 12 to 30 miles an hour is easily attained, and continued day and night.

Fitting to existing Carriages, and Cost of Same.—These motors can be fitted to existing carriages at a cost of from £40 and upwards, according to the carriage and horse-power required.

Horse-power.—Motors, according to these patents, can be made any necessary horse-power.

Weight.—Some of them, like the Pennington Motor, can be made to weigh only a few pounds, and yet develop two-horse-power.

Cost.—Various motor vehicles can be produced under the many patents at a cost of from £60 and upwards.

Silence.—Can be fitted with specially-constructed pneumatic tyres and the latest improved silencing systems.

Regulators.—These vehicles will run either "slow" "half-speed" "full-speed," or "reverse," and a youth, with absolute safety, can use them.

Orders.—These will be executed in strict rotation as received.

Comparison.—Compared with horses and carriages, the motor is much cheaper both in first cost and maintenance.

Light Railways.—Industries which have hitherto been most seriously handicapped by the cost of transit will obtain an entirely new outlet. Each farmer can have his own motor light railway.

Tramways.—The new system should not alone revolutionise traffic on roads, but also on rails in cities, the present horse tramway being superseded by motor tramways.

Directors.—This Company will be guided by practical men, connected with allied trades and companies, the shares of which now stand at substantial premiums.

Paris-Marseilles decisive Contest.—10 days' motor racing.—All kinds of roads and weather.—Winners.—At the finish, conclusive proof was given of the superiority of the British Motor Syndicate patents, which were declared winners—first, second, third, fourth, and fifth. No more decided victory could possibly have been gained.

The Great Brighton Ride.—The public will soon learn the immense difference between our latest types of motor vehicles, which are simply perfect in comparison with last year's makes. All the best cars will bear a plate, certifying careful testing and examination by the committee of the Motor Car Club, who have more experience in motors and motor cars than any other body in this country.

Immense Prospects.—"Few people who witnessed the great motor demonstration on Saturday last can fully realise what it means. That we are now on the eve of one of our greatest epochs is clear! The world's traffic is to revolutionised, but naturally not without cost. Millions of money are to change hands! Huge fortunes will be amassed by the poorest, and that, perhaps, quickly! From the baker's cart to the loveliest of equipages, all are interested. Saturday's great London-Brighton test has for ever proved that we may travel much faster, much easier, and at less cost. A four-in-hand makes five changes, and employs 20 horses to do what one little motor can easily accomplish. Those who have this great industry in hand may make fortune after fortune out of a great patent monopoly for an entirely new traffic. The railway excitement and wild mania of our forefathers will soon be entirely eclipsed by a greater public motor boom than has ever been witnessed.

"Mr. Lawson's great triumph of Saturday, as he led his car to Brighton amid the acclamations and waving banners of hundreds of thousands of people, has a historically significant meaning. The unparalleled enthusiasm rolls back the sneers of those captious critics of this dawning of a great national prosperity.

"The millions of money invested both in our great British railways and vast cycling trade will be dwarfed before the exacting demands of this new motor industry. Tens of thousands of motor parcels vans, motor carriages, motor omnibuses, motor cycles, motor agricultural machines, motor wagons, motor voiturettes, must be immediately manufactured at a cost of hundreds of thousands of pounds. Nearly every motor vehicle extant will be under tribute to the British Motor Syndicate, the owners of the master patents. Licenses are being applied for from principal towns in the country, and omnibus, tram, carriage and cycle will all be compelled to contribute to the wealth of the British Motor Syndicate. The events of Saturday will be an everlasting memorial to the man who has with such an amount of pluck and daring secured the monopoly of this great trade to the British Isles."—Sun.

The British Motor Syndicate.—"The shares of this important parent undertaking are attracting a good deal of attention just now, and it is not improbable that there will be a very active market in them before long.

"Investors are only just beginning to realise the enormous proportions which the motor car industry is bound to assume, and the fuller the grasp they get of the great future which lies before the industry, the more attention they will give to companies which, like the British Motor Syndicate, own the master patents of these new vehicles.

"That there are big fortunes to be made out of the motor car by those who are early in the field cannot be doubted, and it need only be said that the British Motor Syndicate is the pioneer of the industry.

"There are some who go so far as to say that the shares of this Company, which can be bought to-day for £3, will go in time to £40 or £50 each.

"It will be admitted that it is not often that hundreds of thousands of pounds are paid in cash for licenses to manufacture under letters patent; but it is, we believe, a fact that this Syndicate has already received such sums from makers of motor cars who wish to use the patents which the Syndicate has acquired.

"The British Motor Syndicate, in fact, claims to be master of the situation, and it seems pretty certain that a portion of the profit on the manufacture of nearly every motor car that is put upon the road will go into its coffers.

The Imperial Institute Exhibiton and the Wembley Park Exhibition, which did so much to educate public opinion regarding the new carriages, were organised by this syndicate, and the companies which manufacture under its licenses include the Great Horseless Carriage Company and the Daimler Company—undertakings whose names are likely to be as familiar as household words before long.

"There is practically no limit to the profits which the Company like the British Motor Syndicate may make, for it possesses a monopoly of the best patents, the value of which it would be difficult to over-estimate."—Investors' Guardian.

The excitement in the share market, the immense premiums now being realised and enormous dividends paid in kindred industries, sufficiently indicate what the immediate future of this Company is likely to become.

Applications for shares should be made on the accompanying form, and forwarded with the amount payable on application to the secretary or bankers.

The Memorandum and Articles of Association and copies of the above specified contracts can be inspected at the offices of the Syndicate, 40, Holborn Viaduct.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
"TRUTH" TOY AND DOLL SHOW.

I would again impress upon the ladies who are dressing dolls for the coming TRUTH Show at the Royal Albert Hall that it will be necessary for all such dolls to be returned to this Office by mid-day on Saturday, the 12th of this month, at the latest. Those ladies and gentlemen also who may be engaged on Home-made Toys will please bear the above date in mind. The Show, as announced last week, will be open during Wednesday and Thursday, December 16 and 17, at the Albert Hall, Kensington Gore. Further particulars will be announced next week. Meanwhile, any contribution in aid of the Toy Fund will be gratefully received.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 928.

The prize in this competition has been awarded to EBORACUM, whose lines containing rhymes to "syringe" and "pickaxe" will be found below. I may add that many of the competitors supplied rhymes to the second syllables only of the above words. That was so easy a task that I should never have thought of setting it as the subject of a TRUTH competition. "Syringe" and "pickaxe" had, of course, to be rhymed as dissyllables. They could not, indeed, be rhymed in any other way without accenting incorrectly the final syllables "inge" and "axe."

PRIZE STANZA.

Negations, in some English words, upon the prefix ir hinge—
E.g., "an ir-religious man," an ir-receptive syringe.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 932.

I have been asked several times of late to give another "Rebus" competition. On looking back I find it is many years since such a competition was given in these pages, and seeing how near we are to Christmas I think the wish of my correspondents may fairly be complied with. In the first place, however, it may be well for the sake of new competitors to show what a Rebus is; and I cannot do better than quote, by way of example, one of the simple Rebuses known to most of us in our youth. Here it is:—

"If the B mt put: if the B . putting:"

The elucidation of this enigmatic sentence is sufficiently obvious. It is, of course—

"If the grate be (Great B) empty put coal on (colon); if the grate be full stop putting coal on."

This, then, is the sort of puzzle sentence which TRUTH's competitors have to construct, though it is hoped that they will be able to turn out specimens much more elaborate and recondite than the one given above. At all events the usual prize of Two Guineas is offered for

THE MOST INGENIOUS ORIGINAL REBUS.

In forming these "Rebuses" competitors may use any letter, figure, punctuation or other mark that is to be found in a printer's ordinary fount of type. But it will be useless for competitors to include any diagram of drawing for which it would be necessary, in printing, to prepare a special block. Each Rebus must be accompanied by a full solution on a separate piece of paper. All answers must reach me by the morning of Monday December 14, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HOPETOWN.—The cheque had been sent before I received your letter.
CAVALIER.—The separate sheet of paper had become detached. However, I have, in accordance with your letter, given to "Cavalier" the credit of the charming lines, "To Cynthia."
WAVERLEY.—Many thanks for your letter.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

ORIGINAL SONGS SUITABLE TO BE SET TO MUSIC.

A VIGIL.

I enter from the forest gate
  Upon her hallowed ground;
I see her taper flickering through
  The twilight mists around.
Here will I watch the livelong night,
  Her threshold as my throne.
No earthly ills shall come anigh—
  My darling is alone.

Here will I watch the livelong night,
  And if a star should fall,
I'll hail it as an angel sent
  In answer to my call.
Come, spirits of the stars, come down
  From yonder azure steep,
And guard her soul from secret fears—
  My darling is asleep.

The hallowed vigil-night is o'er—
  The earliest morning rays
Shoot up from yon blue hills and set
  The silver clouds ablaze.
The thousand voices of the night
  An Easter carol make:
My night is gone, my sun is risen,
  My darling is awake.

Little Oxenbold.

SPINSTERS YET.

After nights of dissipation,
Seasons spent in mad flirtation,
After travels Continental,
Moonlight walks so sentimental,
Other girls their mates have met.
Why should we be spinsters yet?

After Christmas trees and feasts,
Supervised by smiling priests,
After teaching Sunday scholars,
Stitching "Dorcas" frocks and collars,
Ne'er a curate can we get,
And we still are spinsters yet.

After daring frowning mothers,
Stalking wealthy elder brothers—
Men have married plainer faces,
Men wed wives with fewer graces—
Can you wonder that we fret?
Still unwedded—spinsters yet.

Kindly tell us where the hitch is,
Is it want of rouge—or riches?
Waist too large—or years too many?
We will alter all or any;
For it is our chief regret
That we should be spinsters yet.

Free Lance.

CASTLES.

A child was building a castle
  In the glow of the winter fire,
On his little face was the dreamy thought
  Of his childish heart's desire;
And his eyes grew bright as he whispered,
  "I will do whatever I can,
I will build just such a castle
  When I grow to be a man."

A youth was stretched in the sunlight,
  His book had slipped from his hand;
He, too, was building a castle
  Away on a foreign strand.
"The world is wide," he murmured,
  "There is nothing that may not be,
I will build just such a castle,
  When I cross the bounding sea."

A man had builded a castle
  Of fame and the world's renown;
For its smiles the builder had striven,
  And nought he feared but its frown.
But his castle had crumbled to ruins,
  And its ashes had whitened his hair,
While the golden dream of his boyhood
  Was still but a castle of air.

THE SONG OF THE BEETLE.

He was such a sober beetle,
Yet one day he drank a leetle,
Just a very, very leetle drop of beer;
Which, ascending to the region
Where the insect's brains were legion,
Made that most abstemious creature slightly queer.

At this moment he would rather
Not have met his gallant father,
But, of course, to run against him was his fate;
And the freedom of his diction,
Caused the parent great affliction,
And the terrible abandon of his gait!

Like a bear, then, with a sore ear,
Daddy fetched the family lawyer,
And he found the shrivelled Shebner not unwilling
To concur in his decision,
That his will required revision,
And they cut the toper off without a shilling.

Now, then, readers young and hoary,
Here's the moral of my story—
Sure it seems a thousand pities, does it not?
That the silly-billy beetle,
If he hadn't drank a leetle,
Might have been the proud possessor of a lot!

Malaprop.

HERE, MY SWEET.

Here, my sweet, and there, my sweet,
  And everywhere, my dearie,
My heart would meet, my heart would greet,
  And ne'er of you grow weary.

Here, my dear, and there, my dear,
  And everywhere, you sweet, you,
All out of gear, till you draw near,
  And I can fly to meet you.

Here, my love, and there, my love,
  And everywhere, my darling,
I roam and rove like some lost dove,
  Or uncompanioned starling.

Here, my wife, and there, my wife,
  And everywhere, mine only,
Be in my life, 'twill end my strife,
  And I no more be lonely.

Christie Deas.

FROM MORNING UNTIL NIGHT.

Laughing by the way, singing by the way,
  Came a little child;
Picking weeds and flowers, dancing through the hours;
  Happy little child!

Musing by the way, dreaming by the way,
  Came a sweet-eyed maid;
With her lips apart, love born in her heart;
  Wondering, sweet-eyed maid!

Whisp'ring by the way, kissing by the way,
  Came a loving twain;
Love, the mighty king, subject-hearts they bring;
  Joyous, loving twain!

Working by the way, hoping by the way,
  Came a childed wife;
Trotting little feet made heart-music sweet;
  Blessed childed wife!

Weary by the way, silent by the way,
  Came a woman old;
With her patient face, turning from the place
  Where her love's lay cold.

Faith upon her way, dark and bitter way,
  Now her only light.
Thus that woman old, with her griefs untold,
  Passed into the night.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS.

New York, November 17th, 1896.

This Company has made arrangements to EXTEND its $3,997,000 FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS, maturing January 1st, 1897, so that the principle thereof shall become payable in one year from that date, viz., on January 1st, 1898, with interest meanwhile payable semi-annually, January 1st, and July 1st, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, principle and interest payable in United States gold coin. The right is reserved to redeem the Bonds so extended, at any time, on paying to the Bondholders the par or face value of the Bonds, and interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 1st, 1897, in United States gold coin, less such interest accrued subsequent to that date as may have been paid thereon before such redemption thereof. The right of the Bondholders to avail themselves of such extension has been reserved to such holders as, prior to December 15th, 1896, shall deposit their Bonds for that purpose with Messrs. Speyer & Co., New York, or with Messrs. Speyer Brothers, London, or Mr. Laz Speyer Ellissen, Frankfort-on-the-Main, or Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Brothers, Amsterdam.

The extended Bonds will be stamped to show the extension, and new coupon sheets will be annexed, representing future interest.

Copies of the extension agreement can be obtained at the Company's Office, and at the Offices of the Bankers above mentioned. The present extension is made to the date of maturity of the latest maturing Central Pacific First Mortgage Bonds, on or before which date the Company expects to arrange a long extension of the entire First Mortgage issue.

C. P. HUNTINGTON,
Vice-President.

Until further notice a bonus of ½ per cent., viz:—£1 on each bond of $1,000, will be paid by us to Bondholders, upon presentation of their Bonds at our Offices for extension under the foregoing Notice.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.
COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.

ENTRE NOUS.

WEDNESDAY and Thursday next, the 16th and 17th of this month, will be red-letter days in the Truth calendar. On those dates the Seventeenth Truth Toy and Doll Show will be held at the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington Gore, W., the use of that building having for the fifth time been most kindly placed, free of charge, at my disposal by the managing body. The Show will be opened each day to the public between the hours of 10.30 a.m. and 10 p.m., and, in accordance with the invariable precedent on such occasions, no charge will be made for admission. Visitors will be merely required to leave an address card with the commissionaires at the doors; but I may be allowed to add that there will be collecting boxes at various fixed points in the Hall. The Show is certain to be a good one; the number of dressed dolls included in it being larger than at any previous exhibition. Since last year, too, additional arrangements for the more satisfactory display of the smaller dolls have been completed. I hope the attendance of visitors will be very numerous, and would therefore ask the readers of Truth to make this announcement as widely known as possible.

On Saturday it was once more my privilege to take my usual supernumerary part in that very pleasant mystery which is annually enacted at this office, and which might not inappropriately be designated "The Cab, the Commissionaire, and the newly-minted Coins." It will be gathered from this that the anonymous donor who has for so many years followed his own excellent example, has once more sent me the Sixpences which, at his wish, I distribute amongst the elder children of the Workhouse Schools in the Metropolitan area. The bags of coins were accompanied by this letter:—

London, December 1, 1896.

Dear Sir,—As you have for some years been kind enough to undertake the distribution of the new sixpences amongst the children of the London workhouses, and their schools and hospitals, I am sure it will require no apology from me for again asking you to do the same with the eleven thousand coins that accompany this note, feeling sure that you will regard it as a labour of love.—Believe me, yours sincerely obliged,

A Friend.

The Editor Truth.

I need scarcely add how gladly I shall undertake the task of distributing the £275 thus generously presented, nor how sincerely I thank my persistently anonymous friend for his seasonable liberality.

Another correspondent who wishes me to guard his anonymity makes a contribution to the Toy Fund which will, I hope, result in an appreciable addition to its total. He offers me two Yorkshire Terrier pups, both females, and both four months old on the 15th of this month. I have the authority of my correspondent for saying that their pedigree is above suspicion, their grandfather and parents being in "the book," the former having won several prizes. Of course, the pups are now woolly, black with some tan marks, but in about six months' time, when full grown, they will have long silver-grey coats and silver-tan heads. Their weight will then be from 4 lb. to 4½ lb. I am prepared to sell them if I get a satisfactory bid; so what offers, please, for the Yorkshire Terrier pups?

Mr. "Rowland Grey" has repeated with great success this year his plan of stimulating local interest in the Truth Exhibition by organising a local competition Doll Show of his own at Harrow Weald. The seventy-nine dolls which were thus exhibited will prove a very interesting group at the Albert Hall next week. This idea of exhibiting the dolls locally is a most excellent one, and may be commended to the attention of those who may assist in the Truth Show next year.

A

IN THE NAME OF THE CHILDREN.

"What is the use," the cynic asks, "of giving dolls and toys
To pale-faced little workhouse girls and friendless London boys?
You waste your money," he declares, "when gifts like these you send,
And do not even earn the thanks of those you would befriend.

"Far better let the children be," he tells us with a sneer,
"Playthings are sadly out of place for those in their low sphere.
What can they want with dolls and toys? How can they understand
The meaning of those useless gifts you send with lavish hand?"

So says the cynic, but he speaks, as cynics often do,
Without the faintest knowledge of the things he would pooh-pooh.
So says the cynic; in reply a little tale we'll tell—
The story of a tragedy that but last week befell.

* * * * *

A simple annal of the poor: a bare and dark back-room;
A tiny, blue-eyed girl of four, left sitting in the gloom;
Left all alone, poor little mite, as on the darkness creeps,
With none to answer should she call, or soothe her if she weeps.

Alone and yet not quite alone, for see against her breast,
Wrapp'd in a tattered woollen rag, a battered doll is press'd.
A common, ugly doll at best, but oh! to her so dear.
That in her sweet solicitude she shows no sign of fear.

Her thoughts are only for her doll; lest it should feel alarm,
She whispers words of love as she enfolds it in her arm;
Her loneliness, her helplessness, she quite forgets to see,
And when she shivers she but thinks how cold her doll must be.

The fire has almost smouldered out, but now it is her aim
To fan the dying embers there once more to living flame;
Her dolly must be warm before it goes to bed, and so
With childish efforts she attempts to make the ashes glow.

Then tenderly she lays her doll, close to the grate, to sleep,
And sets herself, devoted still, her loving watch to keep;
When, as she bends for one last kiss, the flames—mischance most dire!—
Leap for a moment from the bars and set her dress on fire.

When presently the neighbours come, it is, alack! too late;
And all that love and skill can do cannot avert her fate.
The doll lies still where it was placed, snug in its cosy bed,
But ere the stars have ceased to shine the little girl is dead.

* * * * *

Then, let the cynic have his say. One incident like this Enables us his sneers and gibes to scornfully dismiss;
And gives us, too, yet stronger cause that earnest plea to make,
Which every Christmas we repeat for Charity's sweet sake.

Thousands of girls—remember that!—whose lives have known few joys,
Are waiting for their Christmas dolls: thousands of friendless boys,
For whom such words as "home" and "love" no meaning can possess,
Depend on you for their one taste of Yuletide happiness

Pardon us, then, if we essay your generous hearts to touch,
For what to you but little means implies for them so much.
The price of but one luxury, that you will scarcely miss,
May fill a score of children's lives with yet untasted bliss.

Come, then, we reckon on your aid, you've often helped of yore,
And never was your help required so urgently before.
The need has never been so sore, make it our happy fate
To find your sympathy till now has never been so great!

Below will be found a list of the subscriptions to the Toy Fund which have reached this office since the last announcement was made. To all those who have thus answered my appeal, I am exceedingly grateful, but it is still necessary to raise a large additional sum, if this Christmas distribution is to be carried out in its entirety. The demand for Dolls and Toys is larger than it has ever been before, and I will not even try to imagine what cruel disappointment would be caused to the expectant children, were it found impossible to comply with the pathetic appeals that have reached this office. The time, it must be remembered, is now very short, for the rest of the Toys required ought to be purchased by Saturday at the latest. One lady, by the way, forwards me the cost of the Christmas Cards she has decided not to send this year. Here is an example which might be widely followed, with no real loss to the community.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Victoria, and Prince and Princess Charles of Denmark are to arrive at Marlborough House to-morrow. Except for a Saturday-till-Monday visit to the Queen at Windsor, the Princess will stay in town until the 19th, when she is to return to Sandringham with Princess Victoria, and the Prince will join them there on the 23rd. The Duke and Duchess of Fife are to spend Christmas at Sandringham, and there will be a large shooting-party at the Hall from Monday, the 28th, until Saturday, January 2nd. On Monday, January 4, the Prince and Princess of Wales and Princess Victoria are going to Trentham Hall, Staffordshire, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland until Saturday, the 9th.

Prince and Princess Charles of Denmark are to leave Marlborough House towards the end of next week for Copenhagen, and a suite of more than twenty-five apartments in the immense palace of their uncle, the King of the Hellenes, has been decorated and furnished as a residence for them. Prince and Princess Charles are to stay in Denmark for several months.

It is announced that the Emperor and Empress of Russia "will pay a public visit to London next year," to which it is added that they are to occupy "the great State apartments at Buckingham Palace." The story is a pure fabrication. The Emperor and Empress have no intention whatever of visiting England next year, either privately or publicly, and it has already been settled that the Grand Duke Serge and the Grand Duchess Elizabeth are to represent the Court of St. Petersburg at the festivities of June. As to "the great State apartments," there are none. If the Emperor and Empress ever visit London, they will be lodged at Buckingham Palace in the Belgian Rooms.

A family arrangement has been privately made by which the fortune of the late Grand Duke of Hesse, and the £100,000 which the Queen settled on Princess Alice when she married, have been divided between the Grand Duke Ernest and his sisters, Princess Louis of Battenberg and Princess Henry of Prussia. The other sisters, the Empress of Russia and the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, have given back their shares.

The Duchess of Albany, who is now residing at Claremont, will go to Cannes early in February, for a stay of three months at the Villa Nevada.

The season at Dublin Castle next year is announced to begin on January 26, when Lord Cadogan will hold the first Levée, to be, as usual, followed by the Drawing Room on the next evening. Of late years, Viceroys had taken to postponing the commencement of the "season" until the first or even second week of February, but none has ever been known to prolong it past March 17. It is a step in the right direction to begin earlier, though it would have been better had a date in the middle of January been fixed. However, any step, even though a trifling one, in the right direction is something to be thankful for in connection with Dublin Castle. The institution is a perfect stronghold of tradition; year after year the old Household officials move, after the fashion of their kind, in the same old grooves. Changes of Viceroys make no difference, for, as I have often explained, each Viceroy begins by giving himself away by re-appointing the old officials.

Mr. Balfour intends to spend the Christmas holidays at Whittingham, his place in Haddingtonshire. He has promised to preside at a meeting at which the Master of Polwarth is to be presented by the Unionists of Haddingtonshire with his portrait, as a recognition of his having been their candidate for the county against Mr. Haldane at two elections. The portrait is by Sir George Reid, P.R.S.A.

The late Lord Savile was known throughout Europe as an able and popular diplomatist, and a distinguished authority on all artistic matters. In his own neighbourhood he had earned the reputation of being a most generous and considerate landlord, and a liberal as well as a large employer of labour. He carried out all kinds of costly improvements on his estates, and was always ready to meet the reasonable requests of his tenants. Considerable returns of rents were made for several years, and when it became clear that no early improvement in agricultural affairs could be expected, Lord Savile made an adequate permanent reduction in the rent of his farmers. His contributions to all local and county charities were munificent, and he enlarged or rebuilt many schools on his estates, and restored two churches of which he was the lay rector.

During his long residence at Brussels and at Rome Lord Savile collected a splendid gallery of pictures, and he was himself a most accomplished artist. He presented a large number of valuable pictures to the National Gallery, and the remainder of the collection is at Rufford Abbey, his delightful old seat in Notts, which is buried in beautiful woods. Lord Savile divided his fine collection of Roman antiquities between the Leeds and Nottingham Museums, and he made some valuable gifts to the British Museum. His death, after a long and painful illness, is sincerely lamented by a host of friends in all parts of Europe, and belonging to all classes of Society.

Sir Hugh Gilzean Reid writes that the King of the Belgians does not himself participate in the profits of the gambling in Belgium, and that a Bill is shortly to be brought in prohibiting public gambling in that country. This may be, but we must deal with actualities. Both in Ostend and in Spa there are gambling establishments practically as open to all the world as that of Monte Carlo. It is to be presumed that the concessionaries pay for the privilege accorded to them, and that this payment goes into the pockets of some one. Who it may be is a mere matter of detail. As a rule, gambling-houses do not pay openly to the Government which permits them, but many eminent personages receive douceurs privately. Thus, when the Palais Royal establishments existed in Paris, the Minister of Police received every evening a rouleau of fifty napoleons.

A hint to teetotallers. A temperance drink, known as "parsnip ale," was recently found by the Government chemist to contain more than thirteen per cent. of proof spirit, which made it a very much stronger tipple than any ordinary beer.

Mr. Andrew Lang recently related "At the Sign of the Ship," the story of the murder of one Fisher at Paramatta, which crime was said to have been detected, and the culprit arrested, tried, and hanged, through the ghost of the murdered man having appeared on the scene. "Now does any Australian archæologist know," asks Mr. Lang, "whether a report of this trial exists in the archives of Sydney?" I am asked by an "Australian archæologist" to assure Mr. Lang that no report is to be found, for these reasons: there was no Fisher, no murder, no ghost, no arrest, no trial, and no execution. "Fisher's ghost" was laid in New South Wales many years ago, and it has been left to Mr. Lang to resurrect the hoary-headed impostor. Perhaps he suspected it was a hoax all the time, though I fancy that constant draughts at the ever-flowing spring of "psychic" nonsense and humbug are making Mr. Lang, like Mr. Stead, rather inclined to swallow any fiction in this line, no matter how preposterous.

I expected better things of the Telegraph. A full half of one of its valuable columns was the other day devoted to a solemn review of "Professor" Garner's preposterous volume. It was described as "a really delightful book," and its author was asserted to have "few rivals at the present time." As irony this would be unexceptionable, but it is only too clear from the context that the gifted reviewer is perfectly serious. Long extracts from the book are given, describing Garner's life in his marvellous cage, and his cock-and-bull stories about the habits of chimpanzees and gorillas in their native jungles are all repeated, as though the impudent humbug of the whole business had never yet been exposed. I was rather amused the other day to find the Daily Chronicle setting itself to demolish Garner from a scientific point of view, and pronouncing upon the intrinsic evidence of the book itself, that the writer is an arrant impostor. After what is now known about the American "professor," this looks rather like employing a steam-hammer to crack a nut. But, at any rate, the Daily Chronicle's slating of Garner is more to its credit than the Telegraph's gush over his contributions to science. May I humbly suggest to my contemporaries that a diligent study of the columns of TRUTH may save even the wisest editor from being made a fool of?

As a practical journalist, I have always admired the business-like principles on which the Daily Telegraph is conducted, though I am opposed to the politics of the paper. But somebody must have been napping at the Daily Telegraph office when the idea of a national testimonial to Mr. Bayard was evolved. Christmas-boxes to other people's servants are a bad old custom at the best, but a Christmas-box to an Ambassador from the nation to which he is accredited could only compromise the recipient with his employers. However, good may come out of evil. The TRUTH Toy Fund is at present in a not too satisfactory position, and it is a form of Christmas-box to which no exception can possibly be taken. If the Daily Telegraph would hand over to that fund its own rejected offering to the American Minister, it would more than atone for its little indiscretion.

To-morrow (Thursday) night the Palace Theatre celebrates its fourth birthday with a monster programme, for the accommodation of which the licence has to be extended. It is a new idea for a music-hall to have an anniversary performance of this kind, but in this instance it is a very justifiable innovation. Under its present management the Palace has led the way in the revolution which has made the variety theatre the most fashionable form of entertainment in London, and has put the music-hall on a level with the legitimate drama. If this is not an achievement worthy of special annual commemoration, I don't know what is. It seems to be the ambition of the present management to rival not merely the theatre, but the opera-house, for in Madame Gorgé ("La Nouvelle Patti") they have introduced a vocalist, who, in brilliance of execution at any rate, is quite up to prima donna form.

Professor Sir Douglas Maclagan, M.D., LL.D., who is the eldest brother of the Archbishop of York, has decided to resign the Chair of Forensic Medicine in Edinburgh University at the end of this year. Sir Douglas has held this office since 1862, and it is worth about £800 a year.

Concerning bishops' aprons, I am told that this garment is historically nothing but a fragment of a cassock, being, in fact, the front part of a cassock with the back and sleeves cut off. Why bishops, or their tailors, have taken to mutilating cassocks in this way my informant does not explain. This information is given me as an answer to the lady who in last week's TRUTH charged the Bishop of Hereford with having himself appropriated a feminine garment. But ladies are not easily silenced, and perhaps I shall be told next that a cassock is only a feminine frock, deprived of its waist and buttoned all down the skirt. Whatever may be said about the cassock, however, there is strong reason for denying that the apron is essentially a feminine garment. For instance, blacksmiths and cobblers have worn aprons from time immemorial. The apron is, of course, the most ancient garment known, and, if we may trust the third chapter of Genesis, it was originally designed for the use of both sexes indiscriminately.

The Bishop-designate of London preached on Sunday week in the private chapel at Windsor Castle before the Queen, and on Tuesday an evening journal announced that the prelate "created a very favourable impression." My contemporary appears to be under the impression that this was Dr. Creighton's first sermon before the Queen, whereas he has several times occupied the pulpit of the private chapel, and it was in consequence of the "very favourable impression" which he created seven or eight years ago, when Canon of Worcester, that her Majesty in 1891 requested Lord Salisbury to give him a stall at Windsor; but he never took possession of this preferment, as his promotion to the See of Peterborough took place directly afterwards.

Bishop Tufnell's death has placed a canonry in Chichester Cathedral at the disposal of Bishop Wilberforce, this being the first stall that has become vacant since his translation to this see. The Chichester stalls are supposed to be worth £500 a year, with residence, but the Chapter revenue has been reduced by the agricultural depression, and the stipends of the residentiaries have fallen to £350, while the Dean has been cut down from £1,000 to £700. Bishop Tufnell was the senior member of the Chapter, having been collated to his canonry in 1882 by Bishop Durnford, after his resignation of the living of Croydon. It is expected that the vacant stall will be offered to Archdeacon Sutton, who now holds the Bishop's living of Pevensey, which is a very good one.

An evening journal commenced an obituary notice of Bishop Tufnell with the astounding statement that, "For a curate to rise to a bishop's estate is a lot which falls to few." There never was, and never will be, an Anglican bishop who did not commence his clerical career as a curate. A clergyman could not be ordained in priest's orders unless he had worked as a curate for a certain period.

The important living of Neath, which has been resigned by Archdeacon Griffiths, who has been Rector for nearly forty-two years, is in the gift of Lord Bute, but he cannot appoint, being a Roman Catholic, so the presentation will pass to the University of Oxford. Archdeacon Griffiths will retain the Archdeaconry of Llandaff, with stall in the Cathedral annexed, to which he was collated in 1877 by the late Bishop Ollivant.

I have been requested to "kindly withdraw the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, the Clerk of Parliaments, the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, and the Doorkeepers of the House of Lords from the list of 'cormorants' who prey upon new Archbishops." I cheerfully withdraw all these functionaries, and for the credit of the remaining cormorants, I should add that "the total fees payable to the House of Lords by Dr. Temple will amount to £27, which sum will be wholly paid over to her Majesty's Exchequer for the benefit of the public." My original informant is usually a fairly accurate individual, but on this occasion he seems to have omitted to follow the late Dean Burgon's advice respecting the verification of references.

Concerning the dispute as to the parish school at Feniscowles, near Blackburn, which was mentioned in last week's TRUTH, I am informed by Sir W. L. Feilden that the school and school-house were built by his family sixty years ago for the benefit of the children of their tenantry. Some time back the Vicar put forward a claim to the premises as Church property, which claim was persisted in until Sir William took proceedings in defence of his title. There have since been negotiations for the settlement of the matter, and Sir William offered the use of the school at a nominal rent of £20, which was to be remitted each rent day on condition that the Vicar and managers kept the buildings in repair. To meet a difficulty which was raised, he finally offered to accept "the still nominal ground rent in perpetuity of £10 or £11 a year, the school, school-house, and 1,340 yards of land to become, subject to this payment, the absolute property of the Vicar and managers." It is this arrangement which has now been agreed upon.

In a recent sermon at Oxford-place Chapel, Leeds, the Rev. S. Chadwick referred to the death of the editor of the Leeds Mercury, and, according to a local contemporary, "he suggested that they might look upon it as a judgment of God that, in the course of a brief six months, death should remove two men from the editorial chair of a newspaper which once denounced betting and now openly published betting news." What a fantastic conception of Divine goodness, wisdom, justice, and mercy this reverend gentleman must have! Consider the meaning of his remark. It plainly implies that God disapproves of the publication of betting news, and that the singular way in which He manifests His disapproval is to wait patiently until one particular newspaper has come into line with its rivals by publishing such news, and then to let His wrath fall, at intervals of six months, on the editors of that journal. Meanwhile, all other sinners on the Press are left to pursue their wicked ways, and no miracle is worked in their case for the assistance of the Anti-Gambling League. Such, it seems, is the Chadbandian idea of the working of the Divine will!

The Hon. Secretary of the last Church Congress asks me to contradict the statement that there has been any disappointment among the guarantors over the result of the Shrewsbury Congress. The Hon. Secretary states that every guarantor gave his guarantee knowing that the call might amount to 10s.; and as the call only amounted to 4s. 6d., the guarantors have more reason for congratulation than for disappointment. It is also pointed out that there are very few towns where a hall can be found capable of seating 2,500 to 3,000 comfortably, and I must admit that there is force in this remark.

Has an Anglican Vicar the right to refuse to celebrate a marriage in his church when one of the parties has not been baptised? Such a right has been assumed, and exercised in a recent case, by the Vicar of Abingdon. The bridegroom whose prospective happiness was thus thwarted was himself a Churchman, the bride being a Nonconformist of some description. The laws relating to the Church of England are in all respects anomalous, but I am under the impression that all members of the community have a right to be married in the State churches, on fulfilling the required formalities, and that religious tests have no place in these formalities. If that is not the law, it ought to be, so long as the churches are State establishments.

Well, well! How surprised the Apostles would have been had they learnt that some admirer of a monarch—Jewish or Roman—had sent them a dinner service of gold plate to show their appreciation of this monarch's virtues. But we are not in the days of the Apostles, therefore it is not surprising that the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have received a communion service in pure gold from a millionaire, desirous to testify in this manner his personal gratitude to her Majesty for having reigned sixty years over us. Still, I should hardly have thought this quite in accordance with the Scriptural injunction that commands us to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. I would suggest that the service be melted down, and the proceeds devoted to relieve some of the want that is always with us.

If public authorities, in the exercise of their official duty, send dogs to be destroyed at the Dogs' Home, the public authorities ought to pay for the job. This is an opinion that I have expressed before, but it seems to call for reiteration in view of the urgent appeal for funds which the Battersea Home for Lost Dogs is now issuing. During the last eleven months, owing to the operation of the Muzzling Order, 40,016 lost dogs have been received at the Home, and the demands upon the lethal-chamber, resulting from this influx of visitors, have been such that a new crematorium has had to be built at a cost of over £300. All the dogs, it must be remembered, have to be kept at the expense of the Home for not less than five days before they are destroyed. The funds of the institution have, consequently, been severely strained, and the benevolent are asked to help it out of its difficulties. The Home has undoubtedly good claims on the benevolent, but in this instance it also seems to have a claim upon the police and the ratepayers. The Act, which authorises the arrest and destruction of dogs, ought also to empower the payment of a reasonable sum for their detention and execution.

Again I am asked to say a word for the Carlisle-street, Westminster, Soup Kitchen, for which Lady Herbert of Lea always pleads. I understand that there is more need of money this year than on any previous one, for there is greater distress in Westminster than usual, owing to slackness of work. The available resources are, therefore, already almost exhausted. Subscriptions in money or food should be sent to Lady Herbert of Lea, Herbert House, Belgrave-square.

A case was described in TRUTH the other day in which a candidate at an Army examination had been passed at the medical examination on every ground except in regard to his chest measurement, and was given three months in which to enlarge his girth if he could; but on going up the second time, and satisfying the Medical Board as to the size of his chest, he was then summarily rejected on the ground that his teeth were defective. I have since had some further particulars of this case, which throw further light on the unfair treatment of this particular candidate, and on the inconsiderate way in which the medical examinations seem to be conducted. It appears that the gentleman in question, on going before the first Board, was informed by the examining surgeon that he was "all right." A fortnight later he received a notice from the War Office that he was three-quarters of an inch below the chest standard, and that it had been decided to allow him three months to attain the standard. His father asked that he should be measured again, believing from what had passed in the examination room that some mistake must have occurred; but this request was refused. The candidate then went to a military gymnasium where he was at once measured by a well-known officer, and by a sergeant-major, who found him to be half an inch above the standard chest-measurement. At the end of his three months he went before a second Medical Board, who rejected him, as before stated, for defective teeth.

It further appears that the second Board absolutely declined to recognise the authority of the first one in any respect. They declined to assent to the candidate's view that he was before them for chest-measurement, and when, on learning that he was rejected on account of his teeth, he produced the War Office letter showing that he had been passed previously on every ground except his chest, the Board refused to look at the letter, and told him the first Board could not have done their duty. This first Board, by the way, had passed some sixty or seventy officers, who are now serving in the Army. From the Board the candidate appealed to the Director-General, A.M.D., representing that he had been unfairly treated. The reply was that no officer had ever been passed into the Army with the same number of artificial teeth as this particular candidate possessed. The candidate then asked for an explanation from the War Office as to why he had not been rejected by the first Board. The War Office formally acknowledged his letter, but offered no explanation. Very naturally. The case is inexplicable and unjustifiable. It is clear from the facts above stated that, for some reason unknown, this candidate, after having been passed, was singled out for a second medical examination, on a trumpery and disingenuous pretext; and if this was not done with a preconceived determination to "spin" him, the authorities have done themselves a great injustice.

Incidentally, this case throws some light on the great teeth question which was discussed in TRUTH the other day. When before the second Board the candidate asked why his teeth should disqualify him. The answer was that he could not eat the Service biscuit. He requested that a piece of biscuit should be given him that he might try it, but this was refused, although, on the principle that the proof of the biscuit is in the eating, it seems the most reasonable and practical test that could have been suggested. Again, with regard to the Director-General's statement as to the number of artificial teeth that will disqualify an officer for holding a commission, it is certain that the first Board this candidate went before were not dissatisfied with his teeth, while it is also certain that they passed at least twenty-five candidates without looking at their teeth at all. If it is not an invariable rule to examine teeth, the Director-General cannot have any trustworthy data on which to base his assertion. I believe the teeth objection to be utter humbug; and the way in which this particular candidate was "fooled about" (I know no other adequate term for it) by the military authorities is both unbusinesslike in itself and grossly unfair to a man who had spent years in qualifying himself for the Army, only to be baulked of his commission by this captious frivolity. It would be very interesting to know who was let in as the result of this candidate's exclusion.

Referring to a remark in TRUTH the other day upon regimental entertainments at race-meetings, a retired Cavalry officer writes:—

> You have only to attend race-meetings and see the mess-table, covered with the regimental plate, and furnished with every delicacy, both in and out of season, to realise that the Regulation on this subject is a dead letter. The cost of entertaining the general public (thanks largely to the facilities and inducements afforded by the regimental coach) forms one of the largest items in the expenditure of a Cavalry officer, and many can ill afford it. The regimental drag is a constant source of expense, and ought to be abolished. Its chief use is to carry the officers about to all the race-meetings within reach, and, but for its existence, the heavy expenditure incidental to attending such gatherings would not be incurred. The coach is seldom driven, except by the Colonel or one or two of the senior officers, and the juniors have to contribute to provide them with this amusement.

The paragraph devoted to this subject in the Queen's Regulations is not really an order, and amounts to little more than the expression of a pious opinion. It leaves the whole question at the discretion of the Colonel, and few Colonels are likely to run counter to the feelings and wishes of the majority of their officers on points of this kind. That it is desirable to draw hard-and-fast lines by Regulation on matters affecting regimental expenditure may be questioned. Grandmotherly government is never a good thing. But what can be done is to discountenance extravagant expenditure by precept and example from headquarters. Let a Commander-in-Chief exert his personal influence in favour of plain and unostentatious living; let it be understood that Commanding Officers in whose regiments extravagant expenditure is encouraged will not be viewed with favour at headquarters, and then any hint conveyed in Orders or Regulations will have its effect. I should say that everything depends on the example set at headquarters. The late Emperor William slept every night, and died, upon a camp bedstead, in an apartment resembling a barrack-room. His staff, for the most part, cultivated similar habits, and they made the Prussian Army the finest fighting machine in Europe. The Duke of Wellington all his life set an example of the same kind. This sort of spirit at headquarters gives the tone to a whole army, and it is as easy to set the fashion one way as the other. I am aware that the Ouida-Guardsman, who bathes his brows in Burgundy and dwells in a sort of prima donna's boudoir, is also a Paladin in the field, and performs prodigies of strength and valour whenever the occasion arises. But this combination belongs to romance more than to history. In the long run, it is the Spartan regimen, not the Sybarite, that makes the soldier.

In reference to what has been said in TRUTH about the anomaly created by allowing Army schoolmasters second-class passages by sea, a worthy schoolmaster sends me a long account of the history of schoolmasters in the Army since 1857. His object is to show that schoolmasters enjoyed down to 1881 a much better position, including the privilege of second-class passages, than they have had since that date, and that the recent concession is only a partial restoration of what they formerly enjoyed. No doubt this is true enough, but, unfortunately, non-commissioned officers who see schoolmasters enjoying a privilege which is denied to them are not familiar with the history of the question. Unless my friend the schoolmaster will undertake to give them all a lesson in history, I fear that their sense of grievance will remain. Moreover, there are other reasons, in addition to the fact of schoolmasters enjoying the privilege, for allowing N.C.O.s of corresponding rank to travel second class.

There were only two enteric fever boards in Dublin during November, one case being that of a private in the 2nd West Kent, and the other that of a private in the 1st Durham Light Infantry at Wellington Barracks. This is a slight falling off from the rate in the early part of the year, when there were sometimes four or five boards a month, but it shows that enteric fever is still alive in the Dublin garrison. By the way, the Linen Hall Barracks have just been vacated, preparatory to the drainage being overhauled. A Dublin paper states that it is intended to spend three or four thousand pounds upon the job. Let us hope that the money really will be spent, and that some practical improvement in the condition of the barracks will result from the expenditure.

No decoration has been issued by any chartered association since the days of the old East India Company, and I do not understand why the British South Africa Company should have received permission from the Government to distribute a silver medal among the officers and men who took part in the Matabele War of 1893.

During the last week or two many forcible comments on the atrocious job lately perpetrated for the benefit of Sir Ralph Knox's son have reached me from officers in the Army Service Corps and others. If I do not notice them in detail, the writers must understand that it is only because, in the absence of any new facts, I fear that no practical result can be gained by further comment. The proper place now for the ventilation of this unscrupulous iniquity is the House of Commons, and I would advise all those who resent the transaction to unite in taking measures to get the question brought up there. The opportunity cannot fail to come in the event of any demands upon Parliament for increased military expenditure. For a long time past the Accountant-General's department has withstood such tendencies, and should a more complaisant attitude now become apparent, it will be easy enough to discover the quid pro quo.

The officer of Marines who was awarded a brevet majority after the battle of Trafalgar was Captain Timmins, of the Dreadnought. I believe, as I said last week, that this was the sole honour bestowed upon the Marines after the battle. But in view of what has just happened in regard to the Dongola campaign, it is quite unnecessary to go back to Trafalgar for examples of the cold-shouldering of the Marines by the Admiralty.

My Military Pillory for this week bears a strong resemblance to the Legal Pillory a few columns off, for it exemplifies a number of questionable examples of justice as administered in the Army. The C.O. of the 2nd Inniskilling Fusiliers seems to have convicted a man of drunkenness, in the teeth of the evidence of the sergeant of the guard and two colour-sergeants, purely on the assumption that in the course of being removed a distance of one mile, the man could have recovered from a state of culpable intoxication to one of unquestionable sobriety. Although justice was ultimately done in this man's case, the line taken by the C.O. practically means that he regards the testimony of the regimental police in any case as beyond controversy, and after such an indication of his views—apart from the express order that has been issued—it is not likely that any N.C.O. would in future incur the responsibility of pronouncing a man sober after the military police had pronounced him drunk. The case from the 2nd Scots Guards speaks for itself, as it is evident on the facts that had not the real offender come forward the wrong man would have been punished—and, indeed, he actually was punished to a certain extent—without a particle of evidence; and there is also a conspicuous example of the eccentricities of Army justice in the set of sentences reported from the 1st Gordon Highlanders. From a different point of view, the story about the R.A. Bicycle Club at Colaba is interesting, and the military authorities will probably like to have further information about the principles on which this club is instituted, and the precise part which the C.O. plays in it:—

2nd Battalion Inniskilling Fusiliers, Chakrata.—On May 31 last a private of this battalion was arrested in the bazaar by the regimental police, and brought to the guard-room on a charge of drunkenness. The sergeant of the guard reported the matter to the sergeant-major. Two colour-sergeants were then sent to inspect the man, and pronounced him to be sober. On June 2 the private was brought before the C.O., who fined him 10s. and gave him five days' C.B. At the same time the C.O. issued an order that men brought from the bazaar charged with drunkenness were not to be inspected at the guard-room, apparently on the ground that a man might be drunk at the bazaar and sober by the time he arrived at the guard-room. In point of fact, the bazaar and the guard-room are only one mile apart. The private appealed against the C.O.'s decision, was tried by district court-martial, and acquitted, his punishment being accordingly remitted.

2nd Scots Guards, Dublin.—A man in this battalion named Ross was the other day put in the guard-room for taking beer away from the canteen, the canteen sergeant being at the same time placed under arrest, and the picket sentry being put in the guard-room. Ross protested that he had not taken any beer, and asked to see the sergeant-major, but that functionary merely assured him that he was quite sure he had taken the beer. Immediately after this, another man named Ward came forward and admitted that he had taken the beer, and he was in due course brought up and sentenced to two days' C.B. It would seem that the only evidence the sergeant-major had to go upon was that he saw some beer spilt on the pavement outside the canteen, and his opinion that Ross was the culprit appears to have been a mere guess. In the interests of justice it seems that he should have a little instruction in the laws of evidence.

1st Battalion Gordon Highlanders, Gharial.—A sergeant, charged with being drunk, and of being improperly in the married quarters, was recently tried by district court-martial, committed on the first charge, acquitted on the second, and reduced to the ranks. This was a man with ten years' service, with no entry in his defaulter sheet since 1892. Shortly afterwards another sergeant, of inferior character, was convicted of being drunk and of highly improper conduct, and was let off with a severe reprimand. He had been under arrest for drunkenness six months previously. In another case a colour-sergeant, charged with drunkenness, was allowed to take his choice between trial by court-martial and reverting to sergeant. He chose the latter. In a fourth case a sergeant, with a previous court-martial conviction registered against him, was charged with drunkenness on duty, and got off with a severe reprimand. The same punishment was administered in yet another case of drunkenness on duty. There is a certain amount of consistency about the majority of these sentences; but how the first one is to be reconciled with them, and with justice, is not apparent.

24th Company Eastern Division R.A., Colaba.—A gunner of this company was charged the other day with "stealing goods, the property of an officer," the property in question being a bicycle, described as the property of Major Callwell. The charge was tried by district court-martial, and resulted in a verdict of not guilty. It appears that the major in question, who was in command of the company, has organised a bicycle club for the purpose of supplying his men with machines on the hire-purchase system. The usual terms of purchase are 15 rupees per month, which is paid through the men's accounts. The prisoner in the above case had obtained a bicycle in this way at the price of 213 rupees. After paying his instalments for two months he sold it to another man in the company for 90 rupees. This was the ground of the charge of theft.

6th Company Eastern Division R.A., Shoeburyness.—A gunner in this company has just been promoted to the rank of supernumerary acting-bombardier. The man in question has only nine months' service, and has no education certificate or first-class gunner's certificate, which is usually considered an indispensable qualification for promotion. He passes over the heads of some twenty or thirty other gunners, all qualified for promotion. It might do something to mitigate the dissatisfaction which this appointment has provoked if the reason for it were made known. Or it might not.

1st Battalion Gloucestershire Regiment, Alexandria.—An order recently issued in this battalion provides that no lance-sergeant shall be promoted to full rank unless he extends his service to twelve years with the colours. Has a commanding officer the power to make an order of this nature? The effect of it is that several short-service men now qualified for promotion to sergeant will have to serve the rest of their time—in some cases, three or four years—without any possibility of promotion, unless they elect to extend their service.

A party of men belonging to the 1st Dorset Regiment, who have just been landed in England for discharge, have a very genuine grievance against the War Office. They are men who, at the conclusion of their eight years with the colours, engaged to complete eleven years with the colours in India, and one in the Reserve. As usually happens, however, they were not shipped home at the expiration of their eleven years, and on their arrival at the Discharge Depot most of them had completed eleven years and six months. Owing to their arriving at this time of the year, instead of four or five months ago, they have small chance of getting employment now, and will probably find no work until their few months' Reserve service and pay have expired. It is bad enough, in any case, that men should be detained in India for months after the expiration of their contract term of service; but in the case of men who have only one year to serve in the Reserve, special efforts ought undoubtedly to be made to ship them home the moment they are entitled to discharge.

Yet another bad accident in the Dover trenches! This time the victim is an unfortunate woman, who actually lay for two days and nights in the trenches with her legs broken before she was discovered, a severe frost prevailing at the time. In any event, I trust there will be a searching inquiry into this case, and that some steps will now be taken to make this horrible incident the last of its kind.

In reference to my last week's article on the loss of the Carmel, Mr. James Samuelson, Chairman of the Liverpool Bay Branch of the National Lifeboat Institution, writes to disclaim having said at the Board of Trade Inquiry that he did not believe the crew of the steam lifeboat would keep out all night; and also to claim as his own all the suggestions endorsed by the Board of Trade officer, except that as to the residences of the boatmen at Formby. From what passed at a meeting of the Liverpool Branch on the 1st inst., it is evident that Mr. Samuelson is fully entitled to this credit. The suggestion, in particular, that all the boats in Liverpool Bay should be under the orders of one superintendent appears to have been for a long time past advised by the Liverpool Branch, and was laid by them before the Central Committee in London so far back as February, 1895. The dilatoriness or obstruction of the latter body (who seem to have been insisting that if such an officer is appointed he shall be responsible to them, and not to the local branch) have alone prevented this salutary measure being adopted; which only shows that the disastrous muddle which took place at the loss of the Carmel must be laid directly at the door of the office in John-street.

An auxiliary postman in a provincial post-office is paid 14s. per week. He is laid up one day from illness, and 2s. 3d. is deducted from his next week's pay, reducing his wages to 11s. 9d. This is the joint idea of the Postmaster General and the Treasury of a living wage for a man, his wife, and four children. I do not say that the Department ought invariably to pay men when incapacitated for work by illness; but I do say emphatically that it ought to pay a wage which would leave a man something more than 11s. 9d. a week in the event of his being laid up for a day.

A disgraceful example of the jobbery and favouritism which so often mark competitions for the designing of public buildings has just been given by the Belfast Corporation. Architects were invited to submit plans for a proposed new City Hall, and Mr. Waterhouse was selected as assessor in conjunction with the City Surveyor. The conditions were that the assessors should select three plans for final competition, and that the authors of the selected plans should each receive a fee of £100. After Mr. Waterhouse and his colleague had given their award, however, a majority of the Council took upon themselves to reject one of the three chosen plans, substituting another which, needless to say, turns out to be the work of a local man. The names of the competitors were supposed to be unknown, but the authorship of the substituted plan appears to have been revealed in some way, and it was even asserted at the Council meeting last week that there had been canvassing among the members in his interest. Owing to this public exposure, the further consideration of the matter has been deferred, and it is to be hoped that, on second thoughts, the Council will adopt the assessors' award. To set it aside in the way proposed would be a flagrant injustice, both to the competitors and to Mr. Waterhouse, whose engagement as assessor was doubtless accepted by many as a guarantee that the competition would be honourably conducted.

The Kent County Council seem to have been greatly incensed by some strictures on the condition of Barming Heath Asylum in the recent annual report of the Lunacy Commissioners. The Commissioners complained of the serious overcrowding of the asylum, there being 350 patients in excess of the proper number, and also drew attention to various defects and shortcomings in the state of some of the wards, and the general arrangements of the place. At a recent meeting of the Council the Chairman contemptuously described the report "as being about the value of the paper it was written on," two worthy Aldermen "spoke in contraversion" of it, and Councillor J. G. Talbot, M.P., proffered the brilliant suggestion that a representation should be made to the Home Office, his idea being, I suppose, that the Lunacy Commissioners would be called over the coals by Sir Matthew White Ridley for daring to criticise an institution under the management of these Kentish Bumbles. Comment upon the impertinence of the Council in thus flouting the Commissioners is needless.

It is the artful practice of many local governing bodies to go into committee—which means excluding the public and the reporters—when they have in hand some job which is likely to meet with the disapproval of their constituents. The West Bromwich Guardians resorted to this trick last week, but, unfortunately for its success, an account of the proceedings found its way into the Press. It then transpired that the Guardians considered a letter, marked "private," from the clerk, and that after a forty minutes' oration from that functionary, they agreed to allow him a bonus of £200, and to increase his salary from £225 to £425 per annum. In regard to the number of his local appointments the gentleman in question appears to be a regular Pooh-Bah, for besides the clerkship to the West Bromwich Union, he holds a dozen or more other public offices, and his total income from such sources is said to be upwards of £1,500. Moreover, as he is not himself a solicitor, the legal work of the Union constitutes an extra charge on the rates, and it so happens that the solicitors employed by the Board are his sons. In view of these circumstances, the procedure at the meeting last week was peculiarly objectionable. Even if this pluralist really has a fair claim to an increased stipend for that portion of his time and ability which he devotes to the West Bromwich Union, the matter ought not to have been dealt with in the hole-and-corner fashion which the Guardians adopted.

In an advertisement for an Assistant Medical Officer of the Portsmouth Lunatic Asylum, the Committee state that a candidate with previous experience in an asylum will be preferred. I hope this means that in the present instance the Committee will appoint the best qualified man they can get for the berth. The fact that they have issued such an advertisement is, at any rate, an effective commentary upon their scandalous action a few months ago, when, without inviting other applications or making the slightest pretence at selection, they jobbed a gentleman with no training whatever in asylum administration or lunacy work into the far more important (and more valuable) post of Medical Superintendent.

Here they are again, the same old Bumbles, wrangling and jangling, and generally making fools of themselves over the same old question of the pauper's Christmas beer! Already I have been invited to criticise about a dozen of these annual performances, and I shall be agreeably surprised if I do not hear of many more during the next fortnight or so. But unless they reveal some quite exceptional quality of bigotry or silliness or stupidity, I really fail to see the use of noticing the vapourings of all the churls and fanatics who object to the pauper having half a pint of beer with his Christmas dinner. In the discussions, so far, the only novel note seems to have been struck by two anti-beer Guardians on the Edmonton Board. They both protested against allowing the workhouse inmates any more beer at Christmas, on the ground that the last lot they had was very inferior stuff. This was surely a reason for getting better liquor, rather than for cutting off the supply altogether, which was what the Edmonton Guardians determined to do.

For straightforward, downright, ruthless vandalism commend me to the Salford Borough Council. Among the pictures in the Municipal Art Gallery are portraits of Sir Robert Peel, Lord Stanley, John Dalton, and six local worthies, which at present "take up a great amount of room." For this reason the Council last week decided to "cut down" these nine pictures by depriving Sir Robert Peel and the rest of their legs, removing chairs and other accessories, and so reducing the portraits to kit-cat size! I have never had a very exalted opinion of the Salford Corporation, but I did not think they were capable of perpetrating such a horrid atrocity as this. Very likely, too, they are destroying what are really the most artistic portions of the pictures.

I have received, on very good authority, an answer to the question propounded in last week's TRUTH as to the legality of selling in England tickets for Irish or foreign lotteries. My authority is Mr. G. H. Stutfield, author of a learned work on betting and gambling, who refers me to various statutes of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Georges, the effect of which is to make it illegal to sell tickets in any lottery not authorised by Act of Parliament, whether carried on abroad or in the United Kingdom. By the statute of George IV., any one convicted of this offence is liable to a penalty of £50, and to be dealt with as a rogue and a vagabond. I trust that after this Irish priests will cease to solicit her Majesty's subjects on this side of St. George's Channel to sell lottery tickets, either on commission or otherwise.

Apropos of the agitation for the appointment of resident county magistrates at Aldershot, "A Radical Captain" mentions that the Bench in that district is composed exclusively of Tories. There is not a single Liberal among the Justices in the neighbourhood, nor in the Odiham Petty Sessional Division, nor in the Basingstoke Division of Hampshire—in fact, since Lord Northbrook became Lord Lieutenant of the county he has not nominated a single magistrate from the Party to which he once belonged. Lord Herschell had it in his power to do something to remedy this grievance; but he weakly allowed his opportunity to pass, and so long as his successor remains in office it is hopeless to expect that the boycott against Liberals in connection with the county magistracy will be removed.

A number of magistrates from different parts of the country write to tell me that they also adopt the system, described in last week's TRUTH, of handing over to their clerks all the shilling fees paid on statutory declarations. I am quite content to admit that this is the usual course, and so save any more gentlemen the trouble of writing. It is highly gratifying, however, to receive so many letters on the subject, for it shows that the Great Unpaid are reading their TRUTH regularly. By the way, I erred the other day, through misreading the letter of a legal correspondent, in saying that all declarations before magistrates are exempt from stamp duty. Compulsory declarations are so exempt, but voluntary declarations are liable to the duty. In how many cases is it paid?

In justice to Dr. Trapani, the Maltese magistrate whose sentence on an English soldier was noticed in TRUTH the other day, it should be stated that the expression that the prisoner "had acted under the influence of uncontrollable passion," which the magistrate used as a reason for mitigating the penalty, appears to be a mistranslation of a phrase well known in Italian jurisprudence, and bearing a totally different significance. The words used by the magistrate were, I understand, equivalent to the English phrase "under very strong provocation." My informant on this point is a gentleman who knows Dr. Trapani, and gives him a high character for learning, acumen, and impartiality.

The Commissioner of Assize at Stafford enunciated a decidedly startling and dangerous doctrine in the first of the cases which head my Legal Pillory this week. By reckless driving a man causes the death of a child and seriously injures three other persons; but, because he was drunk at the time, he is let off—much to his surprise, for he had tried to prove that he was sober—with a more lenient sentence than he would otherwise have received. Is drunkenness, then, to be considered in extenuation of crime? Would the half-witted fellow whom Mr. Darling, Q.C., condemned to seven years' penal servitude have escaped more easily if it had been found that his outbreak of violence was the result of over-indulgence in drink rather than of inherent mental affliction? Above all, is drunkenness to be treated as a mitigating circumstance in offences against property as well as against the person? With regard to the following performances of the amateur magistracy, the contrast between the penalties for assaults and cruelty and those for poaching, petty larceny and vagrancy speaks eloquently enough for itself:—

Staffordshire Assizes. Before Mr. C. J. Darling, Q.C., Commissioner. John Stanworth, convicted of manslaughter. Prisoner drove a horse and trap over a party of four persons, who were sitting on a grass plot at the corner of a road, seriously injuring three of them and killing the fourth, a little boy. Witnesses for the defence said the prisoner was sober. The jury, however, in recommending the prisoner to mercy, expressed the opinion that he was drunk, and the Commissioner said that with that opinion he entirely agreed. Had he believed that the prisoner was sober at the time, the sentence would probably have been more severe. One month.

Keighley Police-court. Before the Mayor (Mr. R. N. Smith) and other magistrates. Robert Howcroft, convicted of cruelty to a horse. Because the horse was unable to draw a load, defendant took his whip and rammed the stock five times down the animal's throat. Fined 40s. and costs.

Hereford Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. Elizabeth Hall, charged with ill-treating her step daughter, aged eleven years. Defendant beat the child about the head and face with her fists, knocked her down, and then stood on her side. The child went to some neighbours with her face and mouth bruised and bleeding, and her apron smothered with blood. She had been repeatedly struck and kicked. Defendant had been previously convicted of a similar offence, and the Bench said they would give her "another warning." Fined £1 and costs.

Rotherham Police-court. Joseph Henry Rodwell convicted of an aggravated assault on his mother. He struck her on the head with a poker, inflicting a wound which had to be dressed by a doctor. Fined 40s. and costs.

Staffordshire Assizes. Before Mr. C. J. Darling, Q.C., Commissioner. Edward White, convicted of maliciously wounding a policeman. He attacked the officer from behind with a poker, inflicting severe injuries to his head. A question was raised as to the prisoner's mental condition, and a doctor said he was a man of a low type of intellect, though not insane. Seven years' penal servitude.

Mary Ann Harlow, convicted of attempting to comm tsuicide. Six months.

Ludlow Police-court. Before Captain Parkinson. Charles Bunt, charged with begging. He said he was "not much use for work," as his right leg was paralysed. The police had no record against him. Seven days.

Dorchester Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor (Mr. J. Paine) and Mr. G. Davis. Emily Lake, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Bishop Auckland Police-court. Mary Spencer pleaded guilty to stealing a pair of boots. One month.

Ixworth Petty Sessions. Before Sir Thomas Thornhill, Messrs. W. N. King, and G. E. Payne. Frederick Smith, charged with poaching. One month.

Grimsby Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. George Goodwin, fishing apprentice from the Chatham Workhouse, charged with neglecting to go to sea. Fourteen days.

Savoy Hotel, Savoy Restaurant, London. Large reception-rooms for fashionable réunions. Orchestra plays daily during dinner and opera supper.

Teddington Petty Sessions. John Manning, horse master in the employ of an omnibus company, charged with cruelty. Thirty-six horses under defendant's charge were left for several weeks in a field at Bushey Park, where they were so shockingly starved that after eating the bushes and lower branches of the trees, they gnawed at the wooden fencing, some of the staves being, a witness said, "eaten clean away." The horses were described as "simply skin and bone." Fined £5 and costs.

Bristol Police-court. Before Messrs. W. A. Todd and F. J. Fry. James Hazell pleaded guilty to assaulting his wife, who said he hit her two or three times in the face and threw a vase at her, after which he hurled a lighted paraffin lamp at her. The lamp struck her on the head and was broken, and she ran out of the house with blood and oil streaming down her hair. Her injuries were attended to at the infirmary. Fined 10s. and costs for the assault, and ordered to allow his wife 12s. a week under a separation order.

Downham Market Petty Sessions. Before Mr. E. R. M. Pratt and other magistrates. George Blaxter, dealer, convicted of cruelty to a horse. Although the animal was in a shocking state, having a hoof off its near hind foot, it was placed by defendant in a field where a policeman next day traced its walks by the blood on the grass. It was afterwards destroyed. Fined 40s. and costs.

Taunton Police-court. Joseph Band pleaded guilty to assaulting William Pavey. The assault was of a serious character, defendant attacking complainant several times, and knocking him down and kicking him. Fined £1.

Wells City Police-court. Before the Mayor (Mr. J. H. Holloway) and Mr. J. Slater. William Barwell, aged 17, charged with stealing two brushes. Three months.

Epping Petty Sessions. Before Major Tait, Messrs. G. Buxton, W. Patchett, W. Smith, and Dr. Hurford. Henry Butcher, charged with stealing two fowls. One month.

Lyndhurst Police-court. Before Lieut.-Colonel M. Powell and Mr. W. F. Rawnsley. Charles Drake and Walter Early, charged with poaching. Drake, one month; Early three months, and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

St. Austell Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Hext and Mr. J. E. Veale. Frederick Cann, charged with sleeping out. Seven days.

Bournemouth Petty Sessions. Before Mr. W. W. Moore and other magistrates. Three men named Carter, Willouby, and Stanley, charged with begging. They were singing in the streets, and said they were unable to get work, and were trying to get money for food and lodgings. Seven days each.

Dronfield Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. A. Milner, J. H. Harrison, and Dr. Rooth. Arthur Peat, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined £2 and 15s. costs.

A barrister sends me from India a characteristic story of the administration of justice in that country. It appears that a serious riot occurred at Kalugumali, in the Tinnevelly District, a number of Shanars (most of them Christians) being attacked and maltreated, and having their property destroyed by a mob of Hindus of other castes. The latter were present in great force, outnumbering the Shanars in the proportion of 100 to 1, and there was overwhelming proof that they were the aggressors. For some reason or other, however, the police throughout sided with the stronger party, and directed their prosecutions against the ill-used Shanars, more than thirty of whom were finally convicted at the Sessions Court. Fortunately, there was an appeal to the Madras High Court, which ended in the Judges acquitting all the Shanar prisoners, and expressing the opinion that the evidence against them was false and concocted.

So far, therefore, a gross and deliberately contrived miscarriage of justice in the case was frustrated. But while the authorities were taking proceedings against the Shanars, some of the latter themselves instigated counter charges against their Hindu assailants. Through the influence of the police these charges were dismissed by the local magistrate, and in this instance no appeal could be filed without the sanction of the Government. In view of the decision of the High Court, such an appeal was certainly desirable; for it was possible, at any rate, that it might have shown, that just as there had been a wrongful conviction in the first case, so there had been a wrongful acquittal in the second. But the Government have declined to allow the appeal for which the Shanars petitioned, refused all redress for the loss and injustice they have suffered, and have taken no notice whatever of the misconduct on the part of the police which was revealed in the High Court. With cases like this occurring, as they do, not infrequently, it is no wonder that widespread misgivings are entertained with regard to, not only the trustworthiness and competence of the police and subordinate magistracy, but the desire of higher officialdom to see right done.

Bankruptcy is, I suppose, a serious business for some people, but to the outside spectator the comic side of it is usually more conspicuous than the serious. For instance, I have been looking at the trustee's final statement in the matter of Mr. Adolphe Henri Chamberlyn, which shows that the debtor's assets, estimated to produce £1,170, actually yielded £6. 5s., made up of £5 deposit on petition, and "other property," to wit, a punt, value £1. 5s. Mr. Chamberlyn, therefore, when he went into liquidation, seems to have been worth exactly £5 and a punt—and not a very valuable punt at that. Needless to say, the whole of the £6. 5s. went in fees and other costs, and as the total expenses of the liquidation were £18. 19s. 8d., there remains a balance of £12. 14s. 8d. due to the Official Receiver as trustee. It comes, therefore, to this—that, in order to relieve Mr. Chamberlyn of his liabilities, his £5 and his punt have been handed over to shorthand-writers and bankruptcy officials, and that a further sum of £12. 14s. 8d. has now to be provided, at the expense, I suppose, of the community at large. A very good joke all round—especially for Chamberlyn.

In endorsing what I said as to the absurdity of the provision of the Post Office Act, which makes such an offence as the theft of a letter triable only at Assizes, a Devonshire magistrate mentions an interesting fact. At the Quarter Sessions at Exeter, a week or two after the committal of the prisoner to whom I referred, this magistrate and his colleagues had before them two cases in which the maximum sentence on conviction is ten years' penal servitude; yet they could not deal with a simple charge of stealing a letter, and the accused had, in consequence, to remain in gaol for nearly five months, awaiting his trial for a crime which Mr. Justice Mathew ultimately judged deserving of only four months' imprisonment. During the present year an Act has been passed extending the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions to charges of burglary, and next year Parliament might usefully be asked to remove this glaring anomaly with regard to prosecutions for thefts from the Post Office.

The other day an inquiry was held by the Sheriff at Maxwelltown Prison concerning the death of a prisoner named Taylor, who had been committed from Stranraer for fourteen days' imprisonment. This man was in such a weak state when he was admitted to the prison that he had to be carried to his cell, and a few days afterwards he died. The medical officer stated that the deceased suffered from shaking palsy, a trouble which had probably affected him for years. For what serious crime, it may be asked, was this poor palsied wreck of humanity sent to die in gaol? According to the evidence of the warder, it was simply for keeping his house in a dirty, unwholesome, and insanitary condition, and what is more, he had only a few weeks previously, when in the same weak state, suffered a fortnight's imprisonment for a similar offence. Unfortunately the Sheriff held that the circumstances of the man's committal to prison were beyond the scope of his inquiry, and so the names of the officials who prosecuted and the magistrates who passed this sentence did not transpire. This is greatly to be regretted, for though I suppose it would not be possible to secure these hard-hearted and wooden-headed gentry the taste of prison life which would be their most fitting reward, it would be some satisfaction at any rate to hold them up by name to the contempt and indignation of the public.

A petition, signed by the Vicar of St. Mary, Primrose Hill, and a number of residents in the neighbourhood was lately sent to the Home Secretary on behalf of Alfred Nott, a cabdriver, who at the beginning of last month was sentenced by Mr. Curtis Bennett to six weeks' hard labour, and his licence revoked. Nott's vehicle collided with an empty hansom, which was upset, and Nott seems to have been punished on account of this accident. He was not given time to obtain the evidence of the passenger whom he was driving, but this lady has since made a statement, from which it would appear that he was not to blame for what happened, and if she had been called as a witness the case would probably have had a different result. Considering the fact that Nott had held a licence for thirty-six years without a single complaint being previously made against him, the sentence was monstrously heavy, and I am astonished that the Home Secretary has not reduced it. I hope he will, at any rate, modify the penalty to the extent of returning the man's licence.

There seems to be a strong opinion at Hampstead that a serious miscarriage of justice occurred in the recent conviction of a local police-constable named Murray on a charge of perjury. A man named Parrent was summoned before the Hampstead magistrates for wilfully damaging property by pushing off the stone caps of the gate pillars at several houses; and on the evidence of Murray he was convicted and fined. Parrent then prosecuted Murray for perjury, and at the trial at the Old Bailey the jury found him guilty, and the Common Serjeant sentenced him to nine months' hard labour. The evidence on which the conviction was obtained consisted—first, of Parrent's denial that he committed the damage, or was at the spot mentioned by the constable, and, secondly, of medical evidence to show that Parrent, owing to one of his arms being partly useless, was physically incapable of doing what he was alleged to have done. Perjury, it is well known, must be proved by two witnesses or by one witness with adequate confirmation. In this instance the only confirmation was the medical testimony as to Parrent's inability to do the damage, and against this witnesses for the defence deposed that the pillar-caps in question could be pushed off with comparative ease. That the medical evidence should have been in these circumstances treated as adequate confirmation of the prosecutor's oath is certainly surprising.

Another point in the case is the fact that throughout the trial, in the speeches of counsel and in the summing up of the Common Serjeant, a great deal of attention was paid to the proceedings of the Hampstead magistrates. These gentlemen possibly deserved the severe wigging which they received from Sir Forrest Fulton for their conduct in the case, but, though Murray was not responsible for what they did, it is quite conceivable that the strong language which was used on this irrelevant matter may have prejudiced him in the minds of the jury. A memorial has been presented to the Home Secretary on behalf of Murray; and in view of all the circumstances it is undoubtedly a case in which a pardon should be granted. It seems clear that the man ought never to have been convicted, for if the jury were satisfied that Parrent was not guilty of the damage with which he was charged, they might still have justly given Murray the benefit of the doubt by treating it as a case of mistaken identity on his part.

The Sedgley Stipendiary seems to have come down with rather a heavy hand on one Sheldon, a rag and bone gatherer, for a contravention of the county by-laws by blowing a horn to the annoyance of the inhabitants. The defendant, who had been in the habit of using the instrument to attract customers, pleaded ignorance of the by-law; and the Stipendiary himself mentioned that it was the first case of the kind in the district; but, nevertheless, a penalty of 17s. was imposed. The regulation is, doubtless, an excellent one; but, by way of beginning its enforcement, a nominal penalty would surely have been sufficient, more especially as the defendant was a poor man, with a wife and family dependent upon him.

In regard to the practice of ordering poachers, in addition to the penalty, to find sureties for their future good behaviour, a Suffolk J.P. points out that ever since the passing of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, magistrates have full power to dispense (as his Bench always does) with this requirement. The fact that the order is no longer obligatory has often been mentioned in TRUTH, but it may be useful to repeat it once more; for, as my correspondent goes on to say, "It is quite possible that even now some Justices may be ignorant of this happy change in the law." This remark shows a true, if scarcely flattering, appreciation of the competence of many of our amateur magistracy, and I have no doubt that some at least of the hard cases I pillory are the outcome of downright ignorance of the alteration which was made in the law seventeen years ago. On the other hand, I fear the demanding of sureties from poachers is also frequently prompted by a purely vindictive desire to subject the offenders to the further six months' imprisonment which they have to undergo if they fail to obtain bondsmen. It is a monstrous method of increasing the punishment, and the power of calling for sureties in such cases ought to be altogether swept away.

Last week Mr. Justice Day let himself go with a vengeance on his favourite topic of corporal punishment. He had to deal at Derby Assizes with an old offender who had obtained a mackintosh and other articles by false pretences. First of all, his lordship painted a rosy picture of the prison as a pleasant retreat, which men like the prisoner looked upon as their home—a place where they were "kept in idleness and provided with all sorts of comforts" at the expense of the community. I may remark in passing that this view of the matter only makes it the more amazing that the learned Judge should give the criminals who come before him such very long spells in these pleasant and comfortable quarters. But what I particularly wish to call attention to is the extraordinary remark which followed. "If he had his way," his lordship went on to observe, "he would never send a man to gaol except to receive corporal punishment. Men should be kept in prison only a short time, but they should be well flogged."

Now if Mr. Justice Day were content to exert his influence in favour of the application of the cat to the brutes who outrage women and children, or even generally to men guilty of serious and repeated offences against the person, I am sure that many people (myself amongst the number) would sympathise with his efforts. But to advocate, as he is reported to have done, the indiscriminate flogging of every man committed to prison—whether he has been convicted of pitch and toss or manslaughter, obtaining a mackintosh by fraud or half murdering his wife—is unmitigated nonsense, and it is astonishing that a judge should have ventured to give utterance to it. We might as well be asked to go back to the old code under which men were hanged for sheep-stealing and similar crimes.

I should like to know more of Mr. Robert Forster, of 16, Victoria-road, Darlington. This gentleman is apparently acting as a local agent for the notorious James Aspdin, of Pendock, Tewkesbury, the presiding genius of the "Anglo-Canadian Farm Pupil Association." In a printed circular that he issues in connection with his farm pupil operations Mr. Forster states (referring to the allegations against the Anglo-Canadian gang), "I have now investigated the matter thoroughly for myself, with the result that I am fully convinced that Mr. Aspdin is the victim of a most diabolical plot, hatched by dishonest Canadian Government officials, and carried out with fiendish ingenuity by an unscrupulous journalist," &c.

Now, I presume that I am the "unscrupulous journalist" of "fiendish ingenuity." The "dishonest Canadian Government" officials are those in Canada, and here, who have done their best to warn English parents against the swindling character of the traffic in farm pupils carried on by Aspdin and others in the same line of business. If Mr. Robert Forster has now obtained evidence of the diabolical plot hatched by these dishonest Government officials, it would only be a kindness on his part, and an act of prudence on the part of Aspdin himself, were they to publish their evidence and unmask the plotters without delay. At present the matter stands thus: that after the Canadian Government issued its first warnings against the farm-pupil swindlers, Aspdin and Co. printed and distributed circulars, categorically stating that their concern had been officially exempted from the Government condemnation. This assertion has been denied by the Canadian authorities, and there was never any better authority for it than the word of the disreputable old Doctor of Divinity, now deceased, who so long acted as Aspdin's agent and decoy in Ontario, and whose character was notorious throughout the province. Not only, therefore, are Aspdin & Co. included in the official condemnations and warnings issued by the Canadian Government, but they stand convicted of an unscrupulous attempt to relieve themselves of this stigma by publishing impudent falsehoods. That they should possess evidence that they are the victims of a diabolical plot by dishonest officials, and yet refrain from clearing themselves (except by the private circulation of scurrilous leaflets), will strike most people as a little thin.

I do not intend at this moment to go again over the whole catalogue of James Aspdin's misdeeds; but, as he and his confederates appear to be as active as ever, and seem to stick at nothing in the way of mis-statement or abuse, I would remind the public, further, that everything that has appeared in TRUTH respecting the Anglo-Canadian gang has come either from the Canadian Government or from the parents of lads who have been victimised by the farm pupil trick, or from what has transpired in police-courts in Canada. To this it may be added that the only attempts that Aspdin has ever made to defend himself have taken the form of (1) endeavouring to extort retractations from my informants by threatening them with libel actions, which threats he has never carried out; (2) uttering the grossest slanders against the young men whom he has previously wronged—in one case supported by sworn declarations which he had obtained from his own agents and tools in Canada; (3) privately circulating abuse of TRUTH in such leaflets as the one I quote from above. What Aspdin is and what his statements are worth, the public pretty well know by this time. But I should feel much indebted to any one who can enlighten me further concerning Mr. Robert Forster, who is now fighting Aspdin's battle and playing his game at Darlington.

Some information has been sent to me from Preston concerning the "Rev. S. Horn," who lately advertised from an address in that town as an agent of the Universitas Nationalis Illinoiensis. It turns out that "Horn" is not a new representative of that notorious concern, but merely our old friend the "Rev. J. Rogers," alias "G. Elliott," under yet another name. The last time I heard of Rogers he was carrying on his bogus degree business in London. About three months ago he appears to have betaken himself to the provinces, and the address at Preston which I mentioned last week is a newsagent's shop, where he arranged for the receipt of letters addressed to the "Rev. S. Horn," such letters having to be re-addressed to the "Rev. J. Rogers, the Poplars, Ulverston." Two or three weeks later, however, the newsagent saw a paragraph in these columns which caused him to refuse to take in any more correspondence for Rogers (a decision which stands out, by the way, in favourable contrast to the conduct of most providers of accommodation addresses in London). The newsagent tells me, in fact, that if he had himself seen Rogers in the first instance he would never have given him permission to use the address, so unfavourable was the impression which the reverend gentleman's appearance created when he again called at the shop. Since then Rogers is believed to have been using a fresh address in some back street at Preston, though he seems to have returned from Ulverston to London. Apart from the other evidence that has been given of the utterly worthless, not to say fraudulent, character of the "degrees" that are sold, the shady methods of the touts employed by this so-called University ought to be sufficient to open the eyes of the public to the true nature of its disreputable traffic.

As he sends his wares all over the country (the last case I heard of came from Suffolk) a few experiences of this kind would doubtless lead him to adopt a more remunerative system of trading.

I fear that I may incur the wrath of the Anti-Gambling League by having invited answers to the question whether there are more acres in Yorkshire than letters in the Bible. One lives and learns, and I have now learned that in the North of England, at any rate, more betting goes on over this question than over any other subject, with the exception of horse-racing and football. Why this should be I do not know; for, judging by the number of letters I have received, it seems to be almost universally known that Yorkshire wins, though it is not quite clear by how much. There is a general agreement that the number of letters in the Bible is exactly 3,566,480; but there is some diversity of opinion as to the precise number of acres in Yorkshire. Whitaker's Almanack puts it at 3,724,703. Several other different totals have been given to me, but I myself always swear by Whitaker. Perhaps if the Anti-Gambling League were to publish these figures, it would put a stop to further betting on this highly interesting question.

How many more times shall I have to explain that I cannot act upon anonymous communications? I mention the fact again for the special benefit of a gentleman who has just addressed me at some length respecting an alleged ecclesiastical job in Worcestershire. He indicates how his information may be verified, but before I can take any trouble in the matter I must ask him to disclose his own name and address to me privately—not, of course, for publication.

Many have written to me to ask me how I could assert that a discovery had been made by two Scotch boys that will enable a ship to cross the Atlantic moved by electricity contained in a jam pot? I never said that a ship will ever do this, but that the boys had made a discovery purporting to be thus potent, and that certain moneyed gentlemen so strongly believed in the discovery that they had patented it, and were building a yacht which is to be propelled by this simple motive power. Of course the jam pot is a way of saying that the primary battery will be very small. But I know no reason why a primary battery should not be discovered which would render dynamos unnecessary. Primary batteries, of course, exist; indeed, any one may make one by putting a shilling on the top of his tongue and a penny at the bottom and bringing the ends of the two coins together. But they are comparatively weak and costly. Why should not some one hit upon one strong and cheap? Anent batteries, an engineer of eminence was telling me, apropos of my having said that the new battery was, I understood, produced by uniting cinders and salt water, that it has long been well known that, if a pile is to be driven into the sea and a cart-load of cinders be thrown around it, a certain action is set up which renders the driving easy.

Many people have been seriously exercised respecting a new anti-fat treatment, of which my Paris correspondent gave some account in Truth of November 19. Warned by past experience, I must decline, politely but firmly, to open my columns to a fresh discussion of this exciting topic. But it seems incumbent on me to mention that both ladies and doctors have addressed to me warnings against any restriction of the normal allowance of drink, except under medical advice. There is, no doubt, wisdom in this warning; and I would go further, by recommending every person, male or female, to make no attempt to reduce obesity unless with the full knowledge and approval of their doctors.

A sensible person, whether man or woman, dresses according to the custom of the country in which he finds himself or herself, in order to evade attracting attention to his apparel. A Bill has been introduced into the Alabama Legislature which proposes to make it unlawful for women to wear skirt-waists, tight-fitting jerseys, bloomers, or divided skirts, or to appear in stockings fastened above the knee; the top of their bodices, moreover, must not be more than 3 in. below the juncture of the chin and throat. Why forbid tight-fitting jerseys? Why this arbitrary measurement of the top of bodices, which evidently would make a distinction in the high-water mark between women with long and short necks? All this is senseless nonsense. There is no more indecency in a woman showing her shoulders, or her arms, or arraying herself in a divided skirt than in showing her hands without gloves. What is called decency in dress is a matter of convention.

An impudent paragraph has appeared in a trade paper called the Pharmaceutical Journal, suggesting that when I published, the other day, information derived from the office of the Pharmaceutical Society, I was either inventing or repeating the inventions of the gentleman whom I sent to the Society's office. It is fortunate that this pharmaceutical journalist is employed in a newspaper office rather than in a chemist's shop, or his hastiness and lack of perception might be attended with fatal results. The fact is that I sent to the Pharmaceutical Society for a certain information, and it was accorded without any hesitation. My representative states that he was courteously received, and spent some time in conversation with the official in charge. As this publication states that "inquiry on the spot fails to throw any light on the matter," I conclude that its representative has been less fortunate than mine, which may have made him angry, but does not justify him in calling me a liar.

The strange thing about it is that while this pharmaceutical scribe has gone out of his way to publish these offensive remarks, he carefully avoids the real question at issue—which is, that the Pharmaceutical Society refuses to allow Irish licentiates to trade in England because it is not satisfied with the Irish examination. I made that statement on the authority of a representative of the Pharmaceutical Society. Is the statement denied, or is it not? If it is to be denied, let the Society officially deny it. I do not believe that it will do so, and I do not believe it will contradict me when I say that it has in specific cases found Irish licentiates to be incapable of passing the English examinations. At any rate, it is certain that the Society does refuse to recognise the Irish qualification, and why an English trade journal should fall foul of me for stating that the Society has the best reason for this refusal is more than I can understand.

The Berlin sensational trial has been a rude shock to me. I had always supposed that exalted persons like Ministers were far above all such weakness as to endeavour secretly to trip each other up. I had thought that each loved his colleagues almost more than himself, and that all were engaged in the noble task of unitedly furthering what they conceived to be the welfare of their country. And yet in Prussia it would seem the very reverse is the case, for every Prussian Minister appears to have striven to bring the other into ridicule and contempt. Let us rejoice that this is never so with our Ministers, and that English Cabinets are always the abode of love, from which, as from Heaven, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness are banished.

The "plain story of the Harcourt-Rosebery rift," which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of Monday last, is, I should fancy, in its main features correct. It will be remembered that Lord Rosebery stated in his last dying speech and confession at Edinburgh, that he had offered to resign the Leadership of the Liberal Party immediately after the General Election. As this offer was apparently made, after he had informed his late colleagues that he would in future hold no political communications with the House of Commons Party Leader, these ex-colleagues should either have accepted it or have declared that they would adopt the same course as their Leader, if they considered themselves the sole Court of Appeal. How could they have imagined that it was possible for the Party under such conditions to present a firm and united front to the enemy! Let us suppose that Lord Salisbury were to send a circular to the members of his Cabinet announcing that he would in future hold no communication with Mr. Arthur Balfour on public business. What would be thought of the Unionist Leaders if they concealed the fact of this rift from their Party, and endeavoured to carry on as though nothing had occurred? Things had, in truth, got to such a pass with Liberal officialdom, when this letter of Lord Rosebery's was written, and after he had declined to withdraw it, that the Party should have been called together for consultation, and invited, with a full knowledge of all that had occurred, to decide between Lord Rosebery and Sir William Harcourt. But everything connected with the selection of the Leader on Mr. Gladstone's resignation, and, with the crisis arising out of this selection, was treated as though the Liberal Party were composed of pawns ready humbly to accept any Leader and any policy, at the bidding of some dozen Brahmins little known outside official circles. The story is not a creditable one to the Liberal Party, and I trust that the Party will in future have sufficient independence to take care that it can never be repeated.

Put briefly, Mr. Curzon's simple creed, to judge by his recent utterances, appears to be this: The conduct of our foreign relations requires an amount of ability that neither the country nor the country's representatives possess. It ought, therefore, to be left entirely to more experienced heads, and that the dispensation of Providence which endows Peers with hereditary legislative ability also vouchsafes to them special hereditary wisdom in all connected with our foreign relations. The less, therefore, that the House of Commons meddles with them the better. The aim of these gifted Peers is to increase the area of the Empire everywhere. If by any chance this policy has received at any time a rebuff from those who object to our conquering them, an early opportunity should be taken to punish them.

Thus, we recognised the independence of the Boers after we were defeated at Majuba Hill, and Gordon lost his life in an endeavour to establish our rule over the Soudan. These two events occurred, it is true, under a Ministry in which a Peer was Foreign Secretary, but this Peer was under the baneful influence of a malignant enemy of the honour of his country—one Gladstone. It therefore becomes the duty of a Ministry in which a Peer is both Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, and a Peer's son is Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to punish Boers and Soudanese for their hideous wickedness in having dared to fight successfully for their independence. As foreign countries may object to our alteration of the text, "The earth is the Lord's", into "The earth is ours," it is the duty of the House of Commons to vote money for armaments in order to force all to recognise our new reading of the text. The duty of the House of Commons begins and ends with voting money to pay for all that the Foreign Office may have done.

There used to be two foreign policies, but this conflicted with the great and glorious principle of continuity. One of these policies was good, the other bad; the first was that of the Conservatives, the second that of the Radicals. But Lord Rosebery renounced the bad policy and adopted the good. Therefore, though Liberals and Conservatives may alternate in office, the Conservative policy is to be that of the country, whichever of the two Parties may be in office. What would the Conservatives say, if it were proposed to them that they should follow in the lines of Mr. Gladstone on all foreign issues, in order to maintain the policy of continuity? For my part, every Peer, and every Peer's flunkey, may proclaim a policy, and tell all who do not assent to it that they are enemies to the honour, dignity, and welfare of the Empire; I shall take the liberty, if I happen to disagree with it, to attack it and to denounce it. It is full time that this ignoble surrender of the Liberal Party should come to an end, and that Liberals should nail their colours to the mast. Are we silently to look on whilst every true interest of the Empire is endangered by a blustering, swaggering, quarrelling policy that for years we have protested against?

You are, Mr. Curzon, a clever young gentleman, but neither to you nor to Lord Salisbury are we inclined to surrender our right to have a voice in our own affairs. We shall still take the liberty to venture to ask questions as to what you are doing, and what you intend to do. You prefer the system that prevails in foreign Chambers. There, you say, a question is asked after lengthy notice of it has been given, and to this question the Minister is allowed to reply in a speech. By all means, if to the Minister's speech answers are allowed. If not, by no manner of means.

With Mr. Curzon's observations on the Press, however, I agree to a very considerable extent. The Press is far too apt, in the anxiety of each newspaper to cut the other out, with some sensational announcement, to insert statements entirely incorrect. Then, for a few days, a lively discussion amongst the "organs of public opinion" arises as to the correctness of the statement, varied by articles commenting upon it as though it were true. Finally, it is admitted to be destitute of truth, and it is forgotten in some new statement equally destitute of truth, when the same game is once more played. On its comments upon all matters that may affect us abroad, even when the facts are not in question, the Press is far too apt to bluster, and, under the guise of patriotism, to appeal to the lowest passions. Speaking broadly, I should say that the London Press in no way represents public opinion in respect to our foreign policy, and this I think foreign Statesmen have fully realised. One of the weak points in most English Statesmen is that they are so anxious to be puffed and flattered in the Press, that they grovel in order to obtain this sort of recognition. Whenever I observe that a Statesman finds special favour with the Press, this is to me presumptive evidence that he is a poor creature.

The passion that possesses everybody to be known by name and repute, including their own circle of acquaintances, is becoming a positive mania. When John Jones thinks that persons say as he passes, "That is John Jones," he is happy. But when he has attained such notoriety as for them to say, "That is Jones," and he has become the Jones of all Joneses, then he has indeed attained a pinnacle of bliss. All are bitten with this craze. It matters little to a person how he becomes notorious, provided he does so. I really believe that many look with envy upon any knave who is talked of because he is figuring in the dock. A woman wants her toilette and her parties described. She is also glad when her personal charms are chronicled. I have noticed that there are a certain number of ladies who have almost the monopoly of this sort of advertisement. The curious thing is that when once they have been hall-marked, they never cease to figure as Venuses. One would really suppose that female beauty improves by age, like port wine. Then men are delighted to have their home surroundings described. The arm chairs in which they sit, the pictures on the walls of their rooms, &c., are set forth in glowing terms, as though it could interest man, woman, or child. There seems to me only one difficulty in all this; where every one is notorious, notoriety ceases to be notoriety.

In the main, the London daily press is in the hands of very rich men, more or less connected with la haute finance. Its tendency, therefore, is to subordinate the interests of the many to those of the few, and it is possible that it may fairly represent the opinion of the wealthy minority and those parasites who cling to that minority. A London newspaper, although it may start as a Radical organ, generally sooner or later is bought up by the moneyed classes, and then becomes a Conservative organ. The latest instance of this is the Sun. Up to now its politics under Mr. T. P. O'Connor have been Radical. But presumably his Radical views did not find such favour as to render it a monetary success. Therefore, it is anounced that it is sold to a syndicate got together by Mr. Hooley, the fortunate promoter of several large companies, and who has, I believe, come forward as the Conservative candidate in a Liberal constituency for the next General Election. Next year will consequently see the Sun a Conservative journal, lauding all that up to then it had denounced, and vowing that the "great heart of the nation" is against all that it has heretofore declared that it favours. Yet what is the only real difference? The paper will belong to a Conservative instead of to a Radical, and evidently this will hardly alter the opinions of the "great heart."

A CASH ADVANCE ON THE SOUDAN.

THE comments on the decision of the Egyptian International Court of Appeal in our pro-Jingo newspapers have been amusing. The point at issue was a legal one, and there seems no reason to doubt that it has been decided on legal grounds. These Jingoists, therefore, fall back on denouncing the Court for daring to uphold the law on a political matter far beyond their competence. Now, what are the facts? The Caisse de la Dette is an arrangement by which an international control is maintained over certain receipts, which go to pay the Egyptian bondholders. Each of the Great Powers is represented on it. Where there is a surplus, this surplus accumulates as a reserve fund. The question was simply whether in dealing in a particular way with this surplus, a majority of the members of the Caisse had acted ultra vires. This question was referred to the established Court of Appeal, in which power to decide such questions has been vested. This tribunal has decided that, in handing over £500,000 to defray the costs of the Soudan expedition, the majority of the Caisse de la Dette controllers had exceeded their powers. "Monstrous!" say the Jingo newspapers. But why? The competence of the tribunal never had been questioned until the decision was given. It does not please us that it should have gone against the Egyptian Government, and therefore we declare the decision to be monstrous. So generally thinks every litigant who does not win his case; for, although technically the Egyptian Government was one of the litigants, in reality, for "Egyptian Government" we must read "British Government."

I am glad that the law is against us, for a more outrageous abuse than to expend this money on a Soudanese war cannot well be conceived. To all intents and purposes, Egypt had ceased to have either a de jure or de facto right to the Soudan. Ismail had occupied the country. The Egyptians had been driven out of it, and since then the Soudan has had a de facto Government, absolutely independent of Egypt. Suddenly—not in Egypt, but in London—a decision to reconquer it was come to. Every species of contradictory plea was put forward for this reconquest. Lord Cromer had officially stated, a few weeks before, that everything was quiet on the frontier, but in Parliament the first plea for the expedition was that the Soudanese were about to invade Egypt. We were next told that Italy had been defeated by the Abyssinians, and that a demonstration against the Soudanese might prove useful to Italy. Then we were told that Gordon's death ought to be avenged. Finally, it was explained that we are very desirous to bring our occupation of Egypt to an end, but that we cannot do this until we have re-established Egyptian rule in the Soudan. This last plea was the very climax of hypocrisy. Our plea for remaining in Egypt up to now has always been that the Egyptians are not able to govern themselves, and that we are only remaining there until we have taught them how to do so. But if the Egyptians cannot govern themselves, how can they govern the Soudanese? Is it likely that our stay in Egypt will be shorter by our insisting on remaining there, not only until the Egyptians have learnt self-government, but also the art of governing their neighbours? The truth of the matter, I take it, is this: we feared that our claim to remain indefinitely in Egypt, because the Egyptians are not fit for self-government, was becoming transparently absurd, in view of the fact that we are doing our best to prevent them from acquiring, by experience, the art of self-government. We therefore thought it well to add to this plea for continued occupation, another, and a more absurd one. The reason why we took action at the particular moment selected was, that we wished to show our friendliness to Italy, and we feared that, if we did not lay hold of the Soudan, nominally for Egypt, really for ourselves, some other Power might.

That the Great Powers, who cannot wish that we should remain eternally in Egypt, should not regret that we have been prevented from laying hands on all the resources of that country, in order to annex vast countries on the Upper Nile for our own benefit, does not surprise me. For my part I regard anything that will tend to lead to our evacuation of Egypt as beneficial; for I believe that, not only is it dishonourable of us to violate our pledges, but that, in this particular instance, our bad faith is a serious and direct danger to us; and in this I find myself in accord with Lord Salisbury, who has again and again stated that he is most anxious that we should withdraw, because occupation is a danger to us, and no gain. The Times first tries to show that, by some despicable chicanery, we can evade obeying the tribunal and restoring the money to the Caisse that we have illegally taken from it. But if we fail in doing this, what of it? We shall, it is true, be obliged to find the money for the expedition ourselves; but then "we shall be left in the position of having acquired a good deal of African territory at our own expense and on our own account." Can we wonder at foreign countries being somewhat suspicious of us, when such theories of annexation are put forward? We have been asserting up to now, that it is absolutely necessary that, in the interests of Egypt, the Soudan should belong to her. As we find that, by the international arrangements which we have ourselves entered into, Egypt cannot pay for this conquest, we are to pay, and our pound of flesh is to take the form of keeping the country for ourselves. That we should benefit by acquiring the Soudan no one seems to believe. But what of that? We increase the area of our Empire, and stolen goods are always sweet. Am I quite wrong in asserting, not only that our Jingoes have strange notions of meum and tuum, but that they are, considered as mere thieves, as unpractical a set of rogues as ever walked on two legs, and were supposed to be endowed with some sort of intelligence? What sensible thief ever schemes to rob empty purses? Let us assume that we do lend £500,000 to Egypt, and that the Continental Powers insist on our withdrawal from that country and the Soudan; is it really imagined that the repayment of this money would not be made? To do so Egypt would only have to borrow from some one else, and to pay off our so-called "mortgage" on the Soudan.

What, then, would I propose? To treat these Soudanese much as the Italians have found it expedient to treat the Abyssinians. There should be a clear line of frontier between Egypt and the Soudan. The de facto Government of the latter should be recognised, and made to understand that, if it does not meddle beyond its own frontier, no one will meddle with it inside of that frontier. Soudan should have a port on the Red Sea, and commercial relations should be established. As regards Egypt, we ought to pave the way for withdrawal on the lines of the Drummond Wolff Convention. Such a policy as this is clear and intelligible, with the advantage of being practical and honest.

RHODES À LA JULIA.

Mr. Stead has issued his pamphlet on the Transvaal raid. Many parts of it are obliterated with black daubs, and this, he explains, is due to some mysterious individual having come to the conclusion, after the type had been set up, that the secrets revealed would be detrimental to interests, personal and Imperial, in London and in South Africa. The context shows pretty clearly that these passages related to Mr. Chamberlain's supposed connivance with the raiders. I sincerely trust, for the honour of the English name, that Mr. Stead has derived his information of the occurrences in connection with this raid rather from his inner consciousness, or from communications with the unseen world, than from actual fact; for such a record of knavery and folly never yet saw the light. Briefly, there were, according to Mr. Stead, conspirators at Johannesburg who were connected with the mining industry there, and who wished for reforms, which would reduce taxation on an industry by which they were netting millions. In Cape Town there were also conspirators, whose interests were also concerned in the Johannesburg mines, and at the head of these latter were Mr. Cecil Rhodes, the Cape Premier, and Sir Graham Bower, the Official Secretary of the High Commissioner for South Africa. In Rhodesia there were Dr. Jameson and his merry men. All three confederated together to lay hold of the Transvaal. Large sums, mainly found by the Cape Town gang, were spent to promote a revolution in Johannesburg, and it was agreed that, on this revolution breaking out, Dr. Jameson, with the Rhodesian forces, was to push forward to Johannesburg, on the plea of defending women and children from being massacred by the Boers.

When all was arranged, the Johannesburg conspirators found that the inhabitants of that town declined to rise at their bidding, although false telegrams were sent, assuring them that Mr. Chamberlain was heart and soul with them. Then followed an exchange of telegrams between Johannesburg, Cape Town, and Mafeking, where the invading army had been collected. Whether Mr. Rhodes really wished Jameson to cross the frontier at once, or whether he was only scheming to be able to escape responsibility if he did cross it, does not appear. But we are assured that the Doctor was under the impression that he was expected to cross it by his Cape Town allies, and under that impression he pushed forward. Be this as it may, there was a concert of lying amongst all. "This," observes Mr. Stead, with delightful frankness, "is one of the disadvantages of war, and even before it breaks out casts a dark trail of subterfuge and deception over the last few weeks and days of peace." A more pitiable and contemptible crew than all these conspirators—if Mr. Stead's account of them be correct—never lived. Each sought to throw responsibility on the other; each thought that some one else ought to risk his skin; each, when the moment arrived for action, called on the other to act. The only man of any pluck and decision amongst them seems to have been Dr. Jameson, but his troops were of the most worthless description. No sooner did they discover that the Boers shot straight, than these heroes, who had performed wondrous deeds of valour with rifles and Maxim guns against savages who did battle with spears, surrendered at discretion.

Mr. Stead would have us believe that these "patriots" only engaged in conspiracy in order to hinder President Kruger from handing the Transvaal over to Germany. Indeed, he compares Mr. Rhodes to Mr. Lincoln. One of the principal purveyors of money for the revolution was Herr Beit, a German gentleman—and, for everything that I know to the contrary, a most estimable German. He is a very large holder in the shares of divers Companies in the Transvaal and in Rhodesia. It is difficult to understand why this Herr should have subscribed money to fight our battles. Although the obvious aim of the pamphlet is to create the impression that President Kruger was intriguing with the German Emperor, and that Mr. Chamberlain was intriguing with Mr. Rhodes, I fail to find one single proof adduced for either of these suggestions. The first is "proved" by means of ink smeared over the pages, which we are asked to believe has behind it evidence that would convince everybody; the other is proved by telling us that a certain "Jeanne," for the original of whom we are informed that we may look in vain as she never existed, discovered, in the cover of a Bible belonging to President Kruger, a treaty entered into between him and the German Emperor.

Almost all the actual facts stated in the pamphlet are to be found in the report of the Select Committee of the Cape Parliament. Naturally, what tells against Mr. Rhodes in the evidence submitted to that Committee is not in the pamphlet. Thus in the pamphlet there is the account given by the Cape Attorney-General of his first interview with Mr. Rhodes after the raid, which also is published in the Report. But in the Report, after recounting Mr. Rhodes's despair, and the impression produced upon himself by this despair, the Attorney-General goes on to say that he was not then aware that Mr. Rhodes had already received a letter threatening the cancellation of the South Africa Company's Charter in consequence of what had occurred, and he sarcastically observes that he had not even then made up his mind whether Mr. Rhodes was in despair because Jameson had crossed the frontier or because of this letter.

I understand that spirits from another world can influence the hand of the person with whom they are brought into communication, with the result that he writes, not what he wishes, but what the spirits wish. I can only account for this pamphlet, which is a strong indictment of the financial gang of South Africa, under guise of defending them, by supposing that Mr. Stead was the scribe, but that a spirit adverse to these worthies is the real author.

LAWSON, LIQUOR, AND LIBERALISM.

I publish with pleasure the following letter from that veteran of temperance, Sir Wilfrid Lawson. But I still contend that the line of the least resistance is to substitute existing elected authorities for non-elected bodies in the matter of everything connected with the licensing laws. This would ensure the fullest control, for such authorities are elected by the ratepayers. In towns they would be the municipal council, in rural parishes the parish council. Obviously, if a town or a parish did not wish any licence to be granted it would not be granted. Where, too, the ratepayers wished to reduce the number of houses, or the hours during which they are left open, such reductions would be made. Control is not specially ensured by a direct ad hoc vote of the people on any matter affecting the people. It is equally exercised through representatives elected by the people. Were this not so, the people would, by our existing Constitution, be without any control, either local or Imperial, over their rulers. As Sir Wilfrid Lawson says: Whether Local Veto, as proposed by him, would be acted on, except in very rare instances, is a matter of opinion. It might be in Wales and Cornwall. But dealing with the question as one affecting the entire United Kingdom, I think that most people are of opinion that it would not be. It is true that the House of Commons in 1883 declared its adhesion to the principle of local veto. But since then the majority of the electors have made it pretty clear that they are neither theoretically nor practically for it. I think, however, that they would be for vesting all control in existing local bodies, for to the principle of local self-government all Radicals—whether friends of temperance or the reverse—assent. As for compensation to the working publican, it should be levied on the liquor trade generally. If such a scheme of compensation as I suggested would render it easier to reduce the present excessive facilities afforded for drinking, why should the friends of temperance object? In fact, I am a stronger advocate for full popular control than Sir Wilfrid, for I would assent to compensation, if I cannot get my way without it.

Dear Truth,—Your article on "Liberalism and Liquor" will be read with interest both by "Aquarius" and by "Bung." There has been some correspondence and writing in some of the newspapers lately which renders it desirable to have the relative positions of the Liberal Party, the Liquor Party, and the Temperance Party made as clear as possible. Will you allow me to contribute a line or two with that object in view? I only use the phrase "Temperance Party" colloquially, as we are all temperance reformers now, but, for my present purpose, it indicates all those who hold the doctrine that the public, and not the publican, should be supreme in liquor legislation. It is now many years since some of those who held this view formulated a measure, under the provisions of which districts would have been permitted to prevent liquor shops being established within their borders. This they did, knowing that where that policy had been pursued, those localities had been greatly benefited, and the curse of intemperance had been vastly diminished, if not entirely removed.

At length Parliament gave a theoretic sanction to this policy by three times passing a resolution in its favour, and on the last occasion declaring that the adoption of such a policy was urgent. That, Sir, was in the year 1883, and the amount of the national drink bill, the state of our prisons, workhouses, and lunatic asylums, and the general condition of our population at the present time show that the "urgency" is pressing now—just as it was thirteen years ago. It must surely always be "urgent" to diminish the pauperism, crime, and lunacy which deface and degrade our country, and what is called the "Temperance movement" is really a crusade against those three evils. Sir William Harcourt, acting for the Liberal Party, introduced a measure which, if passed, would substantially have made the people masters of the liquor trade, instead of the liquor trade being, as it is now, master of the people. If Lord Rosebery be right in declaring that the liquor ring threatens to throttle the commonwealth, then it is evident that hardly any more important measure was ever brought before Parliament.

Sir W. Harcourt disclaimed any attempt at a new licensing measure. He took the law as he found it—the law being that as regards licences (I omit a few classes of licences which are otherwise controlled, or not controlled) the magistrates in granting them should have regard to three things—the character of the man, the suitability of the house, and the wants of the neighbourhood. Sir W. Harcourt made no attempt to interfere with the "discretion" of the magistrates on the first two points, but provided a means—a piece of machinery—by which the magistrates should be informed as to whether districts did, or did not, feel the "want" of drink shops. If the district said "yes," then the magistrates' "discretion" to grant or to withhold licences in that district was not interfered with; but if the district said "no," then the magistrates were not to exercise their discretion in setting up liquor shops there, but the community was to be left in peace. This Bill, if passed, would not of itself have shut up a single public-house; it would only have given local committees the chance or opportunity of doing so. A more simple, or more straightforward, or more democratic measure has never been introduced to the House by any great statesman in our time.

But, Sir, I gather from your article that you want something more—you want some new Licensing Authority. That may be most desirable. But surely you would not wish your new Licensing Authority to have the power of forcing liquor shops into unwilling districts? What becomes of your Democratic principles in that case? I am positive that you would not advocate any such plan. So that you, I conclude, support Local Veto "plus" this new arrangement of Licensing Authorities; and you advocate this because you think Local Veto, with this addition, would be easier carried. Well, my own opinion is that it is easier to carry one sack of potatoes than two, and that it is easier to carry one simple provision which fits into any licensing scheme than to complicate it by connecting it with new and very contentious matter. You talk about "full power being given to each locality to work out its own salvation." There I am with you heart and soul.

I would have "full" free trade, "full" religious liberty, "full exercise" of the political franchise. But my experience is that we get these things by degrees and, alas! by very slow degrees. Let us, then, take this one step of Permissive Local Veto, and when we have got that, we can gird up our loins for another step if we find that it is needed.

But you also seem to fear that if the people were set free to take this step that none of them would take it. Forgive me, Sir, if I say that neither you nor I know anything about that. Persons well acquainted with Scotland, with Cornwall, with Wales, and many other districts, have told me their belief that the Veto, if obtained, would be exercised in those places to a very large extent. But there are some far better witnesses to be had than either you or I, or any temperance enthusiasts, and these are the members of the liquor trade itself. These gentlemen prophesy a large adoption of the Veto, and they dread it more than all other temperance legislation put together. The throttlers see in it the weapon by which they will themselves be "throttled." What an instructive sentence is that in which you say: "In London there are few public-houses in fashionable quarters, but their number is legion in the poorer quarters." Yes—and who put them in the poorer quarters? Why, the magistrates, who take care to protect their own quarters. Surely, surely, we might give the poor man as good a chance as the rich man has of protecting himself from these nuisances.

I note also your remarks about compensation. But I don't think that even the British elector—easy as he is to befool—will ever be persuaded that men, who have been paid large sums of public money (for that is what a monopoly means) for selling drink, are also to be paid for not selling it. Well, the sum and substance of my discourse is this: Do not distract our attention by these excellent, very likely, but intricate licensing schemes. Let us stick to Harcourt's simple policy (mind, you may amend his clauses, details, and machinery as much as you like if you see your way thereto), which is—No forcing of liquor-shops into districts which wish to be clear of them. This is the honourable, safe, and straightforward path for the Liberal Party, and I, for one, have no fear but that it will, in the end, prove the successful one.—Yours, &c., Wilfrid Lawson.

SCHOOLMASTERISM AT COVENTRY.

I briefly acknowledged last week the receipt of sundry corrections, or contradictions, of the remarks about Coventry Grammar School in Truth of the 26th ult. At the same time I stated my intention of communicating with my original informants before discussing the matter further. This I have now done. Both sides of the case are before me pretty fully, and I feel in a position o express a fairly confident opinion on the issue.

I can best deal with the case by taking paragraph by paragraph a communication forwarded to me by Mr. E. W. Dorrington, and signed by himself and five other Assistant Masters in the school. Omitting the exordium the letter begins :—

The paragraphs appear to charge the Headmaster with showing a decided preference to boarders as against day-boys, and with exhibiting conspicuous unfairness towards one boy in particular.

To deal with the latter charge first. The facts which led to the boy's expulsion are briefly these. At the end of last term he wrote to a master of the school a letter of a character that the authorities could not pass over. On this being laid before the Governors, they passed a unanimous resolution in which they recommended the Headmaster to expel the boy unless he wrote an apology before the beginning of the present term. Though more than one opportunity was offered the boy of withdrawing his letter, he took no notice. His fate was, therefore, in his own hands, and he has himself to blame for his "expulsion," if "expulsion" it is to be called.

These may be "facts," but they are not the whole facts, and fail to convey an accurate idea of the merits of the case. The boy in question was compelled, very much against his will, to take part in a dramatic performance to be given on the last day of the term. His objections appear to have been very reasonable, and were shared by his parents. He lived three miles from the school, and attendance at rehearsals involved an extra walk of six miles, besides interfering with his evening studies. The boy was leaving at the end of the term. The part he was to play in the performance had been "understudied" by another boy, and he seems to have had an idea (as did others) that there was an intention of throwing him over at the last moment, and putting his understudy in his place. Under these circumstances, he wrote the night before the performance a note to one of the masters, expressing regret that he should be unable to attend the next day as he had another engagement, and was going out to a "bachelor dinner" given by a local gentleman. I have a copy of the note before me. Its terms are perfectly respectful, but it is obviously written with the tongue in the cheek, and with an intention of annoying the school authorities. It was a silly letter for a boy to write, but that it affords any justification for such a step as expulsion I absolutely decline to admit. Before discussing that point, let us hear the Assistant Masters further :—

An additional sting lies in the words "that the boy had actually left the school at the end of the previous term." Subsequent facts show that this statement is literally true: he did not come back. But if the statement implies that the Headmaster knew that the boy had left, it is not true. On the contrary, it is reasonably supposed that the boy was coming back, and, very likely, to remain for another year. A formal notice to leave at the end of the Easter Term had been given, but that notice was verbally withdrawn, and the boy actually did come back for the summer Term. Moreover, it was not until the boy's father had been informed of the Governors' resolution that the Headmaster received any intimation that the boy had left.

Here, unfortunately, we have a direct conflict of evidence. As my information comes at first hand, while that of the Assistant Masters is necessarily second-hand, I am bound to give the preference to my evidence. It is clear, to start with, that formal notice was given for the boy to leave at Easter. What happened subsequently was that on a certain occasion when the Headmaster, the boy's father, and another gentleman, whose name there is no occasion to mention, happened to meet, the Headmaster strongly deprecated the boy's removal at Easter, as the Oxford Local Examination was to come off in the following term, and urged that the boy should be allowed to go in for the examination from the school instead of from a private tutor. The father assented to this, and said that in that case his boy could remain at the school till Midsummer. As this is the evidence, not merely of the boy's father, but of the independent witness who heard the conversation, I do not see how it can be questioned. Speaking, therefore, as a jury, I find that the boy was, at the Headmaster's request and for the sake of the school, allowed to remain on for one term only after Easter, and that the Headmaster was duly apprised of the intention to withdraw him at Midsummer. What the Assistant Masters mean by saying that it was "very likely" that the boy would remain for another year, I do not know, and, as they can only be alluding to something they have heard, it does not much matter.

They continue :—

The paragraph goes on to say "that the result of the boy's expulsion is that he was disqualified for an exhibition." As a matter of fact, the Headmaster's recommendation for the exhibition was announced and so, practically, the exhibition was awarded—before the incriminating letter was written.

There were two possible candidates for the exhibition, and the matter had to be decided by the result of the school examination, held by the Oxford Local Examination Board—an examination, that is, absolutely independent of Headmaster or anybody else. In this examination the successful candidate obtained Second-Class Honours, whilst the unsuccessful one, the one on whose behalf the complaint is made, obtained a "Pass." There can, then, be no doubt that the Headmaster recommended the better candidate.

It is right to mention, in connection with this matter, that the Headmaster had some time previously expressed to the Governors his hope that if the Coventry candidate did fairly well, they might see their way to granting him a second exhibition. This hardly looks like unfairness on the part of the Headmaster.

These passages I do not clearly understand. The resolution of expulsion is, I believe, dated September 9, the exhibition was awarded on September 30. It seems rather a singular thing that the recommendation should have been made in July and the exhibition not awarded till the end of September; but, of course, it is possible. With regard to the examination, I may be under a misapprehension, but I learn that no previous intimation that the exhibition would be awarded on the Oxford Local Examination was given to the candidate who complains, and if this is the examination referred to by the masters, the exhibition should have gone to yet a third boy who came out on that occasion higher than the exhibitioner. But the masters talk about a "school examination conducted by the Oxford Local Examination Board," and perhaps they are referring to something else. With regard to the last paragraph, its only effect seems to me to be that the boy in question, whether he was second on the list or not, may have been very seriously injured by the way he was treated, for it would seem that there had been some idea of granting a second exhibition, which this boy might have obtained.

For the sake of brevity, I pass over a paragraph in which the masters contend that the restriction of the benefits of the foundation to local boys has been abolished by the Charity Commission scheme under which the school is now conducted. On the other hand, I am informed that this scheme does not affect the Lane Exhibition, but this is a minor point. The Assistant Masters next say:—

With regard to the Musical Scholarship, it so happens that it was awarded to a day-boy to the exclusion of a boarder. There was more than one examiner, and the matter was eventually decided on a very sound principle, and certainly with absolute impartiality.

This is somewhat meagre information. One would like to know more about the "sound principle." Another letter which I have received in defence of the Headmaster (written by the Rev. Eric M. Farrar of St. Thomas's, Coventry) states that the boy who received the scholarship "was proficient in two instruments and so received the most marks." What means of information Mr. Farrar has does not appear from his letter. If the winner got the most marks in the examination, that certainly seems a "sound principle" on which to award the prize. But the extraordinary fact is that the first examiner does not seem to have been aware that there was a second examiner, and believed that he had himself awarded the scholarship to another candidate. It is quite certain, from what he says, that the two examiners did not compare notes. Nothing could be more clear and significant than the evidence of the first examiner. He has stated that he examined the candidates, four in number, for over two hours; and gave his award to one boy, J., whom he considered by far the best. He heard nothing more till the list was published, when he found that another boy, P., was at the top, and that J. had actually been placed at the bottom of the whole list. He (the examiner) then remonstrated with the Headmaster, who said that he (nothing was then said about a second examiner) had altered the order of merit on the ground that P. played two instruments. Why J. had been placed last was not explained. The examiner's reply to this was that while P. attempted two instruments unsuccessfully, J. played one well, and was thoroughly grounded in music. It seems a fact worthy of note that the successful candidate was the son of the school medical attendant. Taking this circumstance in conjunction with the mysterious hugger-mugger procedure above indicated, I think better evidence must be forthcoming than has yet been offered before the assertion that the scholarship was awarded "on a sound principle," or "with strict impartiality," can be maintained.

The masters next deal with the question respecting their own salaries. They deny that there has been any difference on the subject between the Governors and the Headmaster, and assert that full accounts are forthcoming whenever wanted, and that, in point of fact, more is spent in salaries than the Headmaster receives for the purpose from the Governors. I trust that they are right, but the original statement was offered to me on the authority of a Governor. Then comes the question of the young-lady boarders:—

There remains one statement in the paragraphs, on the truth of which we offer you our congratulations. It is quite true that "the Headmaster has even gone so far as to receive girls, as well as boys, as boarders in his official residence." What a monstrous crime! How unjust to day-boys that a man with three daughters should take in two girls to be educated with them and to be their companions! Is it suggested that three day-boys ought to have been introduced to be their companions instead? But even in this matter the law has been literally complied with. It can hardly be contended that the young ladies have interfered with the duties of Headmaster or any other official.

The Assistants, it will be seen, are so pleased with themselves in their triumphant vindication of their chief, that they now wax sarcastic. Their facetious outburst seems to me a little out of place. The Headmaster possesses, I understand, an official and a private residence. His family naturally reside with him in the latter. If the young ladies referred to are merely required as playmates and schoolmates for his daughters, it might be supposed that they would reside there, too. Nothing of the kind. They reside at the Headmaster's official residence. The Assistant Masters are moved to mirth at their own waggish suggestion that boys should have been selected to be educated with the Headmaster's daughters. I can only say that I see nothing more ludicrous in this than in the idea of a man receiving girls as companions for his own daughters, and then lodging these girls, not in his own house, but in a neighbouring boys' school. What is meant by the remark that "the law has been literally complied with," I do not understand. Mr. Farrar, in the letter above-mentioned (which bears a suggestive likeness at all points to the epistle of the Assistant Masters), states that the Headmaster consulted the Governors about the admission of girls to his house. On the other hand, I have been told on the authority of a Governor, that the Governors have no official knowledge of the arrangement. I did not suggest that the presence of the girls had seriously interfered with the duties of the Headmaster and his staff, but I understand that masters from the school have been employed in teaching the young ladies' class; and, if this is so, those masters were clearly taken from their other duties for the purpose.

In conclusion, the Assistant Masters deny that there has been any grumbling in Coventry over the management of the school, which may be true, but is not of much importance, for there seems to me to have been some very good ground for grumbling. Having carefully weighed everything that has been said on both sides, I come to the conclusion that, in regard to the boy who has been expelled, a gross injustice has been done. Expulsion is a step which is only justifiable in the most extreme cases. It differs from all other school punishments in that it marks and damages a boy for years, and possibly for life, and affects his parents almost as much as himself. The strongest reasons that will justify the infliction of this punishment—namely, that the boy is incorrigibly bad, and that the credit of the school and the protection of the other boys require his removal—are totally absent in this case, for the boy had already left. So far from being a boy of indifferent character, his previous reports show that he had borne the highest character throughout the seven years he had been in the school. His only offence as a bit of schoolboy "cheek," indulged in at a moment when he believed that he had virtually left and could safely consider himself emancipated. His act caused no inconvenience to anybody, and has the excuse that he had previously been compelled to do something which he resented, which his parents disapproved of, and which the school authorities ought not to have insisted upon. Imagine a boy, who has borne an excellent character for seven years, developing a grievance against the authorities in his last few weeks, and relieving his feelings by putting his fingers to his nose as he passes for the last time out of the school gates, and you have a very good measure of this boy's little indiscretion. For the school authorities under such circumstances to solemnly sit in judgment on the boy in the next term, and pronounce upon him the disastrous and indelible stigma of expulsion, is an act which cannot be justified by any necessity of school discipline, and can only be attributed to pure vindictive spite. If a schoolmaster alone had done this, I should not have been surprised, for schoolmasters are often little better than schoolboys where their own dignity and importance are concerned. But that the Governors should have authorised such a proceeding can only be explained by their having been misled as to the facts. It is to be hoped that what has now been said will have the effect of enlightening them, and that they will not hesitate to investigate the facts fully—if necessary, calling the boy concerned and his father also before them for the purpose. There are other matters set out above which equally call for their investigation, more particularly the mysterious affair of the musical scholarship. The conclusion of my original remarks on the whole subject was that the Governors ought to look more closely into what has been going on, and that conclusion can only be accentuated by what has now been stated.

"THE NEW ROSALIND."

The play-going public has had a great experience during the last fortnight. Ibsen, who still retains a few clever but irresponsible admirers, has paid us another visit; but I'm afraid all healthy-minded people will treat the latest production of his "Little Eyolf" as a subtle joke rather than a serious play. It is no use trying to thrust the Ibsen sentiments down the throats of good, honest English men and women; they won't have them at any price; and as far as England is concerned Ibsen has been, is, and will ever be, a downright failure. Manager George Alexander has been at it again; he got sick to death of the red hair and tip-tilted nose belonging to the Elphberg family; he sighed for fresh fields and pastures new—at least so far as he was concerned; so he shook Pinero, Carton, and Shakespeare up in a bag together, and Willie tumbled out long before the others had even commenced to be buffeted about. "To be or not to be" said Hamlet—I mean Alexander. No, no; remove the fascinating Dane from my presence for a little longer; he is inclined to be a preacher; so am I. I used to whittle sticks well as a lad; let me try my hand at Orlando. So up went "As You Like It" on the winning-post, whereat the fair Julia Neilson was grateful, if not content, even that she had the part of Rosalind to play. And who's to play fair Celia? "Why, I," said Davis Fay; "in my American way, I'll play fair Celia!" And who'll play sad Jaques? "Why, I," said W. H. Vernon; "with my style and learnin', I'll play sad Jaques!" And who'll play the Duke? "Why, I," said Fernandez; "knowing which way the land is, I'll play the Duke!" So away they started with Kate Phillips, Dorothy Baird, Julie F. Opp, H. B. Irving, H. V. Esmond, H. H. Vincent, and others, all thrown in just to keep the play going and the pot a-boiling. Taken as a whole, Shakespeare's lovely pastoral poem is both beautifully acted and exquisitely mounted.

But why did Orlando, every time he made his appearance on the scene, give you the impression he had been pushed on from the wings and had to stop at a certain point, or had been only wound up to go so many paces? The mechanical movements were both irritating and monotonous. Now Julia, on the other hand, resented the stage being so small; she wanted to jump over the footlights into the auditorium. She leaped over trees and bounded over brooklets and benches like a young fawn; and, to tell the truth, Julia appeared to revel in her boy's costume, whereas en jupon she was ill at ease, and in gowns seemed quite as much worried by her long tail as the dog who has been trained to follow her about the stage was by his. By the way, I wonder if any one else noticed that doggie's extraordinary narrative. The appendage in question seemed to disappear between the animal's hind legs and appear again between its two front ones, where it got nibbled from time to time by the either hungry or resentful beast. I wonder what Shakespeare would say if he could see Esmond's Touchstone. Ye gods and little fishes! Of all the pantomime demons and the Old Men of the Sea commend me to this last of Shakespeare's Touchstones. I felt inclined to cry out, like the boys in the celebrated Irish story of Joe Miller, "Be aisy, bhoys! Don't waste him! Spile a fiddler with him!" In addition also to ruining the part of Touchstone, Esmond killed Audrey as well; for poor Kate Phillips could make no headway against such an insurmountable wet blanket. Fancies like these should not be permitted by such an ambitious amateur. Of course, Julia's Rosalind is all that is beautiful—an exquisite performance, taken as a whole, full of charm, instinct with purity, grace and intelligence; a performance to be thought of and remembered for all time. Orlando must really throw aside the mien of the melancholy Dane, it's a little "too previous;" as they say, everything comes to him who waits, and there will be plenty of time for Hamlet, without having his ghost played in "As You Like It." James Fernandez and W. H. Vernon came in a dead heat in the elocution competition. H. H. Vincent was not far behind, and hanging on to his ruffles were H. B. Irving and Vincent Sternroyd, two of the modern school who are wise in following in the footsteps of the old.

Of course, so interesting a play as "As You Like It" must always be successful when only played in a half-hearted fashion; but Manager George Alexander does nothing unless he does it thoroughly; so, in addition to being a lovely poetic play, it is on the whole charmingly acted and beautifully mounted. The production teems with distinction. It is all convincing and delightful from start to finish. It is a success, indeed, that places it on a pedestal far and away above anything George Alexander has done yet. He has worked for success. He has obtained it.

"THE CIRCUS GIRL."

The old saying that "Too many cooks spoil the broth" is undoubtedly out of date as regards the new variety entertainment at the Gaiety Theatre. No fewer than six chefs have been busy with the latest of "up-to-midnight" productions, and the consequence is a menu of unrivalled excellence, wine of unequalled quality, and dessert fit for the little cherubs who sit up aloft. Eat, drink, and be merry to your heart's content is the order of the day at the Gaiety, but—and here I pause for reflection—for to-morrow I shall surely die of dyspepsia, most enterprising George Edwardes, if I partake of every special dish which you serve up with such a lavish hand! No, no, my digestive dramatic organs must be seriously considered; therefore, away with at least half a dozen dainties, and do not heed the cries of the aggrieved cooks. Close your ears to their heart-rending appeals and think of the audience instead! Of pretty Ellaline Terriss it would be impossible to have too much, and I would willingly go on listening to her till to-morrow morning as she warbles in her own delicate little fashion of the enormous strength contained in "Just a little bit of string," and yet again where she describes with her clever stage companion, one Seymour Hicks by name, the antics of the Circus Girl as seen in the ring at the well-known Drivelli's Hippodrome. The first act of the Gaiety play trots us round to the Parisian Boulevards outside the "Café de la Régence," and here we are shown how deplorably dull our London streets are in comparison with the gay walks and roads of Paris. "Oh to be in Paris, now Mi-Carême 's there," will surely be the cry of every one, Browningite or not, of the Gaiety audience; for a brighter, livelier, more fascinating scene cannot possibly be conceived. By the way, the chorus ladies evidently think that Mi-Carême is something nice to eat, for, as they sing it, it sounds very like "ice-kream." The opera will appeal to young and old alike; it is exhilarating and not depressing, just the sort of thing we want at this misquoted "festive season." And now, how am I to describe that fairy-footed delightful little dancer Katie Seymour? But, hold! I have a complaint to make, and is it to be addressed to George Edwardes, James Tanner, W. Palings, Ivan Caryll, Lionel Monckton, Harry Greenbank, Adrian Ross, or the entire Septette? Listen, ye sad merry men of many whims, this dainty little lady does not dance enough to please my greedy appetite; I want at least one "pas seul" and am not allowed even half a one. What does it mean? Who has dared to come between me and my dance? Mr. Edmund Payne, now happily completely restored to health after months and months of terrible suffering, was accorded a welcome such as only an English public knows how to give, and of the sort that brings a lump to your throat and a tear to your eye. Anyhow, it was on this occasion a well-deserved recognition of a clever little favourite, whose quaint humour and drollness as the American bar-tender are alone well worth a visit to the popular playhouse. I must say when the circus scene came on I felt exactly like one of the ragamuffins in John Leech's celebrated picture, who, dragging up a bit of the canvas of a circus tent, yells out to his companion, "'Ere, I say, Bill, 'ave a peep, I can see the 'eels of the 'osses," but I did not feel in such a contented frame of mind as those little urchins. I wanted to see more than the 'eels, and I fancy I am not alone in this respect. The curtains of Mr. Drivelli's hippodrome may be made of very excellent material, but I want to see what is going on behind them, and not to be tantalised with a glimpse of fair women who are whisked through the green room into the circus ring and immediately hidden from our longing eyes by the dropping of those irritating curtains. Arthur Williams, Harry Monkhouse, and Colin Coop all helped to make the new play the success it certainly is, and Ethel Haydon and Miss Maria Davis worked loyally. For brightness, merriment, fun and frolic, the Gaiety entertainment is unrivalled, and I advise all who are in for a fit of the blues—and at this time of the year they are liable to attack people frequently—to pay a visit to this exhilarating show, where a certain cure will be found for all such unpleasant complaints. George Edwardes knows exactly what game to play—the "Shop Girl" was a good card; the "Circus Girl" has, however, trumped it! What better sign of success than a contented audience; and at the Gaiety it is more than contented—it is, like "Box and Cox," satisfied!

NOTES FROM PARIS.

SARAH-IRVING.

"LORENZO the Degenerate," or "Lorenzaccio de Médicis," is from first to last, as given at the Renaissance, un article de Paris. I mean the characters, for the accessories are purely Renaissance and Florentine. Perhaps it is as well that whim and fancy should predominate in the personations—or rather personation, for there is but one player in the drama, Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. She is stage-manager, star, everything; the others are merely well-broken-in foils. Musset's drama has been so adapted for her as to be a monologue, broken by answers or observations to serve as rests, or bring out more clearly the drift of the play. During these pauses for the title-rôle, Lorenzo glides stealthily into corners. Lorenzaccio is neither he, she, nor it, but an oblique, enigmatic third-sex being, who never shows himself plainly until the drop-curtain scene. And then one feels that one only knows about a few of his vices. The rest are still his own secret. In this part Sarah Bernhardt is a curious creature—interesting, fascinating, though slightly sickening. There is a good deal of the leopard or the panther in her gracile ways and remorseless ferocity. She is through and through corrupt and immoral; but no more conscious of her state than if she were a feline of the desert. There is no need for Lorenzo—such as she conceives him—to ask advice of a Macchiavelli. He is a first cousin of Catherine de Médicis and nephew of Pope Clement VII. Musset's conception of the rôle has not been thought of by adapter or actress. But what of that? Musset did not know Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. Nor did he write at a time when a continuously-glutted book-market kept wiping away acquired impressions with a fresh-and-fresh supply of sensational literature. The human mind is now like a slate, over which a damp sponge is constantly passed. The adapters of Lorenzaccio felt this. They also felt that the consequence of a teeming printing-press is a craving for what is morbid and monstrous. Musset was bad enough, but he had to be made worse to whet the appetite of a public that gorges itself on sensational literature. Florence was an awfully corrupt place at the time of Lorenzaccio, and Musset shows it a good deal as it then was. But they go farther at the Renaissance in third-sex suggestions. Alessandro, the illegitimate and reigning Duke, is devoted to beauty, but in a Florentine way. Lorenzo, the rightful heir, no more objects to recruit beauties for his orgies than his cousin, Queen Catherine, objected to use her prettiest maids-of-honour as political weapons. Lorenzaccio is a distingué pander. He never seems to think the office degrading until asked by the Duke to bring to his palace Catherine Ginori, Lorenzo's young aunt, who was brought up with him as a little sister. Probably he might not have scrupled to decoy her also, had she not been on terms of such intimacy that there was a danger of her having penetrated his plan of vengeance. That scheme was to create step by step and patiently an opportunity to stab the usurper with his own hand. Mme. Sarah Bernhardt gives her face a deep lemon tinge, reminding one of the complexions of the sixteenth-century portraits of Italian noble signors. Oddly enough, Alessandro, the illegitimate son of Catherine de Médicis's father and a Moorish slave, is many shades fairer.

It is marvellous how a single player can fill the four acts, and in a drama with a chief character who is all dissimulation. There are only here and there a few outbursts of genuine feeling. The revelation of the scheme in which the whole plot lies is less than gradual. If there were passionate outbursts and thrilling by-play, the drama would miss its mark. Besides, Lorenzo is not only an Italian, but a Florentine. He would not let his own mother divine his thoughts. When soliloquising, he remembers that walls have ears.

Another of the difficulties surmounted is having to wear a single costume from the beginning of the first act to the close of the drop-curtain scene. I think Sarah Bernhardt plumper than she used to be. The make-up of her face gives her a striking resemblance to Sir Henry Irving, with a something that reminds one of Sardou. Her ambition is to out-Irving Irving in a transposition of his Hamlet to the key of Lorenzaccio, and by keeping close to him—without exactly copying him—in plastic poses, get-up, expression, mannerisms, and the show of an all-absorbing personality. Mme. Bernhardt is a she or third-sex Irving, or a transubstantiation of Sir Henry, whimsical, curious, amusing in a subtle way, and by no means caricatural. The hair of the great actress this time is cut short, in the Florentine sixteenth-century fashion, but clusters round the forehead. The doublet fits like a jersey, and the baggy shorts have a petticoatish air akin to knickers, though they do not descend farther than half-way to the knees. This garment might pass for being black, were it not for the jet embroidery on chest and cuffs. This shows that it is pansy purple of the very deepest dye. Sarah Bernhardt is fond of girdles low down on the hips, instead of encircling the waist. She was thus girded in "Theodora" and "Cleopatra," and is again so in "Lorenzaccio." The girdle in "Lorenzaccio" is richly damascened in a key pattern. The "virgin stiletto," with which she intends to stab the Duke Alessandro, has a magnificent hilt, and its sheath is attached to the abdominal belt. Garters break the uniformity of limbs in black silk tights. The knees come too close together for masculinity or anything approaching it. But this defect is artfully concealed by cross-legged or other postures as she stands and soliloquises. The black, Hamletish mantle and a quarto volume bound in oak, with steel clasps, the stiletto, and the effeminacy come in with the lines of Chigi on the pontificates of Alexander VI. and of Julius II.:—

> Once Mars prevail'd; now Pallas reigns;
> But Venus yet her power retains.

And still this drama is a loveless play. Catherine Ginori is the object of a mere passing fancy of the Duke. She is brought chiefly in to hasten the dénouement at the psychological moment.

Mme. Bernhardt's voice has, one might imagine, undergone a transformation, and is now in a lower key. It is neither the voice of man nor woman, but low and agreeable. I cannot imagine how she could, were the pitch artificial, preserve such uniformity through the long monologues. But she does seem relieved when she can yell or make a screaming noise. It is part of the plan to scream and yell daily in practising fencing, so that the Duke's yells shall not be noticed when Lorenzo finds an opportunity to wreak his vengeance. The chance occurs as the Duke is sleeping off an orgie, divested of his armour. Fearing assassination, he never laid aside his coat of mail until one day that he sits to Raphael for his portrait. The portrait-painting scene is effective, and in many ways charming. Raphael is a womanly being, but more angel than woman. The sitter is proud of his fine neck, and must be painted décolleté. That demi-Médicis, the womanish Henri III., brought in Florentine décolletage with French art. When painter and Duke are talking, Lorenzo gets at the armour and throws it into a well in the courtyard of the Palace. The search after the missing objects is extremely spirited. Lorenzo makes Alessandro believe they have been stolen by Maurice, a German free-lance ritter, who was present at the sitting, and then throws a beauty in the Duke's way. You know the rest. "Vengeance" should be the name of the drama. Its author, or original author, Alfred de Musset, was as womanish as Lorenzaccio, and as hard, and cruel. His nickname of "Miss Byron" fitted him exactly. I know a patriarch of ninety-three who, to study him, was his companion in his drunken and other bouts, and speaks of him as the lowest and nastiest fellow he ever met.

The Princess Nazli has written a feeling letter to the Sultan about the Armenian massacres. She also adjured him, while it is yet time, to accomplish reforms that would place him above the reach of hidden or open enemies, and make it impossible for bad men to bring dishonour on his name. The Princess Nazli is "Young Turk." When a short time ago in Paris, she did all she could to lead, by indirect means, the French Government to share her views. I should fancy she must be the most clever member of the Khedivial family. Her husband was Foreign Minister of Turkey, and a supporter of Midhat Pasha's reform schemes. The Princess is said by Turks who know her to have but one defect—extreme love for England. She now points to the Turkish massacres to show that, after all, it may be better to have Lord Cromer at Cairo than a full-fledged Sovereign with Levantine ideas of government. Having no children, she spends the best part of her fortune in works of charity.

An eminent German has complained to me of the Czar's scant courtesy at Breslau. The Kaiser does not know Russian; but, in view of the Imperial Russian visit, he learned enough to welcome him in that tongue, and to propose his and the Empress's health. The Czar, who has a German wife, with whom he speaks German and English daily, answered in French. His mother's mother-tongue is German, though she speaks English in her home circle. She had to learn Danish when, with the rest of her family, she went from Frankfort to live at Copenhagen. My German friend says, "The Czar went out of his way, to slight the Kaiser by speaking French in his answer to him."

I wonder how Prince Bismarck, brooding over his grievances in an ugly and uninteresting country-place, has so long survived his disgrace. He takes most to heart, of all the crows he has to pluck, the Emperor's conduct on his eightieth birthday. The Kaiser brought him a bottle of old, priceless Rhine wine from his own cellar. But he never asked the Prince's opinion on the foreign situation, or in any way referred to politics. The Prince's commentary when the august visitor left was: "Such is Imperial gratitude! He treats me as a dotard."

Prince Bismarck owes a grudge to a Polish lady—the late Princess Battenberg, née Haucke. In attacking the other day "intriguing Polish ladies," he had her in his mind. She was in communication with the friends of her eldest son at Sofia, with the Empress Frederick, the Grand Duchess Serge, and the Duchess of Edinburgh, and lost no opportunity to prove by indirect means that Bismarck was playing him false. The story about the Princess Clémentine, the Comtesse de Flandre, and the Princess Waldemar furnishing the proof was told to cover the Princess of Battenberg's tracks.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

We are clearing the way, dear Lady Betty, for the Christmas crisis! The time is rapidly approaching when we are to be attacked by bills, pills, and numerous ills. In the middle of this century Charles Dickens created a fictitious Christmas, a sort of hodge-podge of impossible middle-class squires; of immaculate out-cast children, who died upon sacks, surrounded by angels, of wicked Dukes who died with devils hovering about their Empire bedsteads; of enormous plum puddings; of enormous potations; of back-stair flirtations; and of various other wierd conceits which it is not advisable to recall. With a stroke of his magic pen he even made the ghosts vulgar. This imaginary Christmas caught the fancy of the people, and since then it has been manipulated for profit so excessively that Christmas now begins in October, and has all the romance taken out of it before Christmas Day comes. As a matter of fact, the modern Christmas is a very depressing day—a day of disappointments, of dyspepsia, and of deep drinking. The evil which men do lives after them. Charles Dickens obscured the glorious religious event which Christians celebrate upon that day by producing a mist composed of fat squires, fat page-boys, pretty housemaids, obsequious poor relations, and many other grotesque creations. Now that the genius who represented these is no more, we have a villainously artificial and commercial Christmas, with the central glorious incident almost overlooked, but replaced by dreary "Christmas Numbers," meaningless Christmas cards, ill-concocted plum-puddings and mince-pies, indigestible turkeys, bad champagne, bad spirits, and bad headaches.

A society should be founded at once for the restoration of the original Christmas.

As has already been said, the so-called "Bismarck revelations" have created considerable anxiety at Court, for Prince Bismarck is understood to have in his possession many of the letters written by members of our Royal Family to King William during the Franco-German war. As our Royal House is closely connected with that of Germany, it would not be surprising if these private letters should contain strong expressions of sympathy with Germany in that struggle. It is feared that, when under the influence of an exceptionally severe attack of indiscretion, Prince Bismarck might cause to be published some of these letters or extracts from them. Were the Prince to descend to so despicable a method of venting his ill-humour, it is supposed that the French might feel seriously hurt, and that the much-talked-of dislike said to be entertained against us in France would be intensified. The French people and the French Press differ widely. The Press in France does not generally reflect the sentiments of the people; on the contrary, its object is to form the opinions of the multitude. For some reason or other not yet discovered it is the object of many French journalists to create a spirit of hatred in France against England. The vast mass of the people have not adopted this policy, and should Prince Bismarck publish the whole, or part of the letters mentioned, it is probable that he would injure himself and Germany more than the revelations would do harm to our Court and this country.

Who is to be the Hercules of Hyde Park? This is the moment: where is the man? When he comes his Twelve Labours will be:—

1. To remove the Ranger.
2. To abolish ridiculous restrictions.
3. To get rid of the infamous women and black-mailers

Spa Winter Season.—Balmy climate. Only 12 hrs. from London. Cercle des Etrangers, with every Monte Carlo attraction, always open. Hôtel tariff from 10fr. per diem. Address, Jules Crehay, Sec.

who make it impossible for other people to enter the Park after dark.

4. To exclude the vagabond orators and actors who infest it during the day, especially on Sunday.

5. To compel the police to patrol the Park properly.

6. To instal the electric-light.

7. To erect picturesque refreshment kiosks.

8. To repair the roads.

9. To embellish the Park and to develop its natural beauties.

10. To prevent reckless riding.

11. To arrange that frequent concerts shall be given by good bands.

12. To lengthen the Ride to where it reached before the Exhibition of '51, and to continue the drive round Kensington Gardens.

It is painful to have to return to the subject, but the Duke of Cambridge abuses the privilege which Royal personages have of being obstinate. Almost a year ago Parliament voted a sum of £1,400 for the purpose of erecting a refreshment kiosk in Hyde Park. Soon after this, the Duke, in his capacity of Ranger, declared that the kiosk could not be built in time to open it for the London season. Much pressure having been put upon him, both in private and by most of the London newspapers, a further official announcement was made to the effect that early in the autumn building operations would be commenced. The autumn has passed away, and the winter is passing, but no builders have yet appeared upon the scene. What is being done with the £1,400, and why does the Duke delay in carrying out the commands of Parliament and in complying with the strongly expressed wishes of the people? There are some who say that the Duke imagines that a policy of delay will tire those who are agitating for the better control of Hyde Park, and will dishearten the community which supports the agitation. Those who maintain this are, if not mischievous, certainly misinformed, for the Duke of Cambridge has lived too long in the world not to have learnt that such a policy, when directed against a legitimate and generally popular purpose, would only aggravate the situation, and might entail consequences altogether disproportionate to the circumstances.

A fortnight ago it was suggested in these columns that an Animatographe Museum should be founded, for the purpose of storing "animated photographs" of the interesting incidents of these times, and of the times that are to come, so that they might be reproduced indefinitely for the benefit of those who are to succeed us.

It is due to this suggestion that the following letter has been addressed to me:—

Sir,—I have read your paragraph on the use of the Animatographe as a means of producing historical records of interesting moving events.

I may say that I offered, several months ago, to present to the authorities of the British Museum a mechanism and a series of my Animated Photographs, hermetically sealed for preservation and reproduction at a future date.

The subjects offered included such as:—

The wedding of Princess Maud,
The "Prince's Derby," Henley Regatta,
Scenes of London Life, and animated photographs of well-known individuals. There appears to be a difficulty in deciding in which section such records should be deposited.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Robert William Paul, M.I.E.E.
Contractor to H.M. Government.

The sooner the difficulty is overcome the better for posterity, for the Animatographe Museum is an institution which the force of circumstances will compel us to establish.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

Messrs. Tattersall's catalogue of this week's Newmarket sales fills twenty columns of the Racing Calendar, and by far the most important item is the Duke of Westminster's lot of horses in training from Kingsclere, which will come up to-morrow. In March last no owner had so promising a team of three-year-olds as the Duke of Westminster, and it was then confidently expected that Regret would win the Derby, and that Omladina would carry off the One Thousand and the Oaks. The very highest opinion was entertained of Regret's merits, and it was declared that there had been no such horse in the Kingsclere stable since the days of Ormonde. After having been extravagantly praised, the unfortunate animal became the object of the most unmeasured and indiscriminate abuse. The fact is, that Regret was a considerably inferior horse to St. Frusquin and Persimmon, and he is deficient in stamina. The Duke of Westminster, being infatuated about him, would not recognise the fact that the horse had been preposterously over-estimated, and his obstinacy on this point cost him just £9,000, as if Labrador had been substituted for Regret in the race for the Jockey Club Stakes he would most assuredly have beaten Persimmon with 6 lb. the best of the weights. It was thought that Regret would be sold at Newmarket, and an astute owner had intended to buy the horse for hurdle-racing, as he is just the stamp of animal to make a good jumper, but the Duke's partiality for the steed has decided him to keep him for another season. The colt has won about £3,000 during the past season, although he was so stupidly and pertinaciously mismanaged in being run either against horses of superior class, or else out of his proper distance. Regret wants a long rest, but if he does well during the winter he will very likely win the Wokingham Stakes at Ascot or the Stewards' Cup at Goodwood, and whenever he is started for a six-furlong race he will be worth backing. The only other of his three-year-olds that the Duke of Westminster is keeping is Labrador, who is expected to make a good Cup horse, as he can stay well, and it will not surprise me if this animal turns out to be the best of next season's four-year-olds over a long distance. Shaddock, who has won six valuable races, is to be sold, and he ought to realise a high price if he is sound, as he may be reasonably expected to win a good handicap next year. Rampion has been a very unlucky horse, as more than once he has come near to winning a big race, and notably at Kempton Park, where he was most unfortunate in being beaten for the Duke of York Handicap, an event which it was palpable to all beholders that he ought to have won. If Rampion goes on all right he is another likely animal to win an important handicap, his best distance being a mile. Conroy also won some valuable races, but he is an uncertain animal, and cannot be trusted to do his best when it comes to a punishing finish. The appearance of Omladina's name in the sale list has excited much surprise, and she will no doubt realise one of the best (if not the very highest) prices of the week. This mare cost 700 gs. as a foal, and during her turf career she won about £4,000 in stakes She was bought and sold before she made her début last year in the Lavant Stakes at Goodwood, but she ran in a somewhat jady manner in that race. Having fully retrieved her reputation by winning the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, Omladina made St. Frusquin fairly gallop in the Middle Park Plate, running at even weights, and she easily defeated Persimmon in that race. This season Omladina proved utterly deficient in stamina, and, after she had won the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot she was turned out of training, and sent to Eaton. Last winter, when Omladina was being praised to the skies, and her victory in the fillies' stakes was being generally predicted, Truth was alone in expressing the opinion (which proved to be correct) that the best had already been seen of the filly on the Turf, and that she would turn out a failure as a three-year-old. The fact is that the stock of her dam, Geheimniss, never do train on. It is for this reason that the Duke of Westminster has decided not to breed from Omladina, although she has grown into a splendid filly, and she ought to make a most successful brood mare. The Duke of Westminster also had a very good-looking lot of two-year-olds, but they have done badly on the whole, although Blue Water did win several races, and Rust is certain to pay for following next season. Simoon, the filly by St. Simon out of Shotover, has proved a great disappointment, and I have no belief whatever in the future of Orelio, the much-trumpeted brother to Ormonde. He will never make a flyer.

If the Duke of Westminster is not likely to be dangerous next season with his three-year-olds, he may expect great things from the two-year-olds. The Eaton yearlings are far and away the best lot that have ever been bred there, and one of the most experienced judges of blood stock in Europe has asserted that if they had been sold at Doncaster, the average for the team of thirteen would have been at least 3,000 gs. The best of this excellent lot are, perhaps, St. Maur, colt by Orme out of St. Mary (dam of La Sagesse); and Lowood, filly by St. Serf out of Rydal (dam of Rampion and Blue Water); but some experts might prefer Collar, by Orme out of Ornament (dam of Labrador) or Ameer, by Orme out of Quetta (dam of Grey Leg). Shotover's yearling is a colt by Orme, and after its birth she was given a rest for twelve months, and is now in foal to St. Simon, a choice which was made in consequence of the great promise of Simoon last winter. There are no yearlings at Eaton out of either Lily Agnes (dam of Ormonde) or Angelica (dam of Blue Green and Orme). The former, who was foaled in 1881, has been sent to Grey Leg, and it is a pity that a fresh cross for the mare was not tried long ago, instead of her being sent year after year to Bend Or in the hope of a second Ormonde. Angelica has a colt by Kendal, and is believed to be in foal to Sir Hugo.

The Duke of Portland, who has experienced a very disastrous season, and who has not been seen on a racecourse since Goodwood, is going to sell three of his two-year-olds (all of which have proved utter failures), and His Reverence, who might carry off a nice handicap next year if he is all right. The Duke is also weeding two of his mares, Dodona, by Springfield, covered by St. Serf; and Donna Fortuna, by Donovan, covered by the Australian horse Carbine. These are both daughters of Lord Falmouth's mare Wheel of Fortune, who cost the Duke of Portland 5,000 gs., and she has proved a complete failure at the stud. There are three young maiden mares from the Welbeck stud, and a high price should be paid for Eisteddfod, by Petrarch out of Modwena (sister to Donovan), while Ayrsmoss, by Ayrshire out of Rattlewings (sister to Galliard), and Don't, by Donovan out of Tact (dam of Overall), ought to prove valuable acquisitions to any stud.

There is a very large entry of mares for the Imperial Produce Stakes of £3,000 at Kempton Park, a race which is to be run in October, 1899. The Prince of Wales heads the list with three, including Perdita II. (dam of Persimmon) and Merrie Lassie (dam of Grig), both served by St. Simon. It is understood, by the way, that Thais will be sent to either Ladas or Isinglass. The Duke of Portland has four, including Memoir, served by Carbine, and Tact, by St. Simon. By the way, have the Laputan advocates of the "scientific breeding" foolery allowed for the abject failure of the Duke's mare, Golden Moments, by Sheen out of Memoir, a cross which was regarded by these voluble visionaries as being absolutely perfect. The Duke of Westminster's lot includes Quetta and Throstle, served by Orme, and Ornament by Best Man. One of Mr. Russel's lot of five is Virginia Shore (dam of Whittier) served by St. Simon, and another is Lady Minting served by Ladas. Mr. L. de Rothschild has Isabel (dam of St. Frusquin) served by St. Simon, and Eira (dam of Galeazzo) by Galopin. I hope, by the way, that the last has not been seen on the turf of Galeazzo, for few people know how good a horse he really was. If Galeazzo had stood training, he would certainly have won several valuable races during the summer and autumn. Mr. Rose has four mares, all covered by Bona Vista, and I hear that a foreign offer of £5,000 for this horse has just been refused. Mr. Platt has entered twelve of the best mares in the Bruntwood Stud, the list being headed by St. Marguerite and Lonely, served respectively by Isinglass and St. Simon. Sir J. B. Maple has twelve mares, including Busybody (dam of Meddler), served by Common, and Corrie Roy, Priestess, and Superba, all by Royal Hampton. Mr. Lorillard has twelve American mares, all served by American sires. "Mr. Jersey" has Lady Rosebery, served by Ravensbury. The only French owner who has patronised this valuable stake is M. Ephrussi, who has entered six mares, all served by French horses.

Last week's cross-country sport was very poor, and in dismal contrast to the excellent racing which used to be seen at the extinct Croydon meeting at this period of the year. It would be difficult to imagine anything more farcical and utterly idiotic than the outrageous list of steeplechase fixtures licensed by the ridiculous National Hunt Committee. There are positively two or three meetings in every week until the opening of the flat race season at Lincoln on March 22. Several of the gate-money fixtures are favoured with no fewer than three winter meetings. It really might be expected that the fantastical tribunal which is supposed to govern cross-country sport would take care that there should be some attempt to confine these meetings within reasonable limits. The fact is that the number licensed this winter is so extravagantly large that it is simply impossible that horses can be forthcoming to make up decent fields at half of them. It is a pity, moreover, that the Committee does not at once adopt such practical reforms as have been sanctioned by the Jockey Club, but nothing is altered in this branch of sport until a change is actually forced upon the Committee by vituperative criticisms from all competent and independent observers.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's wide experience of African life naturally enables him to speak with authority on the education of English youth. He is of opinion that young men give too much attention to sports and too little to education. Hence the success of German competition. I suppose he would rejoice to see English youth scurrying off on Saturday afternoons to Polytechnics and Technical Institutes. These places, of course, would produce the very class of men who, after such an admirable education, would be able to go from one side of Africa to the other. Perhaps the best comment on his statesmanlike remarks is that the Germans are doing all they can to engraft our athletics on to their educational system. Our methods of education for business life may be wrong; but in any system of education there must be recreation, and there are no better opportunities for recreation to be found than in our national sports.

Aston Villa are generally credited with playing a good game when they come to town, and it was generous of the premier League club to go to Woolwich on Monday and there play the Arsenal in order that the gate might be given to the widow of Powell, the Arsenal's back. Owing to an injury received when playing for his club, Powell died. He was buried last week amid every expression of sorrow. There were a large number of valuable wreaths. No doubt those who sent the flowers meant well, but how much more sensible it would have been if the money value of the wreaths had been sent, instead, for the benefit of the widow and children.

There was a really excellent game between Aston Villa and the Corinthians at Queen's Club. At the start it looked like the "Pros." winning easily, for Lodge at back seemed inclined to get mixed up with the forwards, and the goalkeeping was not quite up to the mark. However, a goal, scored from a free kick given when Gettins had been fouled, started the Amateurs' score, and afterwards R. C. Gosling was in superb form, and the match ended in a draw. In the Charity Cup ties, a very Old Carthusian team romped over Clapton, and so the winners will meet the Casuals in the final. The Casuals met Ealing at the Crystal Palace, and the way in which local interest in the game has developed is evidenced by the fact that the G.W.R. ran a special to the Palace. The ground was very sodden, and this upset the short passing game that is played by the Ealing forwards, of whom Chater was the best. Oxford University is playing a much stronger game than was at one time anticipated, and their success over West Bromwich was very creditable. Oriel in the Competition for the College Cup had a marvellous record; not a single goal was scored against them, and after they had beaten the House in the final, and none of their players had been ducked, their record for the Competition was 30 goals to nil. Bardswell, the University cricketer, was goalkeeper.

The race between the Cambridge Trial Eights was not nearly so exciting as that rowed at Oxford. In fact, Goldie's crew went off from the start, and were never in danger. At the same time, Steele stuck pluckily to his work, and he, no doubt, felt the want of shelter from the bank. There was a strong head wind and stream, and so the oarsmen had every difficulty to contend against, and, considering the comparatively short time there has been for practice, the crews did remarkably well, and there is some good workable material, especially among the heavy weights. Indeed, the trials were a great deal better than a good many people had believed them to be, and the President is to be congratulated on the fact that he was able to select men from nine different clubs. This fact alone showed he did not care where a man came from so long as he was a likely oar.

Turning to the probable composition of the eight, the following old Blues will be up next term, namely:—Bieber, Pennington, Bell, and Fernie. The last named has improved as a stroke since last year, and he is as strong as a horse. Pennington was by universal consent one of the best oars in last year's crew, and, as a well-known Cambridge coach, who saw a good deal of the work on the Cam last year says that there was little to choose between him and the reserve man, Taylor, it may safely be assumed that the latter will have a trial. They both rowed in the Caius four that won the Visitors. Then there is Dudley Ward, who will probably go seven, while Bell will shift himself up. There is Guinness for the centre of the boat, and the only place left is bow, which either a Caius or Hall man may get.

At Oxford the University Trial Eights afforded one of the finest races ever seen. The final spurt of Rudges and the way in which Whitworth just held his men together and shook off his opponent's rush, was worth going a long way to see. De Knoop rowed splendidly, and there is no doubt he will keep his seat in the eight. On the other hand, Balfour did not row his weight, and unless he improves again, he may have to retire. Harrington is wanting in stamina. Of the other oars, Edwards and Warre were the best. The race was in one respect not satisfactory. The Whitworth's cox continually bored his opponents, who had rather bad luck in not winning. The prospects of the University are exceedingly interesting. The Light Blues promise to have a much better crew than last year. Will Oxford be able to hold them after Barnes?

In the year 1864, and ever since, a certain number of enthusiasts have, ice permitting, indulged in an open swimming handicap in the Serpentine. In those days there was no Swimming Association to interfere at every turn. A few years ago the Southern Counties' Amateur Swimming Association suddenly demanded a five shilling fee from the Serpentine Club. This imposition was meekly paid. Now this precious Association has coolly refused to permit the race altogether. A correspondent writes asking what is the Serpentine Swimming Club to do? Well, there is the authority of Lord Rosebery for saying that Fox used a big D under certain circumstances. I should feel inclined to make use of that letter to this Association, and hold the race. The way in which all classes of sport are over-legislated for at the present day is simply scandalous. What on earth could these busybodies who compose the S.C.A.S.A. do if the Serpentine S.C. took the bit between its teeth and held the race as usual? The swimmers could not be sent to prison, and suppose they were disbarred from other races? If a man has pluck enough to swim in the Serpentine on Christmas Day surely he has enough courage to teach this Association its proper duties. If a man's civil liberty were circumscribed and molested to a tithe of the extent to which it is in sports, there would be a revolution in twenty-four hours. The chief offending bodies are the Swimming and Football Associations. So far as one can see, there is not a single reason why the Association should have acted in this unwarrantable manner, and there is still less reason why the Serpentine S.C. should pay the slightest heed to such impertinent interference. Some old-established club must sooner or later fight for the freedom of sport. Let the Serpentine S.C. take the opportunity.

It may very well be doubted how far it was wise of the Queen's Club authorities to have a game played on their ground within a few days of the Inter-University Rugby match. No one can pretend that the turf is fast, and when it is cut up by Association nearly every Saturday during the winter, its condition in the middle of December is not first class; nor is its state likely to be improved by the recent heavy weather. At the same time the ground is a great blessing. It is comparatively central, and the present generation of undergraduates knows nothing of those long weary tramps down to Blackheath. But Queen's Club must remember Richmond is not miles away, and, if the ground is not kept decently, the match will be played elsewhere. The ground this year will affect the play most materially. With anything like a dry day the Light Blues should win pretty easily, as they are strong at half, and probably have the best of the argument forward. Even on a wet day their forwards may be expected to pull the game off. They are faster and dribble better than the Oxford men. Blackheath had an easy win over the Old Leysians, and to judge from the cheers of the club's out-and-out partisans one would imagine that Blackheath had scored a signal victory. But they did not, and they are very far from being a strong team. The Old Merchant Taylors' gave a most disappointing show against Guys, but the hospital forwards are very fair, and their outsides above the average. The Scottish had little trouble in beating Cooper's Hill. Brighton are playing anything but a good game this year. They were never dangerous against Middlesex Hospital, whose outsides were naturally strengthened by the presence of Bennett at three-quarter.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—Movements have been somewhat irregular during the past week. The favourable features were increased activity and greater strength of Home Rails, another rise in Consols, and a recovery in the American market. The disagreeable events took place chiefly in the Mining Market, in which heavy sales were again pressed for French account, and further declines were forced, chiefly under the influence of a whole crop of unfounded rumours, set about by

THE SYNDICATE OF LIARS.

Now that the lies about coming political trouble in the Transvaal are exploded, the unscrupulous operators, who desire to make their fortune by depreciating the property of others, are resorting to other stratagems. The rumours circulated referred chiefly to the mining industry, and were to the effect that a number of mines on the Witwatersrand goldfields had been shut down, amongst these the Wemmer. A cablegram from the latter mine has since contradicted the reports; and although the scarcity of water has interfered to some extent with the work at the mines, it is evident that the story of the general shutting-down is altogether false. There are indications that we have pretty well got to the end of the slump, and it may be hoped, too, that the arrival of Messrs. J. B. Robinson, B. I. Barnato and Sol Joel in Johannesburg, will benefit their respective groups. Quotations have undoubtedly pretty well reached bed-rock, and purchases of well selected mining shares at present prices by those who can afford to lock them up should leave considerable profits in a comparatively short time. The attentions of the syndicate of liars have not been confined of late to the Kaffir Circus, but have, as I am explaining elsewhere, also been devoted to the American department, in which just as at present the Cuban question is being worked for a great deal more than it is worth. But with the opening of Congress this bugbear will, no doubt, be laid. Amongst Home Rails there has been brisk speculation in the stocks of the southern passenger lines, partly on rumours with reference to the Kent coalfields. To these, however, I attach less importance than the actual progress made by the Companies. Interbourse securities have been comparatively firm, as the Paris Bourse is pulling itself together again; and amongst South Americans a rise in Argentines has been the feature. Industrial enterprises are being eagerly pushed forward by promoters, though with varying success. The issue of the British Motor Car Syndicate has not caught on, a result upon which the public are to be congratulated. Cycle shares generally are in increasing favour, and it looks as if we were to have quite a revival in this section as the next cycling season approaches. Amongst the Industrial enterprises which are now being dished up to the public there are many doubtful and indifferent concerns, and investors will do well to thoroughly examine into the merits of the various undertakings before subscribing.

Home Rails.

Dover "A" and Chatham Ordinary have come to the front during the past week, the advance being to some extent stimulated by reports with reference to the Kent coalfield. I have, however, repeatedly explained that the position of the South Eastern alone, and the remarkable progress made by that Company, justify a considerable improvement. The South Eastern statement for the four weeks ended November 14 showed an increase in gross receipts of £7,069, and an increase in the net earnings of £4,682, the expenditure having increased by only £2,387. This is a very satisfactory result, and with the continuance of such earnings a dividend of 3½ per cent. would be assured to Dover "A." To the new extensions which the South Eastern proposes to build, and for which powers are asked in Parliament, there is added the progressive policy of the management in introducing vestibule trains, the first complete train of American cars having commenced running on the 1st inst. between London and Hastings, and this new departure promises to make the line increasingly popular. Dover "A" have touched 105, and are still firm at 104⅜; while there are those who expect this stock to reach 110 by the end of the year. Chatham Ordinary improved to 19⅛, and reacted to 18¾. As a speculative counter, this stock is likely to receive attention in the near future. Brighton "A" touched 183¾, and are now quoted 183. This stock is being bought on dividend prospects, and certainly looks tempting with a distribution of about 7½ per cent. to come off in January. The stocks of the Heavy division have been fairly firm, but a fresh advance has been prevented by nervousness with reference to the recent action of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. The London and North-Western is apparently meeting the demand by training a number of understudies for the signalling department, and for goods guards, while the other Companies seem inclined to make some concessions to the men. At all events, it is hardly likely that a strike will break out at the present time; and as soon as this fear is removed the Home Railway market will doubtless wear a very lively appearance. Great Eastern have been firm, and after touching 109, are quoted 108⅛. I do not consider this stock nearly so good a purchase as Dover "A," but it is being pushed by a clique connected with a bucket shop. Great Northern Deferred are easier, but appear to deserve attention at their present price of 53. Hull and Barnsley have been put up to 39¾ on the proposal to connect the former with the Sheffield Railway. Metropolitan Districts are quoted only about 27, at which they are remarkably cheap, considering the importance of the new deep-level scheme and other extensions which are proposed; to which has to be added the project adopted by an independent Company for building a connection with the London and Tilbury line. Districts were quoted 35 a month or two ago when the position was not nearly so promising. The Scotch stocks have again moved very irregularly. Everybody agrees that with their splendid traffic increases the Caledonian and North British Companies are in an excellent position, and that the present prices of Coras (Caledonian Deferred Ordinary) and North British Deferred are absurdly low. But everybody seems also to be scared by the fear that some labour trouble might spoil the favourable outlook. Matters are, however, according to latest advices, shaping themselves more favourably, and it is now believed that early this week the engineers' dispute will be settled. As regards the relations between the coalmasters and the miners, it is at all events certain that no general strike will come about. Trade in Scotland continues remarkably active, and further traffic increases of the railways are, therefore, a foregone conclusion.

The Yankee Market and Congress.

Although several favourable events have been announced during the last week, there has been no return of briskness in the Yankee market, chiefly owing to the disinclination on the part of operators to enter into further commitments until President Cleveland's message has been issued, and it is possible to judge whether Congress is at all likely to make a feature of the Cuban question. Personally, I think that, although there may be a lot of talk, the utterances of even the most bellicose Senators will end in smoke, as the United States are absolutely unable to enforce any demand with their present inadequate naval strength. There may be some screeching of the American Eagle, but the Cuban question is as little likely to raise serious trouble as the Venezuelan was. Of course the "Bears" have made the utmost use of the Cuban bogey. The Congress which is now assembling, and which will sit until next March, is, of course, the same Congress which raised so much mischief last winter; but the position of the administration on the Cuban subject is well known. The perusal of recent American newspapers shows how busy the syndicate of liars has occasionally been in Wall-street. To what lengths the "Bears" will go is proved by the manner in which the false rumour of the death of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt was circulated a few weeks ago. The announcement that he had died suddenly at his home was made by means of a telephone message sent to the Union Club from the Holland House, the sender of the message giving the name of Mr. Webb. Mr. H. Walter Webb is a member of the Union Club, and is the third Vice-President of the New York Central road. His brother, W. Seward Webb, is President of the Wagner Palace Car Company, and is a member of the Vanderbilt family by marriage. Coming from either of these men, such a statement would naturally enough be accepted as authoritative, and the clerk at the Union Club lost no time in posting the announcement on the bulletin board. It was soon seen by a member of the Club and the news spread very quickly. Messages were at once sent to Wall-street and inquiries by telephone were made for details when it was learned that Mr. Vanderbilt was not dead and that he was as well as he has been for some time. Who personated Mr. Webb, and sent the telephone message from the Holland House, is a question which many persons would like answered, but the answer to which is hardly likely to be forthcoming. It was a dastardly piece of business, viewed from any standpoint. As a New York contemporary puts it, there are those in Wall-street who live upon sensations, and who gloat over catastrophes, but it seems time that a line should be drawn at such stories as this. A good deal is made of the poor traffics on most of the roads, but these are chiefly due to the delay in grain shipments caused by the desire of the farmers to secure even better prices. Moreover, the Railroad decreases really reflect conditions past and gone. Is it reasonable to suppose that the revival of trade and industry, which is now so general in the United States, will before long give the railroads all the tonnage they require? It is absurd to suppose that a continued boom should set in directly after the elections; yet there is no doubt about the revival, and in the first fortnight after the election 307 industrial establishments were re-opened, and 217 took measures to largely increase their output. In the meantime money is exceedingly easy and cheap in New York, and the Bank statements continue to improve. Milwaukee touched 82 a few weeks ago, and have since dropped to 75½, recovering to 77. The "Bear" argument against this stock has been a series of traffic decreases; but the last return was considerably better than the previous ones, and it is anticipated that they will further improve now. The Company has, moreover, so large a surplus to work on, that it will easily be able to maintain its dividend, and it would not be at all surprising to see a jump of 2 or 3 dols. in this stock. Louisville at 52 are also a fair purchase. Denver Prefs. have advanced to 45, on the declaration of the half-yearly dividend of 1 per cent. A favourable impression has also been produced by the announcement of a dividend of 1 per cent. on Southern Prefs. This has exactly borne out my anticipation of a month ago, and the stock has moved up to 32. Southern Ordinary have improved in sympathy to 10¾. According to latest advices, there is every prospect of the Union Pacific Funding Bill being considered by Congress, although President Cleveland's Message on this point sounds rather peremptory. Norfolk Prefs. are hanging fire somewhat, but considering the heavy assessment on this stock, they are cheap enough at 17⅝. In the Bond market a steady business has been transacted, and prices have hardened in several instances. At the request of a number of correspondents, I herewith give a fresh list of gilt-edged and second-class bonds, with the yield at present prices:—

Canadian Pacifics have fluctuated somewhat, and at 57½ are lower for the week. Traffics do not yet show any improvement, but President Van Horne is talking very big as regards the future. Grand Trunks are firmer, the First Prefs. and Guaranteed gaining about a point, although the last traffic return was nothing to boast of. It may, however, be taken for granted that the Canadian lines will also benefit by the great improvement which is in store for the United States, now that confidence is reviving, and the financial outlook is brighter than it has been for years.

Foreigners and South Americans.

The settlement in Paris having passed off much more satisfactorily than had been anticipated, there has been a better tone for interbourse securities. Italians have advanced to about 92¼ on the abandonment of the ambitious African policy by that Government, who are now doing their best to reduce expenses in connection with the Colonies to a minimum. Spanish have fluctuated within narrow limits, but are slightly firmer at 58¾. Advices from Cuba and from the Philippine Islands are most contradictory, but it would appear upon the whole as if the Spaniards had rather gained ground than otherwise. The news from Constantinople has been by no means satisfactory, but Turkish stocks have held their ground. In the South American department Argentines have gone ahead sharply, the 1886 Loan to 83¾, the Funding Loan to 82¾. Dr. Romero is evidently still opposed to the resumption of the full service of the debt, and this scheme is hardly likely to come off as soon as some people expect. A good deal of business has bee transacted in Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cen Railway stock, to which I drew attention last week as gilt-edged investment. This stock is still to be obtai at about 108, at which it is very cheap. Uruguay b dropped at one time to 44½, and have recovered to a 46. The rumours with regard to the insurrection have been, as usual, very contradictory. I do not, as a rule, attach much importance to official statements by Spanish-American Republics, but I am inclined to think that the last statement as to the insurgents having been routed is correct; and if this intelligence is confirmed we may see a sharp rise. Mexican Sixes and Brazilians have been strong, while the rubbish stocks of the South and Central American Republics have been inactive.

The Kaffir Circus.

I have already referred to the exceptional activity of the syndicate of liars in the South African market. Now that the relations between the Transvaal Government and this country are shown to be satisfactory, and there is no more the shadow of a pretext for suggesting political troubles in the Transvaal, unscrupulous "Bears" are inventing all kinds of drawbacks to the mining industry. The shutting-down of the Langlaagte Royal gave them the cue, and they forthwith invented the shutting-down of the Wemmer Mine, while rumours were spread that the whole of the remaining Witwatersrand Mines were on the point of shutting-down, not only on the scarcity of water, but also as a demonstration against the Transvaal Government, in order to force a further reduction in the taxation of the mining industry. So far from the Wemmer Mine being shut down, the crushing makes a very fair showing, the following being the result for November:—3,538 oz. of gold from 5,298 tons of ore; 976 oz. from 3,125 tons treated by the cyanide plant; and from concentrates 135 tons assayed 95 dwt. This crop of rumours seems to have unsettled our excitable French neighbours altogether, and a fresh stream of sales commenced from Paris, prices being knocked down all along the line, and in a most unreasonable manner. As the news of the shutting-down of the Wemmer has been contradicted, and no confirmation has been received as to the shutting-down of any other mines, a firmer tone is now prevailing, and Parisian operators seem to have gathered some comfort from the announcement which has just been made of the Geldenhuis Deep crushing for November, which yielded 6,637 oz. of gold, the profit being about £4,000. As this is considerably better than the October crushing, the Deep Level holders will probably gather a little courage again; and as this has been one of the chief sources of weakness, and has adversely affected the outcrop mines, it may reasonably be supposed that the shares in the latter may also now again appreciate. I should like to point out, moreover, that the leaders of the speculative market have of late been Consolidated Goldfields, Rand Mines, and East Rands, while the rest of the market followed in sympathy. And so it has happened that the shares of sound Witwatersrand mines have been marked down continually, often without any shares changing hands, while sometimes a heavy decline has been brought about by the sale of a small parcel. English holders have been sensible enough, in most instances, to stick to their shares, and they will reap the benefit of having thus shown patience and courage as soon as ever the turn comes. Then, too, prices will go up by leaps and bounds, and it will be almost impossible to buy at anything like present quotations. Quite a crowd of South African notabilities are on board the Dunvegan Castle, which left on Saturday, November 28, for the Cape. Mr. J. B. Robinson, Mr. Abe Bailey, and Mr. Sol Joel had booked passages by this steamer, and they received a somewhat unexpected addition to their company in the person of Mr. B. I. Barnato. Mr. Barnato was seeing his nephew, Mr. Sol Joel off at Southampton, when he took it into his head to go on to Madeira, and when once on the way to the Cape—which he had intended to visit a few weeks later—he could not resist the impulse to go on. He will doubtless be able to render important service to those who are interested in his group of Companies, and thus his improvised journey should prove of considerable advantage to the shareholders. I have already expressed the same opinion with reference to Mr. J. B. Robinson's visit; and I make bold to predict that he will not be long in South Africa ere some good news will come to hand to cheer the holders of Randfontein, Langlaagte Estates, and other mines of his group. He is, moreover, a persona grata with Oom Paul and Transvaal statesmen generally, and his efforts will be directed towards obtaining further facilities, and reductions of taxes for the mining industry generally. Not that I look upon Mr. Robinson as merely a philanthropist, but in asking for concessions for the industry generally he will, of course, benefit his own interests and those of his shareholders. For the guidance of those who wish to average their holdings, or to invest money in Transvaal mining shares, I herewith again give a short list from which a suitable selection could be made:—Langlaagte Estate, New Primrose, Glencairn, City and Suburban, Robinson, Wolhuter, New Crœsus, Kimberley Roodepoort, Knights, Randfontein, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment, Barnato Consols, Buffelsdoorn, Woodstock (Transvaal), Henderson's Estates, Lydenburg Estates, Oceana Consols, Mozambique, Modderfontein "B," and Waterfall Estates. I would, however, again point out, as I have often done before, that only those who can take them up and pay for them should buy mining shares, so as not to be dependent upon temporary fluctuations, which occur as a consequence of market speculation. A fresh development has to be reported with reference to the East Rand Proprietary Company. The insiders and their friends are now offering a sum of £550,000 against a debenture-issue to put the Company into funds, in the event of the Directors' proposal not being adopted at the meeting to be held on the 14th inst. The shares, which at one time dropped to 3¼, have since recovered sharply to nearly 4; the announcement, in fact, benefiting the whole of the market, as showing that somebody, at least, has still some confidence in matters South African. It is reported that a syndicate has been formed, in which Messrs. Bourke and H. B. Marshall are interested, for acquiring a concession for a construction of a railway in the Free State, from Kroonstad to Groenfontein, and thence to the Vaal River, some coal-mining rights in the district being also obtained. The Vogelstruis mill of eighty stamps commenced working on the 30th ult., and, although this is a low-grade proposition, its December output will also help to increase Rand crushings. The New Kleinfontein battery of 140 stamps will probably start work at the commencement of February. An amalgamation of the United Rhodesia Company and the Bulawayo Syndicate is on the board on lines which, however, appear to be very unfavourable to the United Rhodesia, and it is not surprising, therefore, that the shareholders in this Company are opposing the scheme. The Directors of the Abercorn Reefs and of the Umtoli Gold Reefs are continuing their ruthless treatment of the shareholders. Having declared forfeited the shares of a number of these, they are now suing them through Messrs. Burgoyne, Watts, & Co., solicitors, for the amount of the last two calls. I cannot understand why the shareholders, who are thus being victimised, do not unite to stop these proceedings. At least, the amount of these last two calls might have been saved, instead of being frittered away on properties which are apparently valueless! At the meeting of the London-Paris Financial and Mining Corporation, Limited, held on Monday, the proposals in connection with the alliance with the London and Globe Finance Corporation were authorised by the shareholders. Very satisfactory statements were made, not the least of which was the announcement that Lord Loch, Sir William Robinson, and Mr. Whittaker Wright, Directors of the London and Globe Finance Corporation, will join the Board of the London-Paris Financial and Mining Corporation. Diamond shares have fluctuated with gold mining shares, and De Beers are quoted 29⅛, New Jagersfontein 10⅜. It is understood that the annual meeting of the De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited, will be held on the 28th inst.

Golden West Australia.

Considering that the Kaffir Circus was in an utter state of prostration during the past week, it was not to be expected that the West Australian department should show any strength. There have not, therefore, been wanting declines of more or less importance. One of these days, no doubt, West Australians will stand, to use a vulgar expression, "on their own bottom." But at present they are still exposed to the varying influences which affect the South African department, and particularly so during the present interregnum of development of numerous mines before actual results can be shown. It is the general complaint of West Australian mining engineers that the public here are too impatient, and that they will not understand that it takes some time to develop a mine, and more time to get the batteries erected to commence crushing, especially in a young country in which the means of communication are only being gradually established. The public, on the other hand, have every right to reply that promoters should not bring out Companies at so early a stage. The promoter on his part may possibly argue that, on the discovery of a new great goldfield, it is impossible to delay the flotation of companies, and that it is desirable to secure the really good properties. Unfortunately, too many undeveloped properties have been placed on the market, which is at present unable to digest all the millions of shares which had been thrown upon it. One salutary effect has, however, been produced by the temporary fit of indigestion, viz., that the leading financial groups have determined not to place any but fully-developed properties ready for crushing upon the market. This is a change of front which I have repeatedly urged, and I am inclined to think that the few undeveloped properties which have lately been formed into Companies have been absolutely left alone by the public, which serves the foolish promoters, who could not read the signs of the times, right. The public in this country want crushings before they put more money into West Australian Companies. Therefore, I herewith give, as I have done for some time, a list of crushings which have come to hand during the week:—

—	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings per Ton.
Lady Shenton	325	1,335	29 dwt.
Ivanhoe	324	1,128	—
Mount Yahagong ...	300	525	—
Consolidated Murchison	518	278	—
Great Boulder Main Reef	205	348	30 dwt.
Menzies Gold Reef Proprietary	250	447	18 ,,
Menzies Crusoe	600	964	11 ,,

The Lady Shenton has continued to do well, and if the mine can keep up similar returns, I foresee a very considerable rise upon the present price of 2. The Ivanhoe also is doing well, but not much can be said for the Consolidated Murchison, which appears to be working on very low-grade ore. The Lake View Consols settlement having been completed, a reaction has occurred in the shares to $7\frac{1}{8}$, but I should advise my readers to follow the course of these shares very closely, as there is every prospect of a sharp rally when least expected, and I am able to speak positively with regard to the favourable position of the property. London and Globe and W.A. Exploring and Finance have also been affected by the general dulness, being quoted about 4; but at the end of the year a splendid report of these two Companies may be expected, together with a large dividend, and those who buy these shares at the present quotations may look for a large profit. This group has resisted the inroads of the "Bears" better than most others. West Australian Goldfields have been sold down to $5\frac{1}{2}$, Hampton Plains to $2\frac{7}{8}$, and a strong attack has been made on Hannan's Brownhill, while it is a fact that all these shares have proved scarce at recent settlements, a backwardation being exacted. That sooner or later retribution will overtake the ursine party I do not doubt for a moment; and as early in the new year many crushings from new mines may be expected, the discomfiture of the "Bears" will take place then, if not before. A fair amount of dealings have taken place in White Feather Reward at $1\frac{3}{4}$, Great Boulder Main Reef at $1\frac{3}{8}$, Mawson's Reward at $\frac{7}{8}$, Robinson at $\frac{3}{4}$, East Murchison United at $\frac{13}{16}$, and Mount Margaret at $1\frac{1}{16}$; and any one wishing to make up a little private trust of cheap West Australian shares can hardly do better than make a selection from these, and from Gladiators at $\frac{5}{8}$, Burbank's North at par, and Burbank's Consols at par. By the way, the special settlement of the Burbank's Consols has been fixed for December 29. The public issue of the Northern Territories Goldfields will, I understand, be made this week, and the shares of the Company have been very strong, the fully-paid £1 shares being dealt in at $3\frac{11}{16}$, the partly-paid (10s. paid) at $2\frac{11}{16}$ premium; and this will apparently be a very successful issue. West Australian Joint-Stock Trust shares have been firm at about 2 premium, the Founders' shares at from £35 to £40. Great Boulder have fluctuated within narrow limits, and always again find support when they have been attacked by "Bears;" they now stand at $6\frac{1}{4}$. Messrs. Stoneham and Messenger have addressed a communication to Mr. R. P. Houston, M.P., with reference to the Lady Hampton rig. This is an extraordinary communication, which deserves the name of apology in its fullest sense. The firm in question, who had undoubtedly sold a considerable number of Lady Hampton shares short, as I explained in last week's issue, now "have no hesitation in withdrawing all charges which they have made against Mr. Houston and his friends," and they also apologise for the annoyance caused to them by the employment of private detectives, and agree to pay the sum of £1,000 to be divided amongst any charities Mr. Houston and his friends may name. They add significantly that this apology is unconditional, and entirely because they consider it due to him, and leaves the financial situation still to be dealt with. I do not know what charges Messrs. Stoneham & Messenger have made against Mr. Houston, but that gentleman has evidently got the best of the dispute, and I suppose that the occurrence will be a lesson to jobbers not to sell "Bears" of new enterprises in a hurry. There are still, however, a good many points in connection with the matter to be explained, and I hope that the Stock Exchange Committee will all the same give it their best attention. Another of the Companies of the Venture Syndicate group, viz., the Anglo-French Exploration Company of Western Australia, has obtained excellent results, as was explained by Mr. W. Orriss, who presided over last Wednesday's meeting of shareholders. An interim dividend of 5s. per share was paid on the Ordinary share capital in October, 1895, and now 3s. per share is paid, making a return of 8s. on the original shares 10s. paid. The Deferred shares have each received a sum amounting altogether to £9. 11s. 2d.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

Movements in Indian mines have been irregular, and while Ooregums have been strong, more particularly the Ordinary, there has been a setback in Mysore, Nundydroog, Champion Reefs, and Coromandel. Goldfields of Mysore, on the other hand, are firmer. Amongst Australian mines other than West Australian, Aladdin's Lamps are easier at 2. Mount Lyell have improved, but Mount Morgan, Wentworth, and Gibraltar are lower. Broken Hill Proprietary have given way to $2\frac{1}{2}$, and amongst Charters Towers mines New Queen and New Charters Towers are easier. Croydon mines generally have been in demand. Croydon Consols have advanced to 11s. on the declaration of the dividend, and in anticipation of further large crushings, one of which is due next week. A cablegram just received reports another clean up on December 5, giving 1,995 oz. from 396 tons, or over 5 oz. to the ton. The Manager also cables that there is every indication that the lode will be cut in the new No. 3 deep shaft. As it is, the existing ore reserves are very large, and the No. 3 shaft would simply open up new bodies of rich ore sufficient to keep the mill going for years. The above return is stated to yield £5,000, and thus a fund is already accumulating for the payment of a fourth dividend, although the third dividend of 1s. per share is only payable on the 16th inst. North Croydon Consols are firm at 3s. 6d. to 4s., and some attention has been directed to La Reine d'Or, which are quoted 5s. Developments at this mine have been very favourable of late, and it is expected that this property will follow in the wake of the Croydon Consols. Latest advices with reference to the position of the La Reine d'Or are to the effect that the main shaft is down 530 ft., and that a valuable reef has been opened out 10 ft. wide, while a new reef showing gold has come in on the hanging wall over the other lode. Machinery, consisting of a Krupp ball-mill and cyanide plant, is being erected, and as the ore opened up is of an assay value of from £3 to £4 per ton, profitable crushings will commence almost immediately. As these are £1 shares fully paid, it is obvious that the present quotation leaves a large margin for improvement. New Zealand mines have shown some irregularity, and while Kathleen, Kathleen Crown, and New Zealand Joint-Stock have improved, there have been declines in London and New Zealand Exploration, Komata Reefs, Waihi, and Waitekauri. Taitapu Estates, although not maintaining their full rise, are firm at $3\frac{3}{8}$. It is reported that developments on the New Zealand Talisman Gold Mining Company's property have been particularly favourable since the acquisition of the mine, and the twenty-stamp mill, which is now in course of erection, will probably be in full working order by February next. The shares, at anything near par, appear to be a good purchase. In the general foreign section Columbian Hydraulic and Pestarena are firmer, but Lucky Guss have receded. Grand Central are quoted at $2\frac{1}{2}$, a dividend of 2s. having been announced at last week's meeting of shareholders.

The "Moses Moss" Toy Fund.

For the last two years, when the Truth Toy Fund was in need of help, I started a "Moses Moss" Toy Fund, which was supported by my friends on the Stock Exchange, by some of the great banking firms, who are always distinguished by their generous support of charitable and philanthropic objects, and by some of the correspondents to whom I supply willingly and gratuitously information in my Letter Box. To many of these I have been of considerable service, and to some I have saved a good deal of money by my warnings against syndicate touts, rotten land Companies, building societies, and various financial swindles. Others have, on my advice, invested their money carefully and advantageously in gilt-edged securities, which have since risen to much higher prices. Let me therefore appeal to them to support the finances of the Truth Toy Fund, which are at present at a very low ebb. The poor dear children in the hospitals, workhouses, workhouse schools, and infirmaries, who year by year look forward to the Truth toys, must not look in vain. Imagine them weary and disappointed, when your own little ones are enjoying the Christmas gifts which you shower upon them in fond parental love—but there is no time to lose. The Truth Doll Show will, as has been stated, be held at the Albert Hall on Wednesday and Thursday, the 16th and 17th inst., and much remains to be done. So open your hearts and purses, my friends, and send your contributions to the "Moses Moss Truth Toy Fund." All donations will, of course, be publicly acknowledged, and the smallest contributions will be thankfully received. I have already received the following from generous donors :—

"X," £50 ; N. M. Rothschild & Sons, £10. 10s. ; Baring Bros. & Co., £5 ; W. H. Burns, £5 ; Marks, Bulteel, Mills, & Co., £5. 5s. ; M. Van Raalte, £3. 3s. ; G. C. Howard, £2. 2s. ; L. Clow & Co., £2. 2s. ; J. R. Ellerman, £2. 2s. ; A. H. P. Stoneham, £2. 2s. ; T. Carmichael & Co., £2. 2s. ; Otto Stange, £1. 1s. ; D. J. MacRae, £1. 1s. ; F. R. Bullock, £2. 2s. ; J. A. Scrivener, £2. 2s. ; J. T. Segrue, 10s. 6d. ; Welbore S. Ellis, £1. 1s.

R. B. Oakley on the War-path.

I have repeatedly devoted attention to the doings of Richard Banner Oakley. Notwithstanding past incidents, he has blossomed forth at 11, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., as a full-blown financier ; and the Underwriting Bureau, of which he is the managing director, is apparently used by him for promoting and financing purposes. His more recent departure is his connection with the Road and Path Cycling Association, of which he has appointed himself honorary secretary. If Mr. Oakley confined his connection with the Road and Path Cycling Association merely to the affairs of that concern, one might come to the conclusion that he was in this instance trying to benefit cyclists and the cycling industry. But from various communications which I have received, Mr. Oakley, amongst others, circularises the members of the Cyclists' Tourist Club, not only with reference to the Road and Path Cycling Association, but he is also appealing to them to subscribe to the Underwriting Bureau, Limited, and favours other persons connected with cycling with prospectuses of the Road and Path Cycling Association, and of the Underwriting Bureau, Limited, together with polite invitations to underwrite capital for a new concern, such as the Cripple Creek (Bull Hill) Finance and Development Company, and the Anglo-Continental Motor Carriage Company (Leutzmann's patents). It is clear, therefore, that Richard Banner Oakley is not acting in this matter as a philanthropist ; but that he is using the Road and Path Cycling Association as a means of obtaining from the public subscriptions to concerns which, on the face of them, are of a highly speculative and doubtful character. In view of the past history of Oakley, I should therefore strongly advise recipients of these communications to have nothing whatever to do with him or with his concerns.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week :—

The London Canning Company, Limited.—With a capital of £12,000, in £1 shares, this Company has been formed for the purpose of purchasing the English, French, and American patent rights, together with the sole rights, to take out letters patent in H.M. Colonies or foreign countries in regard to preparing and preserving in tins every description of food, by a new process, under which the articles of food do not come in contact with the tin itself.

Samuel Salter & Co., Limited, is formed to acquire and carry on the business of Samuel Salter & Co., woollen cloth manufacturers, of the Home and Duke-street Mills, Trowbridge, Wilts. The capital is fixed at £100,000 in Preference and Ordinary shares, and £30,000 Four and a Half per Cent. Mortgage Debenture stock.

The Maypole Company, Limited.—This Company is formed to acquire, work and extend, both at home and abroad, the business and rights of Maypole Soap, and to provide working capital to meet the requirements of the increasing business. The capital is fixed at £200,000, divided into 50,000 £7 per cent. Cumulative Preference shares, and 150,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each.

Maypole Soap is, I hear, an article unique in its way. It thoroughly cleanses any fabric that it may be used for, and simultaneously and permanently dyes the article any colour, which will not wash out. Already a large trade has been done, which is stated to be still increasing, and a very large return is expected when the merits of the soap are better known. The estimated profits show a substantial surplus, after paying the Preference, and a 12 per cent. dividend on the Ordinary shares.

The Worcestershire Brewing and Malting Company, Limited.—With a capital of £260,000, divided into 13,000 Five and a Half per Cent. Preference shares, and 13,000 Ordinary shares of £10 each, this Company has been formed to purchase as going concerns and amalgamate the freehold breweries known as Bucknall's Brewery, Kidderminster, Worcestershire, and the Delph Brewery, Brierley Hill, Staffordshire, with the licensed houses held by them, together with the Unicorn Hotel, Worcester, and other maltings and properties. They also acquire two wine, spirit, and bottled beer businesses. There is in addition to the share capital, £230,000 First Mortgage Four and a Quarter per Cent. Debenture stock.

This is an amalgamation of two old-established breweries with their tied houses and several other properties. In addition to the businesses acquired, there is a large number of shops, cottages, &c., and 40 acres of freehold land included in the purchases, showing ample security for the Debenture stock, while the estimated profits based upon the past three years' trading show sufficient, after paying Debenture and Preference interest, to give a substantial dividend to the ordinary shareholders.

The Mountain Copper Company, Limited, has been formed to acquire and work on an extended scale the copper mines belonging to the Mountain Mines, Limited, situated at Iron Mountain, Shasta County, in the State of California, the smelting works connected therewith and other extensive property, as well as the entire interest in the railway to the mines and the refining works near New York, owned by the New Jersey Metal Refining Works, Limited. The capital is fixed at £1,250,000 in shares of £5 each.

The North-Eastern Breweries, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the brewery and wine and spirit business of Messrs. Bramwell & Co., of Church-street Bond Vaults, and the Wear Brewery and Maltings, Sunderland ; also the business of William Story & Co., of Moor-street, Brewery, Sunderland ; Richard Murray, Wine and Spirit Merchant and Aerated Water Manufacturer, of Consett ; J. H. Graham, Wine Merchant, Middlesbrough ; P. B. Junor, Brewer, Tudhoe Grange, Spennymoor ; and Thomas Elwen & Son, of Frederick-street, Sunderland ; with Maltings and 139 tied houses and other properties. The share capital is fixed at £400,000 and £400,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture stock.

The Northern Territories Goldfields of Australia, Limited.—The capital of this Company is fixed at £300,000 in £1 shares. They have acquired six groups of developed and working mines of about 700 acres, situate in the Northern Territory of Australia, together with a large quantity of plant, machinery, &c., and upwards of 30,000 tons of tailings. The shares are quoted at a high premium in the market.

It is seldom that such an extensive group of developed and working mines under one management is offered for public subscription. The capital is very moderate in proportion to the properties acquired, consisting, as they do, of 700 acres of mining claims with machinery and plant, ready for work. The syndicate which makes this issue is a very powerful one, and shows its confidence in the properties by taking the whole of the purchase-money in shares besides finding £75,000 as working capital. According to experts' reports the mines are very valuable, and this may fairly be looked upon as a promising undertaking.

The "Non Collapsible" Tyre Company, Limited.—With a capital of £130,000 in £1 shares, this Company has been formed to acquire the business of the Cooke detachable tyre and other inventions for improvements in pneumatic tyres, &c.

This appears to be another flotation depending for success only upon the present boom in the cycle trade. The capital, however, is excessive, and it is to be hoped that the Company will be as non-collapsible as the tyre.

The Oban Palace Hotel and Hydropathic Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to purchase, complete, enlarge, and open as a first-class hotel and hydropathic establishment the property known as the Oban Hills Hydropathic Sanatorium, situate on the Ardconnel Estate. The capital is fixed at £250,000.

There can be no doubt but that Oban is a very fine place and healthy, but whether there will ever be sufficient visitors to the place to support an establishment such as is intended is extremely doubtful. Moreover, I fear that the winter losses will spoil, if not eat up the summer profits, if any.

The Law Investment and Reinsurance Corporation, Limited.—This Company is formed with a capital of £1,000,000 in 200,000 shares of £5 each, for the purpose of undertaking the ordinary business of an investment Company.

It would have been as well, I think, if the promoters of this concern had explained the necessity for it. Old-established Companies, a list of share quotations of which are given, and who cover the same ground, have the cream of this kind of business, and will most likely keep it.

The Raglan Cycle and Anti-Friction Ball Company, Limited.—This Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring and amalgamating the businesses of Taylor, Cooper, & Bednell, Limited, cycle manufacturers, of Coventry and London, and the Anti-Friction Ball Company, Limited, of Coventry. The capital asked is £120,000 in £1 shares, and a Debenture issue of £50,000.

When will these cycle issues cease? It seems the desire of all who have any business in connection with this industry to convert themselves into a Limited Company, and ask the public for the capital, which is in most cases very excessive. I cannot see any inducement in this one for the investor.

The Acatène Cycle Company, Limited.—With a capital of £150,000, in shares of £1 each, this Company has been formed to acquire the English patent of Messrs. Malicet & Blin for the manufacture of chainless bicycles, and all improvements applied by them to the chainless bicycle known as the Acatène. The Company also acquire the sole right in a patent for a two-speed gear for the same description of bicycle.

This kind of bicycle has been manufactured in France for the past two years with great success, and has already found great favour in this country with riders. The demand for these machines has so greatly increased that two of the largest manufacturers in Coventry have taken licences to use the patents, at a liberal royalty. The advantages of the Acatène bicycle are many, and as these become better known, a large trade is looked for.

The "Evening News," Limited—Capital £250,000 divided into 25,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares of £5 each, and 125,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each (the whole of which latter are taken by the Vendors). The Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing and carrying on the evening newspaper known as the Evening News.

Combe & Co., Limited.—Issue of £500,000 Three and a Half per Cent. Perpetual Debenture stock, bearing interest from January 1, 1897.

Mortlock's China and Glass Business, Oxford-st., has entered its 150th year, being founded by John Mortlock in 1746. It is carried on by John George Mortlock, the great-great-grandson of the founder, who solicits patronage and recommendation.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

A. T. C.—It is impossible to tell. There seems at present to be an unreasonable scare with regard to an insurrectionary movement; which is, however, greatly exaggerated. Hold. N. C., Cardiff.—I have replied by telegram for once, but this is altogether against my rules. Brighton.—There seem to have been exaggerated rumours with reference to an alleged insurrection in Uruguay. Einnaro.—Hold.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Werai Station, N.S.W.—It is interesting to note that the German touts for lotteries are commencing to devote their attention to even your remote regions. It is quite correct that the Colonial Governments ought to step in, and that the remarks in Truth with regard to the Home Post Office and lotteries, also apply to the present case. Fortunately not a Shareholder.—How can I advise with reference to a Company, which you say is a family concern, without your disclosing the name? X. Y. Z.—If Mr. William Longman is the outside broker, whose doings I described about two years ago, I should certainly advise you not to have anything to do with him. At that time I entered in Truth fully into his history. M. R. P.—No; I do not advise purchase of Cheque Bank Founders' shares, which are being puffed in circulars by F. W. Nish & Co., Crown-court, Old Broad-street, E.C. E. R.—I should say there is but little prospect of the Asia Minor Company ever proving successful, even if the reconstruction be carried out.—W. S., Leicester.—Yes. Annandale.—Amongst the dailies, the Financial News and Financial Times. Amongst the weeklies, the Citizen. W.—You can get the yield you require amongst American Railroad Bonds, a table of which is published this week under "The Yankee Market." I do not advise investment in Eastern banks. P. N., Liverpool.—A gilt-edged investment, which should recommend itself to you is the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Perpetual Debenture stock at 108. According to the figures given in last week's issue under "Foreigners and South Americans," this is a well-secured debenture stock. June.—Outside dealers; you should deal only through members of the Stock Exchange. Blanche.—Outside brokers; have nothing to do with them. Corrigenda.—Both are leading Australian banks, and the investment is satisfactory. G. H. L.—I should prefer the Provident Life Office. Anonymous.—You had better place the matter against Frank Tarrant into the hands of a solicitor; but I am stating your case to-day under "Various Investments." Insurance.—It is a great pity that you should have subscribed to the Insurance Corporation. What is the use of you doing this first, and asking my opinion afterwards? I have myself a very poor opinion of this concern.

Home Rails.

Zero.—I have already answered you. I do not recommend the purchase of East London Third Debentures. T. W. L.—After the heavy fall it would be advisable not to sell, as there is every prospect of a recovery. Fredington.—It is impossible to make profits in such short terms. Amongst the shares mentioned by you I prefer Coras and Dover "A." Humber Extensions are expected to improve. Inquirer, Rushden.—Brighton "A" are a good purchase, and I agree with your view.

American and Foreign Rails.

F. McC.—I do not think there is any dishonest management in the case of this road, but I will inquire into the reason of the traffic decreases. Dragoon.—In such cases it is generally advisable to join the reconstruction and sell after, so as not to forfeit the shares. Curious, Belfast.—Yes; assessments have been paid on Atchison, Erie, and Northern Pacific Prefs., and these are certainly good purchases. On Union Pacifics there has been no assessment yet, but prospects are distinctly improved. Crowborough Spinster.—The firm in question have been negotiating with the provincial Government, but, so far, no result has been achieved. It is, however, quite worth holding the shares. F. C., Ramsgate.—You cannot obtain 5 per cent. interest with perfect security in English securities.

Mining Shares.

H. H., Manchester.—It is a fair Colonial mine, and the price is now 10s. I should think there is a prospect of a recovery. Rustic.—You are quite right to hold Hampton Plains, London and Globe, and West Australian Joint Stock Trust for an important improvement. Hainaults are also a fair mining risk, and Lake View Consols continue to be a good purchase. T. C. B.—There is no option but to hold your Mining shares Nos. 1 to 7 for a rise. H. T. W.—This is not the time to sell Mining shares. Nos. 1 to 6 should be held, and there is a probability of a recovery in the near future. Balne Lane—No option but to hold. Do not average yet. Stonegate.—They will be worth buying presently, but not yet. Gwilym.—No option but to hold for a recovery. Bob Tail.—You are not entitled to the bonus of Porges Randfontein shares, as you bought your Randfontein too late. Durham.—No, you are not entitled to the bonus, which was announced before you bought. Domino.—You know as much about Hit or Miss as I do, a full statement of affairs having been made at the meeting. There seems to be every probability of affairs improving. V. P. P.—No option but to hold. E. E. S.—You should hold both the shares which you have averaged for a marked improvement. I do not like La Campana. Dunod.—Yes, Porges Randfontein, North Randfontein, and Robinson Randfontein are suitable for a lock-up purchase. Redeal.—Amongst the shares mentioned, I prefer No. 10. With regard to No. 14, I suppose times are too bad for the continuation of this dividend. Hartington.—Under the present circumstances, you had better hold all your mining shares, although they were bought against my advice. Notts.—Amongst the shares mentioned, I prefer Nos. 1 and 6. Taffy, Menai Bridge.—Nos. 2 and 3 are the best amongst these finance shares. The shares No. 3 are £1 each, 10s. paid, and the dividend is at the rate of 100 per cent. on the 10s. A. G., Lordship-lane.—It appears that Burgoyne, Watts, & Co., solicitors, 77, Gresham-street, E.C., are suing all the shareholders in the Abercorn Reefs, Limited, for the payment of the remaining calls. I have repeatedly stated that the conduct of the Directors is outrageous, but the only thing to be done is that the shareholders should take the matter in hand and turn them out. Patience Exhausted.—You must be aware that the Jameson raid and the insurrection in Rhodesia has changed the whole aspect of affairs in that country, and necessarily interfered with the working of the concessions. A Directors' report has, however, now been issued. W. T.—The report with reference to the good position of the Woodstock (Transvaal) Gold Mine has appeared in the financial papers, which is apparently deemed sufficient for the information of the shareholders. You should hold your shares for an important advance. R. C.—No temptation to buy these shares. Rampart.—This is a fair mining risk, and you should hold for a recovery. Adelaide.—How can I help you in the matter of the British Dominions Exploration Company? I warned my readers not to have anything to do with it, and you must get out the best way you can. Associated Gold Mines of West Australia are a fair mining risk; and there is no option but to hold the low-priced shares mentioned. A. B. C.—The price of Hampton Gold Hills on the date mentioned was 3s. 6d. for the partly paid. There was no price made for the fully-paid. D. N. R.—1. Yes; you should hold Croydon Consols for a further rise. Take a good profit on No. 2, and there is no option but to hold No. 3. Sell Nos. 4 and 5 when you can get a decent profit. Regular Reader, Harlesden.—No option but to hold these shares for an improvement. Airdrie.—It is impossible to say whether the West Boulder Gold Mine will strike the Ivanhoe Reef, but the property is in a good position. Skilligs.—No option but to hold all your Mining shares for a recovery, although some are not well selected. Kildare Patsy.—Yes, the Northern Territories Goldfields of Australia, Limited, is a promising Company. Cuidado.—Hit or Miss is a fair mining risk, and it is expected that the mine will come right. I do not think so much of Kathleen. If you want to buy low-priced New Zealand Mining shares, you might select Preece's Point or Komata Queens. Clio.—I have not by any means altered my opinion of Hannan's Golden Treasure. This Company is doing well, and when it commences to crush excellent results are expected. You must be aware that in the present temper of the public, they think nothing of any mine which is not crushing. James, Kensington.—Yes, there is every prospect of your getting a good dividend on Johannesburg Consolidated Investment shares next year. No reason to sell Jagersfontein. Perplexity.—You know, of course, how the speculative collapse in W.A. (Gold District) Trading shares has come about. You should certainly hold your shares now, and buy more to average if you can afford to do so. Roland.—No; the Austin Friars Syndicate is quite different from the Austin Syndicate. The Austin Friars Syndicate belongs to the London and Globe group. The Princess Royal has now joined the list of producing mines, and the shares are a fair mining risk. Anxious.—There is still a prospect of this Company coming right. Renob.—No option but to hold all your Mining shares for a recovery. Porges Randfontein are a good purchase, and so are Randfontein. West Ridge.—Yes, I still think that the shares will recover. E. S. B.—No; I think unfavourably of the Indian and Colonial Goldfields, Limited. Leodensian.—There is no late news available, but the Company is supposed to be doing well. Botton.—No option but to hold for a recovery. B. X. L.—Amongst the shares you mention I prefer Mysore Goldfields. Instead of buying the others, you had better follow the advice given in my letter. Tom Tit.—No option but to hold your Mining shares for a rise; they are well selected. Enquirer, Ilfracombe.—1. The mine is likely to do well, and you should hold. 2. No option but to hold these. I do not like the Tehuantepec Exploring Company, and can tell you nothing about the special settlement. Retired.—A fair mining risk. R. C. G.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you I prefer No. 3. Tea.—Yes, you should hold your Mining shares. F. W. B., Bowes Park.—Hold your shares Nos. 1 to 6, which are well-selected. You might average No. 7, and instead of buying No. 8 you might purchase Komata Queen or Preece's Point. I do not recommend a purchase of No. 9. Plen.—1 and 2. Yes. 3. I hope so. 4. Yes. 5. Fair prospects. 6. Probably. 7. Certainly hold London and Globe. Novice, Nottingham.—1. The management has been bad, but it is about to be changed, and you should hold. 2 and 3. Apply to the Secretary for information. 4B. The present price is very moderate. 5 and 6. Not yet. J. W., Devizes.—1. If you do not join the reconstruction you will forfeit your shares. 2. Apparently. 3. Impossible to tell. Beechdale.—Fair mining risks; hold for an improvement. Brightonian.—If you can afford to take the shares up, you might buy more Langlaagte Star. Certainly hold the other shares for an advance. Ignorance.—The Malacate mine has been greatly mismanaged. It is hoped that a change will take place. 2. The Croydon Consols is doing very well, and the shares are a good purchase. Stamps.—I think there is every prospect of the Langlaagte Star mine coming right in time. Hurcot.—Hold all your Mining shares for an improvement. C. F., Bournemouth.—I do not advise purchase of Bechuanaland Exploration. You should consult my letter as regards mines to buy. Nothing fresh about Brazilian finances. C. H. T.—Yes, you might average Bantjes and West Australian Trading shares. Sherwood.—All your shares are well selected, and when the turn comes they will be all right. Sepphoris.—Yes, hold your Mining shares Nos. 1 to 13 for a rise. Stoneygate.—1. There seems to be no option but to join the reconstruction, or else you will forfeit your shares. 2. Hold for a recovery. A Purchaser of Truth, Arlesford.—After the heavy fall, you should certainly hold Minerva. Neither is there any reason for selling Randfontein or Glencairn. Westralia.—You must be aware that there has been a great general slump. Hold your shares; they will recover again. Plunger.—The next dividend will be paid at the end of the year. Sitting Bull.—You need not trouble yourself about Johnnies Investment. These shares will be all right and rise considerably. Seaforth.—Hannan's Group and Hannan's Treasure are good mines, and when they commence crushing they will give a good account of themselves. Hold Nos. 1 to 5 for a recovery. Yorkist.—No option but to hold all your mining shares for a recovery. Nailsea.—The Golden Crown is a promising West Australian mine. I am glad to hear you made money on my advice. L. S.—1. No; you should hold for a recovery. 2. The general slump accounts for it. 3. Quite so; you had better stipulate this with the broker. Edina Carsor.—1. Not exactly. 2. Perhaps. 3. Better hold for the present. Tom.—No option but to hold these shares for a recovery. Veritas.—Johannesburg Consolidated Investment shares are a good purchase. Erin-go-Bragh.—You should hold your mining shares Nos, 1 to 10, which are well selected. They will rise much higher. Argyle.—The Diamond shares in question are somewhat speculative. H. D. C.—Yes, your North Croydon Consols at 3s. 6d. were a good purchase. You should hold the other shares. South Arcot.—No option but to hold the shares, and join the reconstruction rather than forfeit them. Sammy Hard-Up.—No reason to make the change, although I prefer Croydon Consols. Mexico.—I do not like La Campana, and do not recommend a purchase. If you want to invest in a Mexican mine, you should do so in the Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico, Limited, a new Company which is about to be issued. G. D. I.—Hold your shares for an advance. Atlas. I advise you to hold all your mining shares for an improvement. You will get much higher prices next year for them. Disappointed.—There is a general but unreasonable slump, and the only thing you can do is to hold your shares for a recovery. Greenhorn.—You should hold all your shares and sit tight upon them. They will recover. H. G.—I do not think a great deal of the gold mine which you mention, but I should think your best policy is to hold for a recovery. H. R. McC.—No; I do not recommend this British Columbian mine. Engineer, Edinboro'.—1. No. 2. These shares have fallen in the general slump. 3. Yes, but not for a quick turn; it will take some time. 4. Not worth buying, and I have no favourable opinion of No. 5; yet I should not sell now. Erewash.—A. I do not like this concern. B. Yes; I have a favourable opinion of the Victorian Gold Estates. C. Crushing has been impeded through water difficulties. As soon as crushings commence, however, these shares will improve. West Kensington.—This Company has been in liquidation for a considerable number of years, and the shares are therefore valueless.

Industrial Shares.

Hopeful.—No; I have a very adverse opinion of the London Electrical Cab Company, and have repeatedly expressed this. Burr.—I do not like either of the Industrial concerns mentioned by you. G. J., Shooter's-hill.—You should not cross your letters, as this renders them illegible. The meeting of the French Dunlop Company was held a few days ago, and duly reported in the Financial News. I do not know what further information you require, and you should write to the Secretary. Mac, Newry.—This Brewery Company is a promising undertaking, and the fact that at present it the shares are at a discount is no criterion of its merits. Ian.—The Company has not yet received an official quotation. Detroit.—It is quite true that the business of the Goebel Brewery Company has proved most disappointing, and I cannot help thinking that the management is to blame. The shareholders ought to take the matter in hand. R. H. S.—It is not impossible that the Dock stock in question may recover again, but I do not believe in its progressiveness. 2. The Financial News. Telescope.—I do not advise the investment. Lem.—1. No; very speculative. 2. Neither. Keramos.—I cannot possibly express an opinion before the prospectus of the Company is issued. A. D.—No; a very speculative publishing property. You would do much better in Financial Times, Limited, which are £1 shares at 3, and yield over 8 per cent. per annum on the investment. Hard Up, Belgrave-square.—The investment mentioned is a fair one. Dart.—There is a heavy premium on the shares; why not take your profit? Lismore.—No reason to sell Bovril now, and a purchase of Swift Cycles is promising. Ivan.—I do not like this concern, and said so on the flotation of the Company.

Sell if you can. W. T.—I think it is too soon yet to buy Nitrate shares. Persometer.—It might be advisable to sell half of the shares in question, so as not to run too much risk. A. S., Leeds.—I note what you write about Long's Hotel. It is a great pity that you did not attend the meeting yourself. Why not place yourself in communication with the other shareholders, so as to obtain different management? W. H. D.—1. You ought to insist upon obtaining your share of the cash consideration of the Staffordshire Cycle Manufacturing Company, Limited. 2. La Reine d'Or is a promising mine, and latest reports are very favourable. S. N. O.—Yes, the London Canning Company is a promising little undertaking, and I have heard excellent experts' opinions expressed as regards the merits of the invention. The bulk of the capital appears to have been subscribed already. P. S. L.—Yes, Financial Times, Limited, shares are in the receipt of dividends at the rate of 25 per cent. per annum, and yield at 3 upwards of 8 per cent. C. P. J.—I have already expressed an adverse opinion of the British Motor Car Syndicate, Limited, in last week's issue. Have nothing to do with it.

Mixed Investments.

Ruby.—Very speculative; I consider Dover "A" far preferable. F. C. S.—1. I have a very poor opinion of the Richmond Consolidated. 2. Yes. 3. I do not think much of the surroundings of this concern. P. H.—1. Write to the Secretary, 88, Bishopsgate-street, E.C. 2. I should prefer Lake View Consols. 3. A fair mining risk. 4. Yes; the London Distillery and Yeast Company is stated to be doing very well. 5. Yes; very satisfactory. 6. These Nitrate shares will, no doubt, come round again. Rex.—1. Chatham Ordinary are a fair purchase, even at the enhanced value, and the circumstance mentioned by you would benefit them. 2. The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company is doing so well that the shares are likely to improve. See my remarks in Truth of the 3rd inst. Bristol.—You should not be scared into selling; hold. 2. I have always had an adverse opinion of the Bayley's Reward; but now you should hold. 3. I have never said anything in favour of this concern; but in such cases it is generally advisable to join the reconstruction, and sell after. 4. A fair mining risk. 5. Hold Milwaukee, and buy more to average. Scotia.—1. Singer's Cycles are a fair purchase; but I prefer Gladiators and Swifts. I do not think much of the mine in question. Bute.—No; I think you had better hold your Nitrate shares now. Copiapo.—1. I do not think much of this mine; you should sell on a fresh improvement. 2. There is every probability of a revival in Texas "B," and you should hold. A. W., Derby. The shares in the West Australian Loan and General Finance Corporation should be held; this is not the Company to which I referred as undesirable. I do not like the two industrial concerns mentioned. Inflator.—1. Lady's Pictorial Prefs. stand at par; while the Ordinary are not quoted, being vendors' shares. I do not recommend the investment. 2. Such Companies are very speculative. 3. A fair industrial investment, but no catch. 4. No option but to hold. R. N., Hampstead.—Some of these stocks are redeemable at par, or £100. Your selection of eighteen securities seems to be a good one, and I see no reason for suggesting any alteration; with the exception perhaps of Salt Union Debenture stock (9), which I do not like. The Bank shares mentioned are amongst the better-class institutions of the kind. D. T. F.—Yes, I should consider that mixing Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Debentures at 108 with Mexican Cotton Estates Six per Cent. Debentures at 100 would make an excellent form of investment. Rufus.—You can now buy Paquin Limited shares on the Stock Exchange at a slight premium. Amongst gold mines, you might buy Randfontein and Hampton Plains in preference to those mentioned by you. Jack Junior.—All your shares. Nos. 1 to 8, are well selected, and should be held for an advance. Braes.—1. Woodstock (Transvaal) would be very suitable for you; it is a most promising mine. 2. The London-Paris Corporation is likely to do well, now that it has formed an alliance with the London and Globe group. 3. No. 4. Certainly hold Erie for a rise. Reador.—No option but to hold all your mining shares for an improvement. No reason to sell No. 10. Dublin B.—No, you are not entitled to the Porges Randfontein bonus shares, having bought too late. T. R., Whitehaven.—1. The Great Boulder Main Reef is a good mining risk. I do not like La Campana (2); but No. 3 is a fair cycle investment. I do not think much of No. 4; but Bovril (5), especially the Deferred, should be bought. C. E., Hull.—1. Impossible to tell. 2. The Gladiator mine is not yet producing. As soon as crushing begins good results should be obtained. 3. Yes. 4. Certainly. 5. Yes, buy more Croydon Consols, and hold for a big rise. 6. Yes, Southern Ordinary or Union Pacifics would suit you. Carc.—This is a question for a solicitor to answer; but I have always held the worst possible opinion of the Great Horseless Carriage Company. 2. You must take your own decision. 3. No; I should hold. Hard Hit.—You should certainly hold your Scotch stocks for an improvement. Mainland Consols would be a good purchase at present price. F. B., Halifax.—I do not advise you to sell the American bonds, but I have but a poor opinion of your mining shares. A. C., Kensington.—I do not make any charge for replies. There has been a good deal of unfavourable criticism of Chilian finances of lately; which is the reason of the decline. But Chili has always paid her way, and you should hold the bonds. Flint.—1. Amongst Cycle shares I should prefer Dunlop Deferred (3), Swifts (4), and Gladiators. 2. No; you can do better in other shares mentioned in my letter. 3. No. 4. No; you should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange. Nemo Black.—I cannot exactly answer your question as to whether you will get profits on the shares mentioned by January 15; but it is very likely, and there is certainly no reason to sell out now. Medicus, Dublin.—1. Argentine Northern Central Mortgage bonds. 2. Yes. H. E. N.—1. There is very little market for Highland Chiefs, but the mine is apparently doing well. 2. No reason to sell. 3. Fair prospects. No reason to sell the other mine. 4. I have no favourable opinion of the Woodstock South; the mine I recommend is the Woodstock (Transvaal). Hold Dunlop Deferred for a rise. Melanope.—No. 1 is a fair purchase, and so is No. 3. I do not like the others. I. D. G.—The Citizen. Arbutus.—1. Not yet. 2. No. Don.—1. There are two sets of Five per Cent. Debentures, viz., those issued in 1880 are redeemable in 1930; and those issued in 1888 are redeemable in 1918. The Four per Cent. Debentures, issued in 1890, are to be redeemed in 1940. 2. Yes; these are likely to improve, owing to the Mexican Railway pool having again been arranged.

Various Investments.

Increasing ease in the Money Market has benefited gilt-edged securities, and amongst them Consols, which are now quoted x.d., and yet stand at 112, thus showing another rise for the week. As rates of discount for three months' bills have declined to $2\frac{7}{8}$ per cent., while short money stands at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. only, it is evident that the transaction of the Bank of England of borrowing on Consols is not proving profitable. It is, in fact, surprising that the Bank has not yet taken its stock back, but it cannot be long now before this step is adopted. It is evident that money will be plentiful and easy for some time to come, and this circumstance, combined with the continued improvement, is very encouraging as regards the future of the Stock Markets. Silver is practically unchanged at $29\frac{7}{8}$d., but Rupee Paper has reacted slightly to $62\frac{3}{4}$. A very considerable business has been transacted in Cycle shares, and although the highest prices have not in all cases been maintained, several of the leading shares mark advances. Dunlop Deferred stand at $1\frac{1}{2}$, Humber Extensions and Ordinary at $1\frac{5}{16}$; but Simpson's Lever Chains, after rising to 11s., are down again at 9s. A considerable business has been transacted in Gladiators, which have again advanced to $\frac{3}{8}$ premium. Swift Cycles, too, have improved, being quoted $\frac{1}{8}$ premium. With reference to this undertaking the news is exceedingly favourable. When Mr. E. T. Hooley brought out this Company (late the Coventry Machinists Company) the prospectus stated that about 6,000 machines were on order. I am now informed that, as in the case of the Dunlop and Singer Companies, Mr. Hooley's estimate of the profit-earning capacity of this undertaking was exceedingly conservative, as the number of machines on order has been almost trebled, and when the new factory is finished early in the new year there will be scarcely any limit to the output. This, of course, means that Swift Cycles are bound for higher prices. Bagot Tyre shares have reacted to $3\frac{1}{2}$ premium; but as the corner is still very much in evidence, a sharp rebound may happen at any moment. Amongst brewery shares, Allsopps have taken a sudden bound to 182, receding to 179; while Guinness remain at 540. A considerable business is, however, passing in other home brewery Ordinary and Prefs., chiefly in the latter. Dealings in the shares of the Financial Times, Limited, are being reported at £3. In reply to several inquiries, I may mention that this Company owns not only the Financial Times, but also the Draper's Record—a most prosperous journal, besides several other trade papers. The shares at the present price yield upwards of 8 per cent. on the investment, and another dividend at the rate of 25 per cent. is expected to be declared at the end of the year. I am informed that the report which I mentioned last week, that Messrs. Hampton & Sons, the well-known furnishing and decorating firm, would shortly be converted into a Company under the Limited Liability Acts, is untrue. It apparently arose from the fact that another firm doing a similar business proposes to convert. The shares in the new Bovril Company have been offered at a small discount, presumably by "stags" who had applied for a larger number of shares than they required. These shares are now in course of absorption, and there is little doubt but that in due time quotations will brace up again. I am informed that the issue of Septimus Parsonage & Company, Limited, to which I referred last week, has been well received by the public, and that they have gone to allotment. The prospectus of the Minerva Nailless Horseshoe Company, Limited, which I mentioned in a preliminary manner last week, has since been issued, and appears to have been well received. It deals with a patent covering an improved method of horse-shoeing, the value of which is testified to not only by experts but also by practical experience; and if the claims made for the invention are borne out by results, the undertaking should become a very important one. Frank Tarrant & Company are again on the war-path with their circulars containing polite invitations to join their "joint stock deals." They are now heading their circulars with the statement "we are making sound profits with small risk." The question, however, is chiefly as to whether people get their subscriptions back, or whether the profits if made are paid. I have just received a letter from a lady residing in Birmingham, in which she complains that she has not got either her £10 back or any profit, although she has since received five different circulars announcing profits in various "deals." What have Frank Tarrant & Company to say to this? Is the War Office going into the insurance business? I have before me a post-card sent out by T. Bryce, Secretary, dated from the War Office, Pall Mall, S.W., and headed "Civil Service Insurance Society," in which the favour of a reply to a recent circular, relative to a fire insurance with this Society, is asked for. Surely such communications ought not to be issued from a State Department.—Your affectionate Uncle, MOSES.

P.S.—Tuesday Morning.—The strong further rally in South Africans, which came about yesterday, has taken the "Bear" contingent completely by surprise, and advances ranging from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ are marked. The movement is supported by several favourable developments, the rumour that the dynamite monopoly will be abolished being one of them; and if the recovery makes further progress, we shall see some very lively doings, as there are still a great many "Bears" all round the market. It will not, moreover, take long for the movement to spread to the other Mining Departments, notably to the West Australian section, which is also very heavily oversold. President Cleveland's message leaves the Cuban matter very much where it was, although he foreshadows that some time or other, if Spain is unsuccessful in Cuba, the United States Government will have to interfere. This appears to be a remote contingency, while he again emphasises the fact that he is not disposed to recognise the Cuban insurgents as belligerents at the present juncture. Upon the whole, therefore, the Cuban question ought not to interfere with the American market.

QUEER STORY.

A ROMANCE OF THE X RAYS.

ARISTOTLE OWEN was Professor of Photology and Radiography in the Great Science College, which occupied the site of the whilom Aquarium, and presented a far more appropriate vis-à-vis to the Houses of Parliament. Its presence there gently reminded old-fashioned members that their constituents were no longer men whose first thought was amusement, but scientists, men of culture, of large mind, who needed enlightened legislature, and could no longer be hood-winked by cleverly strung-together words of dubious meaning, or the resonant outpourings of inflated wind-bags of so-called oratory.

Aristotle Owen, it is needless to say, was a very clever man, in an age when all men were clever; for the time of which we write was in the year of grace 1920. Science had made gigantic strides; education was on such an extended scale that, though people still starved from want of the common necessities of life, they had the satisfaction of being able to analyse, with scientific accuracy, the slow progress of the diminution of tissue and the certain approach of dissolution.

Yet, with all his cleverness, Professor Owen had been unable to resist a pre-historic weakness—he had fallen in love with, and married, a very pretty woman. This, at first sight, appears only an amiable tendency to which many a great mind has heretofore been subject; yet was it of grievous import to the Professor's peace of mind; for though in 1920 science had made prodigious and progressive strides, virtue, alas! had been somewhat retrograde. Hence it was that, amidst his most abstruse calculations and subtle deductions, harassing thoughts of his pretty wife would arise, and disturb the calm, mental abstraction which science demands. In an earlier and ruder age it might have been said that the Professor was jealous; but the leading medical light of 1920 pronounced it as his grave opinion that Professor Owen suffered from aggravated cardiac acerbitude, and the nervous irritability produced by this insidious disease caused him to watch his wife with lynx-eyed vigilance, and to note every slight inflection in her voice, in her manner; nothing was too trivial to escape being, as it were, instantaneously photographed on his mental sensitive plate.

Professor Owen returned home to dinner. The table was daintily arranged, the food exquisite, his wife at the head of the table in perfect harmony with her surroundings.

"You lecture at the 'Institute' to-morrow evening, do you not, Aristotle?" she asked, as the sweets appeared, "Will you dine at home?"

He looked up quickly. His mental sensitive plate was quivering with eager receptivity, as he answered slowly:

"I find I shall not have to lecture."

The expression of his wife's face altered perceptibly. A little pucker of annoyance contracted her pretty brows, and her lips curved downwards with a disappointed, dejected droop. There was even a faint note of distress in her voice as she answered, plaintively, "Oh, I thought it was quite settled."

"Nothing but a scientific fact or a mathematical problem can be considered definitely settled," he answered, dogmatically; then added in a tone he thought was genial and sympathetic:

"I hope my presence will not inconvenience you, or disturb any arrangements you may have made."

"Oh, not at all. Only I——, well, thinking you would not be at dinner, and away all the evening, I asked Letty Golightly to come up from Wimbledon and share my loneliness. Of course now, as I know she is not a persona grata, I will telephone and put her off."

"Do not, I entreat! I should much prefer that you should make no alteration in your plans."

And Professor Owen rose, left the room, and retired to his study in a very bad frame of mind; the cardiac acerbity was rising most prejudicially to the proper digestion of an excellent dinner.

His wife was right; he did not like Letty Golightly. She was advanced in many ways even for 1920. Yet, with a strange inconsistency, she clung to many pernicious, old-fashioned customs, too—skirt dancing, bicycling, and a love for music-hall songs, among the number—and was engaged to a muscular Hussar with a fine moustache and body, but no mind. Serious as these propensities were, there was another fact, which rendered her even more objectionable in the Professor's eyes: Miss Golightly possessed an unmarried brother, who might have been mistaken for the Hussar. This brother—alas! for the weakness of great men—was the large cause of the Professor's cardiac trouble.

Aristotle Owen sat thinking deeply, until his meditations were disturbed by the tinkling of the telephone-bell. Not only every house, but every room possessed its telephone in 1920. He rose and, placing his ear to the instrument, listened.

"Can you lecture at the People's Palace on 'Inchoate Hymenogeny' to-morrow evening at seven o'clock?" asked the voice of a much-esteemed brother scientist.

Aristotle thought for a moment. A flash of inspiration came to him. He placed his lips to the tube.

The Sanitary Engineering Co. (Carter Bros.), 65, Victoria-st., Westminster, for making Sanitary Surveys in London or country.

"Yes, I can. Will you join me here at 6.30?"

The answer was evidently satisfactory, and the Professor, with a face from which all uncertainty had vanished, joined his wife in the drawing-room.

"I hope you have not put off your friend," he said.

"I telephoned to her, but she was not at home."

"Well, do not alter your arrangements. Blatant has just asked me to lecture at the People's Palace on 'Hymenogeny' to-morrow at seven. He will call for me at 6.30; we shall have supper in the City, and I shall bring him here to sleep; but we shall not be home till late, certainly not before twelve. I have an experiment I wish to try to-night, so do not wait up for me." He returned to his study and was soon deep in various strange preparations.

Pretty Mrs. Owen yawned several times, hummed, pouted, and at last, throwing the novel she was reading on the sofa in disgust, rose to her feet. At that moment the bell of the telephone sounded. She went eagerly to the instrument.

"I am here," said a merry voice; "what do you want?"

"Be sure to come to-morrow evening at seven. Not a moment earlier. I hope Jack is free."

"Jack is free, so is Bob. I shall bring both without fail. How long is the coast clear?"

"Till twelve; better say 11.30."

"Good. Shall catch the twelve train back. Bye, bye."

With a smile of satisfaction on her lips Mrs. Owen left the room. She leant over the banisters—the study door was partly open.

"Good night, Aristotle!" she called gaily. "Don't asphyxiate yourself or blow up the house."

"Good night," her husband answered in a muffled voice of apparent absorption; but he ceased from his labours, and listened eagerly till the sound of a closing door reached him. Then he rang the bell, and, telling the servants not to wait up, sat listening intently, till they retired to their rooms and silence reigned throughout the house.

Taking up a strange-shaped phial, he cautiously left the study, and, ascending the stairs, entered the drawing-room. He pressed the electric button—a sudden blaze of light illumined the room. Locking the door carefully, he went to the window and, drawing up the blind, stood looking into the street.

A narrow strip of ground faced the house, wherein a few dilapidated and dissipated trees reared their meagre branches, almost bare of leaves, but which, nevertheless, gave the name of "Gardens" to the adjoining street. Having studied the object of his investigation sufficiently, he closed the blind, and, turning, gazed at the room and its furniture. Slowly he took from the table the strange-looking phial he had brought with him, into the neck of which he inserted a large spray. With it he squirted a shower of minute drops over the walls and furniture facing the garden. This he did with assiduous care, until every inch was covered with a fine, but perfectly even, surface of moisture, and the air reeked with the fumes of potassium platino-cyanide.

He then approached the electric button, and kneeling down, studied the carpet near the door-post with deep attention. Rising, he crept softly downstairs to the hall-door, opened it gently, and adjusted something with great care near the left-hand door-post. This done, Professor Owen returned to his study.

The following evening, at 6.30 precisely, Blatant arrived, and after a few vague words to Mrs. Owen, he and the Professor started. The little woman gave a sigh of relief as the door closed behind them, and stepping on to the balcony, with a happy smile on her lips watched them out of sight.

Helios-gardens, where Professor Owen resided, was dull and little frequented, especially after dark. It was an eminently respectable and quiet neighbourhood; noise and frivolity were not encouraged. But on that evening the drawing-room of the Professor's house was brilliantly lighted, and thence issued weird, unusual sounds of merry dance music, or the refrain of a wild, popular ditty was wafted out upon the breeze, and made the dull respectability of the encircling gloom shiver with shocked surprise.

Beneath the shadow of the ghostly skeleton-like trees facing the house a man, enveloped in a large cloak, stood watching the lighted window. A far-reaching prolonged hiss sounded, and the watching figure drew a curious pear-shaped glass globe from beneath his cloak. Holding it carefully in his left hand, he manipulated some hidden machinery with his right, and a strange, green glow shone forth.

At the same time another man, crouching in the shadow of the house, crept nearer and nearer to the entrance, then slunk softly up the steps and stood pressed close against the hall-door. The deep obscurity of the porch hid him from the curious eyes of a possible, but not probable, policeman.

The man beneath the trees saw the window suddenly darken; still he gazed steadily, holding the globe jealously. Five minutes or more passed: the window was again brilliantly lighted, and a peal of gay laughter sounded on the startled air.

The slinking form glided from the porch, and turning the corner of the block, was joined by the cloaked figure, and both disappeared in the darkness.

* * * * *

Mrs. Owen's little dinner had passed off pleasantly. The parti carré had returned to the drawing-room. Gay chatter mingled with the clatter of the coffee cups, music and merry songs succeeded the chatter; two of the four amused themselves at the piano, the others conversed confidentially on the sofa.

Suddenly the brilliant light was extinguished and the room plunged in darkness. So startling was this abrupt change that the occupants of the room sat motionless, breathless, dumb. Then Mrs. Owen's voice rose in a little tremulous cry of annoyance.

"This horrid electric light! It did the same thing the other night! and yet Aristotle says these are the best burners. I feel so frightened, or I would ring for lights!"

"It is very jolly as it is," said a man's voice. "I rather like the dark."

"Oh, but see what a ghostly light is playing over the wall. I believe there is something uncanny in the room!" said Letty Golightly, in a quivering voice; and in trembling expectation the four waited.

With equal suddenness the light blazed forth again, and their nervous fear relieved itself in a burst of laughter.

"Is it not stupid?" said Mrs. Owen.

"Rather embarrassing, when the light is turned up quite so quick!" muttered the Hussar. "Ought to ring a bell, don't you know!"

At 11.30 the door of the Professor's house opened, a shrill whistle was heard, which was again repeated; then two light motor-coupés glided up. Into one two figures, a woman's and a man's, entered, a single man mounted the other, and the phantom-like vehicles disappeared into the night.

The lights in the drawing-room went out and reappeared in the room above; and, as a neighbouring clock struck twelve, another motor-car glided swiftly up to the door, and out of it Aristotle Owen and Blatant stepped. They paused a moment in the porch, then, entering, passed into the study. After some minutes the Professor came out alone; he ascended the stairs noiselessly and paused outside his wife's door. All was as silent, as still as death.

He crept down softly, opened the drawing-room door, entered, and closed it again. Then, turning on the light, stood still, his face quivering, his hands shaking with excitement.

He went to the wall and stripped from it a film-like paper, which coiled itself up in snaky folds; peeling the same curious tissue-like substance from a high-backed sofa, he held the long rolls with greatest care, and, pressing the electric button, left the room and returned to his study.

Through the silent hours of the night he and his brother scientist worked.

The first ray of early daylight peeping through the half-drawn curtains found them bending over two X rays radiographs, and lit up Aristotle's face, full of strange perplexity and horrible disappointment.

His experiment was perfect. There had not been a single hitch in his elaborate arrangements. From his own door-step he had extinguished the electric light at the exact moment his friend had attached the induction coil to the tube for producing the Röntgen rays. The apparatus being directed at the first floor, the figures in the drawing-room had been thus placed between the rays and the carefully prepared walls and furniture.

By this clever arrangement Professor Owen had obtained two radiographs of the unconscious occupants of the room.

Here on the table they lay. Yet, though they in part confirmed his suspicions, they helped him not in the least to ascertain with positive accuracy, the terrible truth.

The film, which he had taken from the wall, showed, in clear ghostly shadows, two skeletons: one seated with arms outstretched, as if the bony hands were resting on the keys of a piano; the other bending over the seated form, the bones of one large hand resting on the smaller ones below.

The smaller film, which had been coiled from off the high-backed sofa, also bore two skeleton shadows. These were seated, and, alas! for the Professor's peace of mind, the bony arm of one was round the equally bony waist of the other!"

As he gazed upon them his cardiac trouble became so grievous that his speech was stayed. Not so his friend's.

"Perfect! perfect!" exclaimed Blatant, ecstatically. "These are the best radiographs I have seen produced on the new sensitive film. But, my dear Owen, which are the real lovers, and which is your wife?"

He looked up at his friend, his bleared eyes blinking behind his glasses.

"Ah!" said Aristotle Owen, getting his breath at last with a deep sigh of perplexity. "Which? That is the question. How can a man recognise his wife's bones?"

Blatant stared at him. Slowly—very slowly—he began to realise the terrible perplexity and doubts which troubled his friend's mind.

Then he turned his dull gaze upon the radiographs, and a movement flickered on his lips which, in a less learned and more frivolous man, might have been mistaken for a smile. As soon as he could control this curious muscular contortion, he said, in a voice whose gravity fitted the serious question under discussion:

"Owen, does your wife bicycle? And, if so, has she ever broken a leg?"

"My wife bicycle," repeated Aristotle, in a voice of thunder, which, however, sank into desponding gentleness. "Not to my knowledge; and I am sure she has never broken any bones. But why this question?"

"It is unfortunate she has not," said Blatant, "for even in the radiograph I could detect a fracture of the bone."

"Stay!" cried Owen excitedly. "Jack Golightly broke his right leg near the knee while hunting last year. Look at those legs by the sofa. Has one of them been broken?"

Blatant examined the skeleton shadow closely, then shook his head, discouraged.

"The left knee is crossed over the right and I cannot see the under bones distinctly enough to ascertain a fracture."

"Look at the legs by the piano," cried Owen again, eagerly.

"Useless, my friend; the left leg is in the same line of focus as the right. Again I cannot discriminate between the separate bones."

Aristotle buried his face in his hands, and sat long in painful thought. At last he raised his head and cried, like one demented:

"Her rings! Look at the left hands of the female skeletons!"

Blatant shook his head.

"It is no good. Those male skeletons have completely frustrated your design. See, that one standing up has laid his big bones over the smaller ones; and the two seated skeletons have their hands clasped. There is the appearance of a metal object, but I think it is on the bigger bones!"

He looked up and met his friend's troubled, anxious eyes with undisguised amusement in his own, and trying hard to repress the laughter which shook him, he said:

"It is no use this time, Aristotle. You must try again! The experiment was ingenious and interesting; but not convincing. You must insist on your wife wearing a metal anklet, or cestus, or some other distinctive ornament; then repeat this experiment. But I am afraid it is hardly to be expected that the conditions will be as favourable, or the results as scientifically satisfactory."

MUSIC.

THE FREE MUSICAL SUNDAY.

MR. ROBERT NEWMAN has, I am credibly informed, abolished the free seats at his Sunday concerts, and thus has boldly thrown down the glove to the ultra-Sabbatarians, who are of opinion that the ears of corn might just as well have been plucked on the Saturday. Perhaps I should speak more correctly if I said that the corn should have been picked on the Friday, for the Sunday-Sabbath was not invented till the fourth century of the Christian era. Hitherto, thanks to the law of his Moral Majesty Charles II. and the Act of George III., there were only three ways of performing sacred music on Sunday. One plan was to give it in a church. Indeed, the priests in Hatton Garden have always charged for reserved seats to those who wished to listen to their periodical performances of Rossini's "Stabat Mater." They, I think, are really the pioneers of the movement, and that the money they gained was distributed in much-needed charity among the foreign refugees of Ely Rents and Saffron Hill many will bear testimony. All honour, say I, to the good Fathers. The second course was to give the concert free and hold out the hat at the doors. The pioneers here, I fancy, were the committees of South-place, the People's Concert Society, and similar bodies. Then came the Albert Hall, whose Council, under the advice of Lord James of Hereford, threw open the gallery free, but charged for reserved seats. This also, down to a recent date, Mr. Newman has done at Queen's Hall; but he declines further "to dodge the devil round the stump," and now gives Sunday concerts of classical and sacred music at his own profit or risk. On some concerts he has doubtless severely lost, on others he secures a profit, and although not, I fear, yet quite on the right side, he will be so very shortly. He was, of course, wrong in supposing that the delirious joys of an organ recital would attract the suburban resident, who, despite the alleged dulness of London, finds the open air best in summer, and his family fireside the most comfortable place in the winter. But to Mr. Newman's surprise and mine, he has, with his orchestral concerts, tapped an altogether overlooked stream consisting of shop keepers, shop workers, and the middle classes generally, who have not the time, the money, nor the opportunity to attend the higher priced week-day concerts. In oratorio, it is only fair to say, he was forestalled, and has now heartily been joined, by the National Sunday League, who, however, I believe, still retain the devil-dodging clause about free admission and tickets sold in advance, while Mr. Newman has abolished it.

Mr. Newman has very fearlessly based his proceedings upon common sense. He, of course, knows he is breaking the letter of the law, but the same Act of "Georgii III., vicesimo primo," which imposes upon him a penalty of £200 a day, likewise imposes upon every daily or other paper a penalty of £50 per advertisement of such Sunday concerts, payable to any person who will sue for the same. The daily papers average twenty of those advertisements a week, and as his friends certainly would proceed against the paper, if he were attacked, he thinks either that he is perfectly safe, or that the first note of proceedings would result in an alteration of the law very soon after Parliament met. The Anti-Ears of Corn people, at any rate, seem afraid to try the issue, and, indeed, are resorting to meaner and more trivial methods. A loud voiced individual, who said he was a "working man" a few Sundays ago, presented himself at Queen's Hall, objecting to the name of Gounod on the programme on the ground that the Frenchman was an opera composer. He had evidently been primed, because he did not know his subject, and he was politely referred to a neighbouring church where he was told Gounod's music was being performed, and to a neighbouring public-house where it was not. He came back a quieter though, perhaps, not strictly speaking, a soberer man. Some real artisan then questioned him as to which trades union he belonged to, and the spouter wisely proved an alibi. Another amusing story on the other side is told of a lady who wrote from a house which must be rented at £200 a year, and who complained that, although Queen's Hall was supposed to have free seats, she, who objected to go in with the crowd, was made to pay two shillings.

The moral of the whole affair is this: Nobody wants to force people to attend Sunday concerts, as many have been and still are forced to attend church. But if a man's tastes lead him to organ, or to classical, or to orchestral, or to oratorio music on Sunday, no sensible person wishes to interpose legal obstacles. A theatrical or a music-hall Sunday might or might not be another matter; but we can wait till the question arises, and, moreover, I fancy the variety artist and the actor would himself have something to say about a seven-day week. But concert performers are notoriously not employed (some of them devoutly wish they were) every day of the week, so that there can be no suspicion of overworking; while on the main question, on Sunday a Handel oratorio, a Schubert quartet, or a Beethoven symphony may perhaps do us quite as much good as the public-house, little Bethel, or the family mahogany.

A correspondent, himself a foreigner, writes me as follows:—

> A young English violinist, an old pupil of the Royal Academy, where he distinguished himself as a prominent student, has been playing as a "deputy" for a member in the Queen's Hall orchestra. The member was dismissed on account of his irregular attendance, and a young foreign violinist, who has scarcely been two weeks in London, was appointed over the head of the English deputy, who has been for some time in the orchestra, and could not but give satisfaction to any conductor. If that is the kind of interest Mr. Newman takes in the musical profession, a matter upon which he likes to pride himself on every possible opportunity, the English members of that profession will owe him small thanks for it.

I do not know what my correspondent expects me to do in the matter, nor do I for a moment suppose that Mr. Newman has any preference for a foreign musician over an Englishman. Of course, if the foreigner were a better man, he would be preferred both by the manager and the public. I expect, however, that Mr. Newman does pretty much what his conductor advises him, and certainly in the Queen's Hall Orchestra there are a very large proportion of young men from our various academies of music.

Although "Samson and Delilah" drew a wretchedly poor house—for French oratorio, the "Redemption" excepted, never has been particularly appreciated in England — the performance was a remarkably good one. The manager had gone to the expense of holding two extra rehearsals, and both the band and the Queen's Hall chorus have never been heard to greater advantage. Miss Brema, too, was admirable as Delilah, while Mr. Lloyd fairly revelled in the love music so curiously allotted to this essentially Gallic Samson. Dvorák's "Te Deum," produced by Mr. Henschel on the same evening, is a rather unequal affair, a good deal of it being almost barbaric, while other portions are essentially devotional, in character. This variety, together with the drums and cymbals, of which such liberal use is made, is said to be particularly appreciated in Bohemia. Mr. Barclay Jones's C minor symphony, produced at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, is written quite on the old model, avowedly out of compliment to the clever young composer's teacher, the late Thomas Wingham, who was a great stickler for the conventional "form." At the Popular Concerts on Monday Signor Piatti introduced a a new and thoroughly Italian violoncello sonata, and Mr. Clinton has revived the fine clarionet sonata in E flat of Brahms which Herr Mühlfeld first introduced here at a concert given by Miss Fanny Davies at St. James's Hall last year. There have been a crowd of other concerts of minor interest, although the number of performances this week has dropped down to thirty-six.

Besides the disclaimers which I have already published from Mr. Jacques Blumenthal and Mr. Plowitz Cavour, and the letter of Messrs. Riley, in which they last week stated that they had given notice to terminate Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's Birmingham tenancy, I have received the following very candid and fair letter from Mr. Riviere:—

> As my name has been mentioned in your paper several times lately as being connected with Mr. Cottell's Conservatoire of Music, I should like to give you my explanation. I have known Mr. Lansdowne Cottell since 1878, when I was conducting Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden. If my memory serves me correctly, he called and asked permission to include my name in his prospectus as one of his patrons, which I consented to verbally. I am unable to say more about Mr. Cottell's Conservatoire than this, never having been to the place in any capacity. Under the circumstances I have now written to Mr. Cottell to remove my name from the prospectus of the London Conservatoire of Music.

Mr. Riviere's name is down as one of the "Examiners" of this Conservatoire, and yet it seems he has never been near the place. I have not heard from Dr. J. M. Bentley, Mr. Jewson, Mr. Maycock, and Mr. Harper.

On page 4 of the prospectus of Mr. Cottell's London Conservatoire are printed, in large letters, the names of many noblemen and ladies, grouped together under the omnibus title of "Committee, Patrons, and Subscribers to the Concerts." Among them is Lady Jane Kenney-Herbert. This, if I may judge from the following letter, is another example of Mr. Cottle (or Cottell's) impudence:—

> 38, Norfolk-square, W.
> Lady Jane Kenney-Herbert presents her compliments to the Editor of TRUTH, and wishes to inform him that she has no knowledge whatever of Mr. "Cottell," or of his "Conservatoire of Music," and that he has never had any authority to use her name in any way.
> December 5, 1896.

I have yet to hear from Mrs. Ronalds, Lord and Lady Carrington, Lord Battersea, Sir N. de Rothschild, the Duchess of Wellington, Canon Harford, Sir W. T. Marriott, Lady Albert Altman, Lady Miles, and the Countess of Strafford. Do these ladies and gentlemen really wish to claim (or disclaim) part in the control of such a place?

In the latest London Conservatoire prospectus, by the way, in conspicuously bold type will be seen on the front page, "Concert at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, W. Patrons: her most gracious Majesty the Queen, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, K.G., &c." That the Queen was ever a patron of Mr. Cottell's concerts is, of course, an absurdity. Indeed, in small type will be found "In aid of the funds of the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital." The Queen is patron of the hospital, but it is rather ingenious to identify her Majesty with the Conservatoire, or with a concert which was, I am told, given a long time ago.

The Musical News, the only musical paper, by the way, which has had the pluck to take up the question of Mr. Cottell and his Conservatoire, has now in hand the case of the Church Choir Guild, whose tenancy of premises belonging to the English Church Union the Union Council has recently terminated. "It is understood," says the Musical News, "that this step has been taken on account of a complaint being made that the Guild was affiliated to an association for dealing in this country with diplomas and degrees in absentiâ, in connection with some American scheme." This American scheme is, I believe, that delectable affair in Kansas, where, upon easy terms, you can obtain in absentiâ pretty much the degree (with its hood and gown) which suits your taste, your fancy, or your pocket.

The profits on the recent Norwich Festival dropped from £626 in 1893 to £453 in 1896. Signor Mancinelli received an honorarium of £105. Professor Stanford got nothing. It is nice to be a foreigner at Norwich.

I am asked to say that on the next two Wednesdays, at 8 o'clock, Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be sung at the Marylebone Church by a choir of ninety voices. Canon Barker will, in connection with these services, give very short addresses upon "The Spiritual Influences of Sacred Music."

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I have already given you particulars of the ample way in which the publishers have catered for boy readers. For every taste and every type a gift book is ready to hand. But when I endeavour to make a similar selection for girls, I am at once confronted with a difficulty. The writers of books for girls recognise only one type of reader—the girl whose interests are purely domestic. Take, for instance, the story of "A Girl's Loyalty" (1). It is easily and pleasantly written, but there is nothing in it but the time-honoured paraphernalia of the girls' story-teller: the unwanted poor relation as heroine, the lost will, the rich lover, the final clearing up of all mysteries, and, to round off the whole, the inevitable honeymoon. Again, in "God's Winepress," I find a story of a similar stamp (2). It is just the book with which the pious maiden aunt will endow her nieces under the impression that she is doing them a favour. And the nieces will gather therefrom a sentimentally distorted view of an impossibly religious life. Even when the religious element is happily eliminated the sentimentality usually remains. Perhaps the story which Mrs. L. T. Meade has provided (3) is as free from defects of this nature as anything of the sort can possibly be. The element of goodiness is conspicuously absent. There is movement and life in the pictures of the girl heroines, but a really bad unregenerate girl would be a delicious relief, and give a force to the story which it lacks. This is, I fear, but faint praise for what is, after all, a conscientious piece of work, and a thoroughly interesting story from start to finish. For lovers of the weird, I can commend the series of short stories which Mrs. Molesworth tells so well (4). Uncanny is the right word with which to describe the effect which the writer produces upon her readers, and the simplicity of her methods only adds to the general effect. It is just the book to read aloud by the fireside to a quiet audience, in order to send each member of it shivering to bed, with fearful glances over the shoulder into the passages where the shadows cluster.

I find a difficulty of quite another nature, however, when I attempt to make a selection from the store of books of every description provided for children who have not yet outgrown the primal passion for all that appertains to fairyland. For them nothing is too good. The best of illustration, the daintiest of binding, the choicest of papers is lavished upon them by every publishing house, from the Religious Tract Society's habitation to the Bodley Head. Let me first deal with the original contributions to fairy-lore. "Butter-Scotia" (5), for instance, is sure of a warm welcome, in spite of the evil habit of punning with which one would hardly have expected the author, "His Honour Judge Edward Abbott Parry" to give him his full title, to have been so heavily afflicted. In spite of the rather cheap witticisms, however, there is plenty of fun in the story, while Mr. Macgregor's illustrations are full of humour. There is very much the same style of facetiousness about the story of "Prince Boohoo" (6), with which Mr. Harry Jones hopes to beguile infantile favour. I do not think the tiniest of toddlers is likely to believe in a Prince whose mother bears the name of Queen Kizzimforwotteveredid, or a fairy who talks about detectives. The most successful fairies are those who can be taken seriously and such obviously concocted persons as these will fail to impress even the devoutest fairy-worshipper of five. Once again in this book the illustrations are the saving grace. Nothing daintier, brighter, or better than the drawings with which Mr. Gordon Browne has embellished the pages can be conceived, and, fortunately, the volume is packed full of them. There is a great deal more of the genuine feeling for the fantastic which marks the born teller of fairy tales about Miss Braine's story (7). Judge Parry and Mr. Jones are too obviously making up their stories, Miss Braine, on the other hand, has a story to tell, and to my mind, there can be no question as to the obvious advantages of the latter's method. This volume, too, is prettily illustrated with some very truthful studies of children. Another book I can safely commend, is the graceful little collection of fairy moralities, by Mrs. E. H. Strain (8). It is so well done as to almost reconcile me to one of my pet aversions, the story, tale, or novel, with a purpose. Perhaps it is that the purpose is not rampant, there is no moralising, but all the virtues are cleverly inculcated and appropriately rewarded. Another example of a vain endeavour to be funny is to be found in the series of new adventures through which A. M. J. drags all the old nursery favourites by the heels (9). No child worthy the name will approve of "The Maiden all Forlorn" becoming the historian of her own misfortune, nor the redoubtable "Seven Champions of Christendom" being used to enforce a moral lesson. It savours of sacrilege. Quite a different class of book is that provided by Evelyn Sharp, and illustrated by Mrs. Percy Dearmer (10). Of the stories it is impossible to speak too highly, they are true fairy literature, and the most exigent taste will be satisfied with them. But it is a pity that the illustration was not entrusted to some one else. This is probably Mrs. Dearmer's first attempt at illustration, and the result is a weak combination of Beardsley with those highly-coloured picture sheets which are prepared for children so copiously on the other side of the Channel. Yet it is evident that any amount of trouble has been bestowed upon the reproduction, and, from the point of view of the printer, the result is admirable, the plates having much of the quality of Japanese handiwork. I cannot say that I care either for the illustrations which accompany a selection of Hans Andersen's stories published by Messrs. Constable ([11]). There is nothing grotesque about them, they are occasionally pretty, and that is all. The same criticism by no means applies to the handsome volume with which Mr. G. E. Farrow will surely add to his reputation in the hearts of his young audience ([12]). "The Missing Prince" is a charming tale, and it is adequately illustrated by Mr. Furniss and his little daughter Dorothy. There is also to be found somewhat of the true glamour of fairydom in the adventures of the "Three Princes and Seven Seekers" prettily set forth by Miss Colquhoun ([13]). Here, too, the illustrations are daintily descriptive of the text, and the book as a whole is bound to be warmly welcomed in many a home. Even now I have by no means exhausted the stock of fairy lore. There seems to be no end to it. A really handsome volume for instance is published by Messrs. Osgood, McIlvaine & Co. ([14]). These are real fairy tales, some new, some old, gathered from every land, and wisely garnered for the edification of the young. Yet another covetable collection is that of "Turkish Fairy Tales" translated from the Hungarian version by Mr. R. Nisbet Bain ([15]). These, though admirably adapted for children, will find a wider public, inasmuch as they appeal to all interested in folk-lore. Finally, before turning to another branch of the literature which will fill with delight so many quiet hours in the holiday season, let me bring to your notice a little volume of fairy tale plays which Mrs. Hugh Bell has specially arranged for production by children ([16]). Not only are the plays provided, but the book is fully illustrated, and full directions given for all the essentials for a successful representation.

Of stories for children in which the scene is not laid in fairyland, there is bounteous provision. Specially worthy of purchase is "The Children's Hour" ([17]). It is cheap, and within the reach of every one; it is sold for the benefit of the Invalid Children's Aid Association; but it is chiefly valuable for its store of good things, which talented writers in a veritable galaxy have contributed to its pages. It is quite one of the best books of the season, though it will be run hard in juvenile estimation by the collection of animal stories with which Mr. Andrew Lang has enriched their libraries ([18]). This is an ideal book of its kind, overflowing with anecdotes of precious interest to all lovers of the animal world. Very delightful, too, in a different way, is a pretty romance of the time of the Black Prince, told by Miss Coleridge ([19]). Many a hundred young readers will be the wiser as well as the happier for this narrative of the adventures of the boy minstrel, who is depicted so naturally in his fourteenth-century surroundings. Modern children have their faithful historians in at least two directions. "The Revolt of the Young MacCormacks" ([20]), is as conventionally Irish as might be expected from its title and from the name of the writer. Needless to say, it is amusing from end to end. The Australian youngster, who is the subject of another volume ([21]), has not quite the same originality about him as the Irish prodigies to whom I have just alluded; but, nevertheless, the history of his doings has plenty of incident, and is not without interest for older readers.

It now only remains for me to give you a hint as to the direction in which to search in order to provide the nursery with its due amusement. You cannot do wrong in obtaining "The Bad Child's Book of Beasts" ([22]), both the nonsense rhymes and the pictures are deliciously absurd, and the only fault to be found is that there is not enough of either. A much more satisfying volume, from the point of view of quantity, is to be found in the carefully compiled nonsense of "A Nobody" ([23]). It is nonsense, there can be no doubt, but, at the same time, it is very amusing nonsense, pictorially and otherwise. Any amount of fun can also be obtained from the illustrations, which tell the story of "The Colliwoggs Bicycle Club." These are conceived in the true spirit of the grotesque. Very much the same may be said of Mr. Palmer Cox's "Queer People" ([25]), a volume which in itself is sufficient to supply hours of entertainment. I am not quite so sure about the effort which Mr. Norman Gale has made with the same object in producing a volume of children's verse ([26]). I think, however, that, in classing his productions somewhere between the pure nursery rhyme and Robert Louis Stevenson's children's verse, he has fairly well defined their genuine position. I should have placed them myself just half way. Finally, let me remind you that the annuals of the children's magazines ([27]) which Messrs. Gardner, Darton, & Co. publish are as full of interesting materials, pictorial and letterpress, as ever.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—What treacherous things cheap veils are! I shall never forget seeing Lilla one day with a gap in hers all round the mouth. She had evidently given the thing a tug and caused it to split. The accident imparted an extraordinary look to her face, as though she were waiting to be fed through the aperture. I was reminded of this the other day, at a crowded afternoon party, when a girl came up to me and said: "I've a horrid conviction that my nose has poked itself through my veil. Do be my looking-glass and tell me." It had! It was one of those fine, cobweb-like veils, intensely becoming, but not sufficiently strong to bear tight dragging across the face. That nose-tip looked so funny, like a high rock standing up above the waves. We retreated to a corner and turned the net upside down together in a masterly manner.

The usual cheerful Christmas literature comes pouring in, dealing with murders, suicides, accidents, breaches of the law, both human and Divine, with their disagreeable consequences in the Divorce Court and elsewhere, and, of course, with illustrations to match. One of these festive tales is scarcely inviting enough to read, such uncomfortable ideas are suggested by the pictures, which represent wild-eyed men tearing after each other with unsheathed knives, confronting each other with cocked pistols, &c. Another sweet Christmas story has a frontispiece representing a man being thrown into the sea by two others. A very prominent coloured picture shows us a motherless bairn amidst circumstances of the most depressing description. If Christmas numbers came out after Christmas one would have no difficulty in accounting for all this misery. It would at once be set down to indigestion of the deepest and darkest dye. As it is, it is difficult to formulate a cause for so much ghastly and dispiriting output on the part of both literary men and artists. Some philanthropist ought to rush to the front in good time with champagne suppers, fish dinners, and all the foods of philosophy recommended by Sir Henry Thompson's admirable little book, administering them ad libitum to the contributors to Christmas periodicals.

Richard says that most of these stories are written in the summer holidays of literary men. This would account for much. Away from his own familiar writing-desk, and at the mercy of a lodging-house parlour-maid, who invariably wants to "lay the cloth please, sir," when any lodger has just settled down to write, what could be expected but gloom and dejection? For my part, I heartily wish that fiction and pictures might be entirely eliminated from our Christmas fare, until Time, in its cycles, gets us safely past the morbid phase that characterises the present moment. Gloom and pessimism are not amusing.

I dearly love a good ghost story, one that makes me afraid to go upstairs in the dark with an agreeable terror that is not incompatible with fun and laughter. But it is years since I have come across a good specimen. I do not like those very conscientious ones in which the ghost is accounted for in the end. I like it to remain lurking in my memory just as a proper ghost should, with a pleasant flavour of mystery clinging about it.

And I am a very baby, Amy dear, in the matter of happy endings, and so are the girls. We feel much disturbed if the interesting heroine does not achieve the usual matrimonial ending in the orthodox "live happy ever after" style. Mrs. Steel's enthralling story of the Indian Mutiny, "On the Face of the Waters," in which she has interwoven so skilfully the romance of a few lives, would have been incomplete for me without appendix B, which, by the way, I very nearly missed.

And nowadays there is quite a fashion of sad endings. One has to go to children's stories for the pleasant ones.

I think there is a distinct danger, to judge by some stories, that have recently appeared, that cats and dogs will soon be more highly educated than men and women. Their apprehension of the right thing to do in certain circumstances seems alarmingly on the increase, and what with Board School children partaking of the highest culture, and cats and dogs being educated to earn their own living, this little England of ours will soon become impossible for any above the working classes. I must collect some of these astounding anecdotes to send you some day.

It would be a fearful thing if our domestic animals should ever learn to talk. We scarcely realise to what an extent we confide in them, but we should then soon find it out. Fancy a book entitled "Memoirs of Mrs. Prendergast's Pug" coming out; or "Diary of Dr. Davy's Dachshund," taken down in shorthand from the barks of the dear pets themselves. What a run there would be on the lethal chamber at the Battersea Dogs' Home after such revelations as these!

Do you see that a West End tailor has been making indiscreet disclosures about his customers? He says "Waistcoats are often thickly padded to increase the size of the chest, but a still more singular practice is that resorted to by a well-known dandy, who pads his legs as if he were a football-player. When I measure him for new trousers, which I frequently do, I invariably find him wearing pads, and pads of considerable thickness too." I suppose the gentleman is exceptional. Otherwise we might retaliate with some show of reason when men accuse us of irrationality in costume.

The newest coiffures have the hair piled on the top of the head, sometimes in the form of a teapot handle, and sometimes in the shape of a small bow. The models for these arrangements might have been found in Phiz's illustrations to Dickens' works, omitting the side-curls. At the Lyceum the other evening I saw a wonderful head, which, from a back view, was perfectly round, so much had the hair been pulled out at the sides. It was very up-to-date, the hair forming a horizontal sphere with a little knob in the middle, which was girded in with a string of diamonds. When the girl turned round, we were aware of a charming face, with large, dark eyes, an impertinent little century-end nose, and a lovely mouth, all set in a creamy complexion under the forehead of a sphinx, broad and low. With this vision of loveliness and smartness combined to look at between the acts, and Ellen Terry as Imogen on the stage, we passed, as you may imagine, some hours of enchantment, making a delightful break in the commonplaces of a November world.

The first fancy ball at Niagara is to be on Friday night. Masks and dominoes, of course. Fifty guineas' worth of furs are to reward the wearer of the most successful costume.

Does it not seem a curious choice for the choir at Canterbury Cathedral to have sung the anthem "Who is this that cometh from Edom?" on the occasion of the first visit of the new Archbishop on Sunday last? Some veiled allusion to the wickedness of London might be suspected by the hyper-sensitive dwellers in that delightful city.

You ask me to advise you about Christmas boxes. I am at my wits' end myself. There are a few friends to whom I give the same stereotyped old presents every year. There is sometimes such a rest in uniformity! There are others to whom I never know what to give; but always when I am puzzled I fall back on two never-failing pis-aller—gloves and pocket-handkerchiefs. Being in the mind to pass on this resource of mine for your benefit, I trotted off to Wigmore-street this afternoon and interviewed Mr. Lee on the subject. He showed me such lovely handkerchiefs of finest Irish lawn, embroidered in the neatest of neat designs round the edges, and furnished with initial letters in the most exquisite of stitchery. Any monogram or initial can be worked on a dozen or two in three or four days. Done up in a pretty box, what could be nicer than a goodly supply of these?

You will be surprised to hear that the height of the fashion at the present moment is a quarter-inch hemstitch, such as was in vogue in the time of Louis XVI. Those were the days when the extremes of simplicity and of elaboration not only met, but embraced each other. It appears that Belfast has been over-producing in the matter of handkerchiefs, so that these beautiful ones are now sold by Mr. Lee at less than half the usual price There are so many workers in these Irish factories that they can produce hand-made articles and hand embroidery at the same rate as foreigners charge for machine-work. The handwork is largely supplied to France, where the exquisite fineness and perfect smoothness in the weaving of the Irish lawns is greatly appreciated, rivals though they are to French cambrics.

Next week there is to be a sale at Lee's of some stockings similar to those shown at the Silk Exhibition. The fronts are in silk lace worked in various designs. One pattern has pointed bars across the instep in imitation of a Louis XV. shoe. These are reduced from three guineas a pair to somewhere about a fourth of that sum.

A very useful stocking is half silk, half wool, made at Belper. You will be glad to hear that England is first in the manufacture of stockings, and likely to hold her own for many a long year.

The newest veils have spots, like seed-pearls in size and shape, though black is the chosen colour. These, with a pin spot between, are very becoming. For those who like warmth a very delicate mesh is recommended with an open ring at each cornerof the faint pattern of honeycomb traced by the background. Another veil is peppered very closely over with black spots. This is a great favourite. So are the large chenille spot, which stand out so effectively that the ground is scarcely seen.

White veils are too cold-looking for winter wear, but there are some with black and white spots that look very well. For hunting, a new veil in mohair, and in different thicknesses, has been devised, instead of the ordinary Shetland which has a disagreeable habit of crinkling up just over the lips. The mohair is equally protective and far more becoming.

I am glad I went with Richard to the two great cycle shows, the Stanley and the National. It was all most interesting. Before going I thought I had a fair idea of the vast growth of the industry. But you really want to see the mammoth exhibition at the Agricultural Hall or at the Crystal Palace to adequately realise what an amount of skill and ingenuity and capital and labour must now be employed in ministering to the tastes and the whims and fancies of the biking multitude. The number of the different machines competing for favour, with their infinite variations in the most minute details of construction, and the endless array of rival "accessories" were perfectly bewildering. Yet with all the inventive genius that has been engaged, I suppose nothing like finality has yet been attained. I hope not, I am sure, for there are several little matters in which improvements ought to be devised.

Two things which I had often desired I came across, indeed, at these shows. One is called the "Self-adjusting Bicycle Support," and I have had it attached to my machine. It is an ingenious apparatus which, by the movement of a spring on the handle-bar, throws out a little supporting wheel on either side of the bicycle, and so enables one to ride through a crowd of traffic with a feeling of comparative safety, or to bring the machine to a standstill without having to dismount. The other is a tyre in which a puncture can be repaired without the usual preliminary trouble in getting at it. The advantage of this tyre—the "Lever Tyre" is the name given to it by the Turner Company—is that the outer cover can be so easily removed.

It is just as well to be prepared for such an accident, though the risk of a puncture is not really so great after all. Richard was telling me only the other day of an Irish gentleman who had driven a carriage fitted with the Dunlop pneumatic tyres over 3,000 miles without having a single puncture. This, too, was in a district notorious for the roughness of its roads.

Clare sends me the following letter from Dublin :—

Dearest Madge,—What a very long shadow the coming event of Christmas casts before. Already the signs and tokens of its approach are many in the land, and, of course, multiplying each day. The shops loudly herald it; floods of its special literature inundate us on all sides; every social plan is made with the time fixed either as being before or after Christmas. We are given ample time, without doubt, for preparation, for getting into a suitable vein for the reception of the great festivity. It will not be for want of warning if Christmas Eve finds us—as it usually does—frantically shopping up to the last moment as if the festival had unexpectedly sprung upon us as a great surprise.

How are you disposed towards the coming event, I wonder? Once when candour got the better of discretion, I was guilty of calling Father Christmas a hoary old humbug, with his sham jollity and festivity, his affectation of a Gargantuan appetite, and his pretence of universal generosity and benevolence. I know better now. The rebukes I received, the moral lectures administered to me remain impressed upon my mind as awful warnings against putting myself in the way of them again. Whatever Father Christmas may or may not be, he commands a vast majority, and the wise man or woman, who desires a peaceful life, keeps on the side of the big battalions. Besides life is a system of compromises—we are generally half way through it before we recognise this fact—concessions must be made to everything tangible and intangible, real and ideal, including Christmas in its conventional garb. Let it, then, come as it chooses to present itself, the jolly, rollicking festival of good cheer and good spirits; of blazing hearths and happy homes; of hale old age, happy domestic middle age, and merry childhood. No gout or rheumatism worry the genial old people who dance "up and down the middle" under the mistletoe, married life has no failures or problems, for the husbands and wives, still light of heart and foot, who join heartily in the merriment of the beaming children. Even the Christmas old maid is all sweetness and gentleness, and the crusty old bachelor's crustiness is the thinnest of outside pretences.

Dublin is still socially dull, and likely to be so for some time to come. The season of country visits is in full swing, every one who is any one is passing through the capital rather than making any stay in it, en route from one country house to another. Is there any feature of fashionable life more strange and wonderful than the rounds of visits, sometimes lasting for several months at a time, in which so many pass their lives? One can understand the young and the lonely-lived and single having this nomad taste, but that elderly couples should so frequently desert their own homes for those of their friends is very curious. In fact, the stateliest residences in the kingdom can hardly be called "homes;" it is only when it is "ever so lowly" that a place is like home.

Lord and Lady Cadogan, after the week spent at Adare Manor, co. Limerick, with the Dunravens, returned to the Viceregal Lodge. Last week some visitors were entertained at the Lodge, and a few dinner parties given. Amongst the guests at the latter were Lord and Lady Ashbourne, Lord and Lady Roberts, Lord Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, Mr. Ion Trant Hamilton, and Lady Victoria Hamilton, who is a sister of the present Duke of Wellington. During the week Lord and Lady Cadogan went through the usual varied routine of Viceregal duties, visiting public institutions, opening bazaars, attending sales of work, and so on. One grievance the capital of Ireland certainly has not: that its public institutions suffer neglect in the matter of visits from Viceroyalty. In fact, whatever may be the amusements which the office of Irish Viceroy affords to the nobleman who holds it, there is no doubt about the object lessons which it gives him the opportunity of having in the working of charitable and philanthropic institutions. Lord Cadogan, though sufficiently enthusiastic in the horse cult, is not a hunting man; Lady Cadogan, however, often appears in the hunting fields of Meath and Kildare, accompanied by her sons.

Mr. Gerald and Lady Betty Balfour, who were also at Adare, have, since their return to the Chief Secretary's Lodge, been receiving visits there from members of their family, Lady Emily Lytton and Lord and Lady Rayleigh. There is no rumour of ball-giving at the Chief Secretary's Lodge, though it used to be traditional there at this season; indeed, so strong was the tradition at the time when Mr. Forster was Irish Secretary, that he followed it, and gave a ball at his residence in the park. One fancies that he must have been even less of a dancing man than Mr. G. Balfour. We have had "Shamus O'Brien" over here; Dr. Villiers Stanford, the composer—who was born and grew up in Dublin—came over specially to conduct the performance on two nights. Lord Cadogan, who with a large party was present on Saturday night, was very well received. One wonders how he received the sentiment, "To h—ll with the Government," which met with such an enthusiastic reception from the galleries.
—Yours ever, Clare.

Kitty, who is staying in Glasgow, sends me the following :—

Dearest Madge,—The event of the Glasgow season has come and gone. For months arrangements have been in progress, and on Friday evening last they culminated in the Fancy Costume Ball, given in St. Andrew's Halls, in aid of the Scottish Artists' Benevolent Association. Given a beautiful suite of halls, a brilliant company, good music, and a fine floor, what more can one want for an evening's entertainment? In all these respects our ball has been an unqualified success. To accommodate the large company, the grand concert hall was used for dancing, other rooms being set apart for supper, refreshments, lounge, and so forth.

By ten o'clock the guests had assembled. A proscenium had been erected on the concert platform, and, to the accompaniment of the March from "Tannhäuser, the gay company defiled across the stage. Saint and satan, clown and curate, priest and peasant, characters from every period of the world's history, representatives of all nation, creations of the artist, novelist, and playwright, all the variety that one can imagine, and many strange costumes that no ordinary mortal could ever have dreamt of, were mixed in gorgeous confusion, forming often the most comical and bizarre contrasts. Follies, dames poudrées, peasantry of various countries, all the old friends one meets on such occasions, again greeted the eye, but every here and there were proofs that originality of conception was as prominent as ever, and recent events of public interest were as usual turned to account. We had a trooper of Dr. Jim's band, a South African millionaire, resplendent in diamonds and nuggets; Rhodesia, with cartridge-belt, bullets, &c., fresh from the slaughter of the Matabele; Li Hung Chang—without the yellow jacket; Trilby and Charley's Aunt, both in duplicate; while here and there the black face and enormous head of hair of the Golliwog, unfortunately unaccompanied by his Dutch dolls, could be seen flitting about. One of Charley's Aunts had a considerable altercation with the attendants, who, not being cognisant of matters theatrical, could only with the greatest difficulty be persuaded to allow her access to the gentlemen's dressing-room! Of such confusion of sexes there were several instances, perhaps the most effective being the costume of a lady who was dressed in the very becoming uniform of the Bersaglieri, familiar to every one who has been in Italy, and a new woman of the most advanced type, who, under the title of "Borrowed Plumes," masqueraded in a gentleman's evening dress, complete except for the divided skirt.

One of the features of the evening was a series of four tableaux of the seasons, designed and carried out with most conspicuous success. Spring was represented by a maypole dance of children, perhaps the most effective of all; summer, a picnic flirtation interrupted by a thunderstorm; autumn and winter being devoted to the national sports, golf and curling.

The dances, &c., were announced by a couple of trumpeters preceding a standard bearer with the programme number.

The dancers must have numbered in all close on 900, while about 500 spectators had places in the balcony of the concert hall, whence could be obtained a capital view of the motley moving crowd below. These figures mean that the ball of Friday evening has been as successful as the one in 1882, when £2,600 were realised for the infirmaries, that being up till now the largest sum obtained at a charity ball in Glasgow.—Ever yours, Kitty.

Just a few recipes. Try this chocolate pudding :—

Beat 4 oz. of butter and 4 oz. of sugar together until white, add 2 eggs separately, then mix in 4 oz. of flour. Spread the mixture on a greased and papered baking sheet, and bake it in a moderate oven about twenty minutes. When done turn it on to a sheet of paper, and cut into four rounds with a cutter 4 in. or 5 in. in diameter. Place them on the top of each other, with chocolate sauce between each layer. For the sauce, dissolve 2 oz. of grated chocolate in half a teacup of water, add 1 oz. of sugar, and when it boils add the yolk of an egg mixed with 2 tablespoonfuls of whipped cream. Stir until it thickens, then mix in, very lightly, the whipped white of an egg, and use at once. Serve the pudding hot.

Now that game is plentiful and old birds fall to the sportsman's gun occasionally, I send you a good way to utilise them as they do in France in the celebrated and delicious perdrix aux choux :—

Take two elderly or middle-aged birds and when plucked, singed, and trussed, half roast them. In the meantime prepare one or two cabbages, according to the size and quantity required, by plunging them in boiling water for two or three minutes to soften them, then take them out, strain away the water, and cut out the hard stalks or core. Now put two or three thin slices of bacon at the bottom of a stewpan (unsmoked bacon is best, as the smoked bacon destroys the flavour of the partridge), salt, pepper; a little grated nutmeg should be mixed with the cabbage, and the half of it put in the stewpan over the bacon; place the partridges on this with a good-sized carrot and onion and about ½ lb. of bacon, a bay leaf, and small sprig of thyme; cover all this with the other half of the cabbage and a slice or two of bacon. Moisten sufficiently with good second stock, and cook gently, very gently, till the cabbage and partridges are done, not less than two hours. To serve, the cabbage should be placed neatly on a dish and the birds on the top; the carrot and bacon should be cut in thin slices and arranged tastefully on the mound of cabbage.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Messrs. Chapman and Hall have not only done a service to art, but to literature also, for surely there never was a biography written by one painter of another with such exquisite tact, good taste, and literary appreciation. The engravings published in the original edition have been reproduced in photo-mezzotint, and there are reproductions of other paintings and drawings, making forty-two illustrations in all. The book is tastefully printed and bound, and is a very desirable possession for every lover of Constable's work."

HARRY DE WINDT, F.R.G.S.

CANCER WARDS of the MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.—35 beds devoted to Hopeless Incurable Cases.

A FUND of £12,000 is being raised for the purpose of erecting a separate BUILDING for the accommodation of the FEMALE CANCER PATIENTS hitherto located in the hospital, an improvement which is urgently demanded on the ground of the health, comfort, and convenience of the patients. Towards the cost of the new building the sum of £9,000 has been paid or promised, and an URGENT APPEAL is now made for the balance of £3,000 still required. Patients are admitted without letters or any recommendation, save that of necessity, and are permitted to remain until "relieved by art or released by death."—F. CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY, 15, BUCKINGHAM STREET, ADELPHI, W.C.

The Main Object of the Charity Organisation Society is the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor.

This it endeavours to attain:
1. By bringing about co-operation between the Charities and the Poor Law, and between Charitable persons and agencies of all religious denominations amongst themselves.
2. By spreading sound views on charitable work, and creating a class of almoners to carry them out.
3. By securing due investigation and fitting action in all cases.
4. By repressing mendicity.

MÜLHENS'
RHINE VIOLETS

CAUTION.

Owing to the phenomenal success of this popular Scent, some perfumers are offering essences of their own manufacture under the name of 'RHINE VIOLETS.' The public must not be deceived, but insist upon 'MÜLHENS' brand, which is distilled from the flower itself. Don't accept any bottle not bearing Ferd. Mülhens' name. This alone ensures genuineness. Ferd. Mülhens, of Cologne, is the originator of this exquisite perfume, and was the first to introduce it into England.

The Fashionable Press of London are unanimous in praise of it.

INDIGESTION.

How to Remedy its Many Unpleasantnesses.

Properly used, the stomach is a friend. Abused, it is an enemy.

If, then, you live "not wisely, but too well," you necessarily suffer, unless you counteract the evil by proper treatment.

If you overload the stomach all the organs suffer. The gastric juices that would suffice to digest a moderate quantity of food must necessarily fail to convert a greater supply.

It is not what we eat, but what we digest, that is essential. If you ate food and had no digestion at all, you would starve, just the same as if you ate nothing at all. Digestion, then, is a vital principle, and not only a mechanical operation.

When the system is overloaded, plethoric, and adipose, indigestion is set up, the functions of the liver are deranged, and constipation ensues.

When uric acid is generated in the system, gout, rheumatism, and kidney disorders are set up, and a state of disease ensues.

The best treatment for remedying this state of things has hitherto been found in the "waters" of certain Continental mineral-water springs. But very few people can afford time and money to visit and spend several weeks at a Continental health resort.

Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder contains the vital principle of all Continental mineral waters in a pure, pleasant, and portable form. Always fresh and efficacious at a moment's notice.

The Continental mineral-water springs, and the salts evaporated from them, are mostly drastic and nauseous. But Kutnow's Powder, on the contrary, is gentle and pleasant.

So that you can now have all the benefits of any Continental mineral spring treatment at your own home, at small expense, and in a much more palatable form.

Kutnow's Powder acts as a natural lubricant to the digestive functions, and for the whole alimentary tract.

Kutnow's Powder is prescribed and recommended by medical men.

Kutnow's has been PRESCRIBED to MEMBERS of the ROYAL FAMILY.

All the leading Medical Journals endorse the merits of Kutnow's Powder.

Kutnow's Powder is produced by the ingenious expedient of desiccating the salts which contain the active principle of the mineral water, and combining them with effervescents.

Thus it is by the genial aid of Kutnow's Powder the recalcitrant liver can be brought to its proper usefulness.

Aiding Digestion and dispersing acid dyspepsia.

Banishing the miseries of constipation, gout, and rheumatism.

Giving back the clear skin, the bright eye, and the alert gait of health.

From Dr. BRACHET, Physician at the Baths of Aix-les-Bains.

"Aix-les-Bains, Sept. 15, 1891.

"I have prescribed your Powder for about a year in my hospital practice here, as well as frequently to my private patients. I have obtained the best results in patients suffering from rheumatism and gout, as well as in those who are constipated and bilious from the effects of the 'cure,' or from the change of food and climate. I consider Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder a preparation indispensable to persons travelling."

From EDWARD NAINBY, Esq., for many years Private Secretary to the late Sir MORELL MACKENZIE.

"Bedford Park, Chiswick, W., June 16th, 1896.

"Dear Sir,—I avail myself of your offer in to-day's Daily Telegraph to ask you to be good enough to send me a sample of Kutnow's Powder. I remember Mr. Kutnow called upon Sir Morell Mackenzie (whose Private Secretary I was) in Harley-street a year or two, I think, before he died, and left him two bottles of the Powder, of which he not only spoke but wrote in the highest terms—indeed, I know that on several occasions he prescribed its use to many of his patients. He gave me one of the bottles, and I found it not only pleasant but efficacious. I can only express my surprise that so valuable a medicine has not been brought before the public earlier.

"I am, dear Sir, yours obediently,

"EDWARD NAINBY."

SECRETARY AND OFFICES.—J. F. Remnant, The Brewery, Castle-street, Long Acre, London.

Messrs. Combe & Company converted their Brewery business into a Limited Liability Company in the year 1888, the Directors being the partners of the late firm.

According to the statement of Messrs. Chatteris, Nichols, & Co., Auditors to the Company:—

In the year 1888 the Loans on Mortgage held by the Company amounted to £1,460,000; and in December, 1896, they amounted to £1,900,000.

The Freehold and Leasehold Properties held by the Company in 1888 were valued at £590,000. In December, 1896, these Freehold and Leasehold properties had been increased by purchases to £1,014,000.

The Rents from Public-houses and other Property, and Interest on Money lent on Mortgage, amount to more than sufficient to pay the Interest on the 4 per cent. Mortgage Debenture Stock, the Interest on the present issue, and the Interest on the 5 per cent. Preference Shares.

Since 1888 a sum of £210,000 has been reserved out of the Profits of the Company.

Application may be made on the enclosed form, accompanied by a deposit of £10 per £100 Stock.

In cases where no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned; and where the amount allotted is less than that subscribed for, the balance will be applied towards the payment due on allotment. Failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture. The final payment may be made under discount at 3½ per cent. per annum after Allotment.

70, Old Broad-street. London, December 7th, 1896.

The Subscription List will open on Tuesday, the 8th day of December, 1896, and will close on Saturday, the 12th day of December, 1896, both for Town and Country.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed in order to acquire, carry on, and extend the old-established business of Samuel Salter & Co., Woollen Cloth Manufacturers, of the Home and Duke Street Mill, Trowbridge, in the County of Wilts.

The property, which is freehold, covers about two acres.

The principal members of the staff, viz., Messrs. J. Walker, Gore, Randall, and Bannister, who have long been associated with the business, will become Directors of the Company.

The Chairman of the Company is well known as a practical Manufacturer, and has by his perseverance and industry become the largest individual employer of labour in the County of Wilts, and as he takes the whole of the Ordinary Shares, except those taken by the other Subscribers to the Memorandum of Association, this in itself is the strongest guarantee that the business of the Company will be well looked after by him and also by the other Directors, who are all old and capable servants of the firm of Samuel Salter & Co., and who will retain a considerable stake in the Company.

The price fixed by the Vendor is £100,000 for the purchase of the Freehold Mills, Machinery, Plant, Fixtures, Stock-in-Trade, Designs, Book Debts, and all other assets, together with the Goodwill of the business, free from liabilities.

The Freehold Mills, Plant, Machinery, &c., have been valued by Mr. V. A. Lawson and Mr. T. H. Daniels, of Stroud, and copies of their valuations will be found in the full prospectus.

The assets (exclusive of goodwill) exceed the amount issued of Debenture Stock and Preference Shares by nearly £50,000.

Messrs. Denning & Co. have examined the books of the firm annually for the past eleven years.

Applications should be sent to the Company's Bankers accompanied by a remittance for the amount payable on application.

Full Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained of the Secretary at the Offices of the Company; of the Company's Bankers (The Wilts and Dorset Banking Company, Limited, and their London Agents, The London and Westminster Bank, Limited), or of the Solicitors to the Company.

Dated December 5th, 1896.

Izard & Izard, below set forth, for the supply of Maypole Soap, at the rate of over eight million tablets per annum, which should yield profits equal to £27,058 per annum, with the prospect in the immediate future of much larger returns. Applications for 50,000 Shares have been received or guaranteed.

THE MAYPOLE COMPANY

LTD. (WHOLE WORLD RIGHTS) as below mentioned.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893.

CAPITAL - - £200,000.

Divided into 50,000 £7 per cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each (Preferential as to Capital and Dividends), and 150,000 Ordinary Shares of £1 each, for both of which Subscriptions are now invited.

The Vendors stipulate for the right to call for an allotment of not less than one-third of the entire issue of each class of Shares, being the largest amount allowed by the rules of the Stock Exchange. The Shares are payable as follows:—2s. 6d. on application; 7s. 6d. on allotment; and the balance, when required, in calls of not more than 5s. at intervals of one month.

It is proposed to pay the interest on the Preference Shares half-yearly.

The Articles of Association provide that no Debentures shall be created without the consent of the majority of the holders of Preference Shares present at a meeting specially convened for the purpose of obtaining such sanction.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed to acquire, work, and extend, both at home and abroad, the successful and valuable business and rights of Maypole Soap, and provide adequate working capital to cope with its marvellous growth.

Maypole Soap may be said to be unique, and is a proved success, it being a greater novelty than the majority of soaps upon the market. It not only washes and thoroughly cleanses the fabric, but also simultaneously and permanently dyes the same almost any desired colour or tint.

The word "Maypole" has been registered as part of the trade mark or applied for in nearly every civilised country, both in respect of soap and other kindred articles, and is daily becoming more valuable, and bids fair to be soon world renowned.

Maypole Soap was practically only put upon the market in January last, the advertising, which has been on a moderate scale, commencing towards the end of that month; the result has been a phenomenal and striking success, the demand largely increasing month by month, showing already upon present sales and contracts (as per Messrs. Izard & Izard's Report) profits at the rate of no less than £27,058 per annum, without allowing for any increased sale, and this would be sufficient to pay dividends on leaving £5,558 as a margin for administration expenses, reserves, &c., &c.

50,000 Cumulative Preference Shares at 7 per cent.	£3,500
150,000 Ordinary Shares at 12 per cent.	£18,000
	£21,500

Messrs. Mellors, Basden, & Co., Chartered Accountants, of St. Swithin's-lane, E.C., in their report state:—

Having examined your Books, for the nine months ending September 30th, 1896, we find that the sales of Maypole Soap in the United Kingdom and the Colonies during that period have been as follows:—

1896.		1896.
January ...	1,122 doz.	April ...	6,072 doz.
February ...	3,312 ,,	May ...	10,953 ,,
March ...	5,893 ,,	June ...	12,483 ,,
1st Quarter	10,327 doz.	2nd Quarter	29,508 doz.

1896.
July	16,783 doz.
August	17,632 ,,
September ...	24,627 ,,
3rd Quarter	59,042 doz.

Mr. Athelstan Dangerfield, Chartered Accountant, 17 and 18, Basinghall-street, London, E.C., in his report states as follows on the American and Foreign Trade:—

The Sole Consignees thereby appointed for their respective countries agree to purchase stipulated quantities of Maypole Soap (in some cases on a progressive scale). The minimum quantities specified in the Contracts already entered into will, when the Contracts are fully operative, amount to 6,990 dozen per week.

The Contracts are for periods of five or ten years, and contain varying conditions as to their prior determination or extension.

With reference to the combined Profits of the Home, Colonial, and Foreign Trade, Messrs. Izard & Izard, of 52, Gracechurch-street, E.C. Trade Accountants and Valuers to the Grocery and Drysaltery Trade, in their report state:—

We find after providing ample margin for advertising, depreciation of patents, reserves, and all working and other expenses, except Directors' fees, and the profits upon—

The Home and Colonial Trade, as per Sept. last ...	6,156 doz. per week.
The American and Foreign Trade (as per Contracts) ...	6,990 doz. per week.
Total	13,146 doz. per week.

should be equal, on the basis of the past advertising expenditure and the terms of the above-mentioned Contracts, to a net profit of £27,058 per annum.

We also find that upwards of 50 per cent. of the present orders are repeat orders, and that the trade is on the increase.

Taking, therefore, the net profits as per the foregoing Certificate at £27,058 per annum (sufficient to pay the Preference Dividend nearly eight times over), and without making allowance for any increase, although the Colonial and Foreign Trade is quite in its infancy, the Directors have every reason to believe that the profits will be amply sufficient to pay the above-mentioned dividends of 7 per cent. on the Preference Shares and 12 per cent. on the Ordinary Shares, while a further large increase in the present rapid growth of the business is anticipated forthwith, owing to the fact that since the above results were obtained, Maypole Soap, which has hitherto only been recommended for dyeing Silk, Satin, and Cotton Goods, &c., is now made to dye Wool, or Mixtures of Cotton and Wool.

Ample provision has been made for a sufficiency of working capital—50,000 Shares being available for this purpose. The Directors propose, on the closing of the lists, immediately to proceed to allotment, applications for 50,000 Shares having been received or guaranteed.

The Vendors are the promoters, there being no intermediate profit, and all the preliminary expenses up to and including Allotment will be paid by them.

The purchase price has been fixed by the Vendors at £150,000, payable in Cash or Shares, Preference or Ordinary, at the option of the Directors, subject to the right of the Vendors to call for one-third of the entire issue of each class of Shares; the Vendors are, however, willing to accept the whole of the purchase consideration in Shares if required.

For Contracts see full Prospectus.

Application will be made to the Committee of the Stock Exchange for a settlement and quotation in the official list.

Applications may be made on the Form below and forwarded to the Bankers or Secretary of the Company, together with a deposit of 2s. 6d. per Share.

The Contract for sale above specified, and copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and the Reports above-mentioned, may be seen at the Offices of the Company.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring the Patent Rights hereinafter particularly referred to, and carrying on the business of wholesale provision merchants and manufacturers of canned and preserved meats, extracts from meats, and such like commodities.

The enormous demand for all such kinds of commodities as are above mentioned is well known, and has been recently proved by the publicity which has been given to the fact that the business of "Bovril" (a comparatively new article) has acquired a value of upwards of £2,000,000,

Without desiring in any way to detract from the value of "Bovril," the Directors are satisfied that they can produce an article which is equal to, and will probably compare favourably with, that well known and justly praised article.

The preparation which the Directors intend to manufacture and sell has been submitted to and tested by several of the largest buyers in the trade, with the result that large orders have been taken and others promised, and it is confidently anticipated that the article in question will command a very large sale. It will be manufactured from English Beef, pure and simple, without any foreign extract, and will consist in fact of the lean portions of the finest cattle slaughtered in England, reduced to a highly concentrated nutritive, stimulative, and digestible form.

The following figures will illustrate the fact that the manufacture and sale of the above-mentioned article will produce gross profit of considerably over 100 per cent., and after allowing for establishment expenses at least 100 per cent. net will be realised. The figures are the result of actual working, and are not in any respect estimates.

Gross Profit				£2	6	2¾

The sale prices above quoted are 20 per cent. lower than those obtained by "Bovril" and "Brand's Essence," and the Directors are confident from the opinions already expressed by large buyers that a large outlet will be found for these and also for other similar commodities, such as concentrated beef tea and glaze, which the Company will supply, and which will produce similarly large profits.

One of the above-mentioned inventions (in respect of which the Company has secured the Patent Rights already obtained in Great Britain, France, and America, and all such other rights in other countries and places as may be hereafter applied for) relates to an improved method of preparing and preserving tinned meats and foods, whereby the contents of the tin are prevented from coming into contact with the tin itself. By means of this invention a great advantage will be obtained over all methods hitherto known, inasmuch as it will be possible to open the tin and expose the contents for a considerable time without deteriorating such contents. Samples have been submitted to several of the largest retail dealers, and all agree that the last-mentioned advantage will alone secure the success of the invention, and the additional advantage which lies in the fact that the purity and freshness of the contents are greatly increased by the proposed method, must (coupled with the approval of the trade buyers already expressed) in a very short time bring about a large sale, and, indeed, the Directors already have considerable orders on hand. The large profits derived by manufacturers from the sale of tinned goods is too well known to need special mention or statistics.

The opinion of Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., on the said Invention has been obtained and is favourable to the validity of the Patent.

The other Inventions which the Company have secured are :—

(1) An improved tin box or case for containing meats and provisions.
(2) Key for opening such tin box or case.

The Directors do not feel justified in stating in this Prospectus the exact nature of the two last-mentioned Inventions, as they have only at present been provisionally protected by the British Patent Office. Samples, however, can be seen by intending Investors.

The Directors have no doubt that these Inventions will prove most profitable; and they are all the more assured on that point, inasmuch as a very large London firm, having an enormous retail sale, has already given an order and has moreover expressed its intention of adopting the Inventions, not only on account of their utility but also on account of their cheapness, when compared with those now on the market.

There will, it is believed, be no difficulty whatever in securing considerable competition for the acquisition of the foreign patent rights in all the aforesaid inventions and the proceeds of such sale ought readily to produce at least as much as the nominal capital of the present Company. But it will probably be found advisable to establish the business well in this Country before offering the foreign rights, so that the question of their value may be placed beyond doubt.

The Inventor of the aforesaid Inventions has been in the trade for over 25 years, and is recognised as one of the first authorities on Canned Provisions and the other articles which the Company proposes to deal with. He is giving up a considerable income and important appointment for the purpose of establishing and managing the Company's business, and shows his confidence in the Company's prospects by accepting for a period of two years an almost nominal consideration for his services.

The Directors will take no remuneration until after the shareholders have received £10 per cent. per annum.

The price to be paid by the Company for all rights in the aforesaid Inventions is £6,100, payable as to £1,100 in cash and £5,000 in fully-paid shares, and the Vendor will bear all the expenses of the Company down to the first allotment of shares.

The agreement for purchase by the Company has not yet been entered into, but it has been prepared and identified by three of the subscribers; and the same, and also the Memorandum and Articles of Association, the opinion of Mr. Fletcher Moulton, and specimens of the various inventions can be seen by intending Investors at the Offices of the Company.

Applications should be made on the accompanying form, which should be sent with the deposit of 2s. 6d. per Share direct to the Secretary.

If the number of Shares allotted be less than that applied for, the surplus will be applied in reduction of the payment on the allotment. Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Solicitors, and at the Offices of the Company.

December, 1896.

This Form to be sent entire, with Cheque for the amount payable on application, to the Secretary, at the Company's Offices, Rooms (368-9-70), 20, Bucklersbury, E.C.

PRELIMINARY ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Northern Territories Goldfields of Australia,

LIMITED.

CAPITAL - £300,000,

Consisting of 300,000 Shares of £1 each.

Of which 225,000 Shares have been issued as fully-paid, as the purchase price of the properties acquired, and 75,000 have been subscribed to provide Working Capital.

The Company has acquired six groups of developed and Working Mines, comprising about 700 acres, situated in the Northern Territory of Australia, together with a large quantity of plant, machinery, and upwards of 30,000 tons of tailings. New and improved machinery is now being despatched to the Mines, and two eminent Engineers have been appointed to the management. One of the Managers has recently arrived in the Territory with a large number of additional miners; and a Medical Officer, Chemist, and Assayer are also being sent out

The Properties were acquired from the Northern Territories' Syndicate, which consisted of a combination of the following Companies :—

The West Australian Goldfields, Limited.
The West Australian Joint Stock Trust and Finance Corporation, Limited.
The London and Continental Investment Corporation of Western Australia, Limited.
The West Australian Share Corporation, Limited.
The Gold Lands Corporation, Limited.
The Universal Corporation, Limited.
The West Australian Loan and General Finance Corporation, Limited.
The Anglo-American Exploration Company of Western Australia, Limited.
The Anglo-Belgian Exploration Company of Western Australia, Limited.
The Anglo-Netherlands Exploration Company of Western Australia, Limited.
The Anglo-Scandinavian Exploration Company of Western Australia, Limited.
The Anglo-Austrian Exploration Company of Western Australia, Limited.
The Colonial Goldfields, Limited.

The combination was the result of extensive investigation into the mineral wealth of the Territory, which was reported by eminent authorities to be of an exceptional character. These reports having been confirmed by its own experts, the Syndicate took up the above-mentioned properties, and subsequently made them over to this Company, not only taking the whole of its purchase price in Shares, but also providing £75,000 as Working Capital.

The Northern Territories Goldfields of Australia, Limited, is a parent Company, and £35,000 Working Capital for each of its first two subsidiary issues has already been guaranteed. Since the transfer of the properties, contracts have been entered into under which a public issue of the Shares will be made by the West Australian Joint Stock Trust and Finance Corporation, Limited, the New Zealand Joint Stock and General Corporation, Limited, and the West Australian Loan and General Finance Corporation, Limited, who have acquired the practical control of the scheme.

Result of crushings of upwards of 10,000 tons will be given.

OFFICIAL AND EXPERT TESTIMONY TO THE WEALTH OF THE NORTHERN TERRITORY AND THE COMPANY'S PROPERTIES.

(Collected from Government Reports and other Official Records, and from Special Reports made to the Northern Territories Syndicate, Limited, and others prior to the formation of the Company).

LORD KINTORE (late Governor of South Australia) says that the existence of rich mines in the Northern Territory has "been common knowledge for some time past," and that "it has been a matter of surprise that no systematic attempt has been made to open up this wealth, the claims taken up having been at best only superficially scratched."

Mr. J. V. PARKES, the Government Inspector of Mines for South Australia, says :—"I feel constrained to say, and I have no hesitation in saying it, that the Northern Territory is phenomenally rich in minerals, but more especially gold and tin, and I feel assured that in the course of time it will become one of the chief producers of these two metals. A careful perusal of the returns I have made of the yield from the various mines will, I am convinced, be a surprise even to those who had previously had a good opinion of the gold-producing capabilities of the country, and when better facilities are afforded to the mining investors for visiting the country, and systematic mining is carried on, and efficient appliances are introduced for treating the ores, I am positive that my expectations will be fully realised. The reefs are all indicative of permanency, and give promise of large yields when systematically worked."

Mr. H. Y. L. BROWN, Government Geologist, in the course of an exhaustive report to the South Australian Government, dated September 24, 1895, says that he visited some of the chief mining centres now at work in the territory, commencing with the Howley group, and comprising Brock's Creek, Woolwonga, Yam Creek, Kohinoor, and most of the properties to be acquired by this Company. Speaking of the Howley group, he says :—"There are four parallel vertical reefs of bluish-coloured quartz, striking north 50 deg. to 60 deg. west. . . . The deepest shaft was said to be 150 ft.; others range from 40 ft. to 90 ft. in depth. . . . So far as I could judge from the inspection of a wilderness of shafts, old alluvial holes and workings which had collapsed, there are two lines of reef, one running north-westward, and the other eastward and westward, and which must unite with or intersect one another." Speaking of the Brock's Creek group, the Government Geologist says :—"This important belt of auriferous reefs is certain to continue downwards to a considerable depth. . . . The veins have been worked for a mile or more along the line, and there is ample room for sinking two or more deep shafts from which mining operations could be prosecuted on a large scale." With reference to the Woolwonga Reefs, Mr. Brown says :—"These comprise a belt of four or five more auriferous veins, striking north 30 deg. west to north-west, through clay slate, mica slate, and sandstone, with plumbageous slate in places. They are in the hands of Chinese, and are worked by numerous shafts and excavations, by means of which they follow down the gold." Referring to the Eureka Mine, one of the Eveleen group, he says :—"The reef is chiefly composed of quartz down to the water level, 80 ft., when it gives place to pyrites, of which there is a considerable width in the main shaft. . . . . The lode strikes north 10 deg. west, dipping 70 deg. to 80 deg. west, and varies in width from that of a drive to a few inches. The walls are smooth, and altogether it has an appearance of permanency."

The Hon. CHARLES DASHWOOD, Government Resident of the Northern Territory, in his Official Report to the South Australian Government for the year 1893, says that, according to reports furnished to him, some of the claims "have during the year produced astonishing results. I refer particularly to the Howley battery, and also to Ahloy's battery" (both included in the Northern Territories Goldfields properties); and in a cable dated November 4, 1895, in answer to special inquiries addressed to him as to the properties to be acquired by the Company, the Government Resident says :—"I consider them most valuable properties, with proper management, Howley now producing large quantities of rich ore. Maclean's (one of the mines of Group 1) yielded £10,000 during the last six months. Battery crushing in first-rate style. . . The lode has been proved to a depth of 200 ft.; average 6 oz. The opinion of all who have visited the mines is that the geological formation is permanent. The gold-bearing vein can be traced for a long distance, richer as depth is attained. There are numerous shafts sunk on the vein, varying in depth from 50 ft. to 200 ft. Tailings valuable."

Mr. TENISON WOODS, late Government Geologist of South Australia, says :—"The quartz lodes for variety and extent have few parallels in any country. It would take too long to specify the number of reefs which crop out on every side in this extraordinary mineral country. One can hardly speak too highly of it. Some day these deposits must yield up their treasures!"

Mr. W. J. STRETTON, Chief Warden for the Northern Territory, in his Official Report dated January 29, 1895, says :—"No doubt fairly rich lodes will continue to be discovered, and even above water level there are immense quantities of good stone to be crushed from the reefs"; and, after giving instances of various rich crushings, the Chief Warden proceeds : "While such results as quoted are being obtained it is not surprising that deeper and more expensive mining is not proceeded with."

In a special report upon the first group of properties, Mr. STRETTON says :—"A week ago I found that a new lode had been opened to the rise of the rich lode found in the main shaft, and at 50 ft. depth was yielding returns from 4 oz. to 5 oz. per ton. The lode in main shaft at the depth of 150 ft. recorded a crushing of over 6 oz. to the ton, showing that it is materially improving with depth. There is ample water power available for battery purposes, and the steam power on the property is sufficient to work 30 heads of stamps. . . . The reef has been traced for several miles, and I consider this district, and especially this property, one of the most valuable in the country."

Captain DANIELS, Mining Engineer, who has been resident in the Northern Territory for twenty-five years, and has during the whole of that period been actively engaged in mining, in reporting upon the first group, says :—"I am acquainted with the whole history of these mines, and it has been a matter of notoriety throughout the territory that for years past very rich stone has been raised which has yielded returns of 2 oz. to 7 oz. per ton, and, with modern machinery, would have yielded greatly-increased returns. . . . . All the mines in this district, now that labour is cheap, with the introduction of capital, would yield handsome returns. . . . I went down the main shafts from which stone was being raised, and carefully examined the reefs, which contained bold and well-defined lodes. . . . The permanency of the gold-bearing formation has been proved over an area sufficient to keep a large mill fully employed for many years to come. . . . I know of no mines which at this depth have yielded so much gold with only a 10-stamp mill. . . . Every one here knows the richness of these mines."

Mr. WALTER GRIFFITHS (mining engineer and Member of Parliament for the Northern Territory), reporting upon the first group says :—"This property has long been recognised as a most valuable one, the greatest depth obtained in one shaft being 180 ft., and here the lode at the bottom is proved to be the richest in the field."

Mr. ROBERT PETTIGREW (one of the oldest mining engineers and assayers in Australia) says :—"From the samples taken from your mine, they appear to resemble the formation of Hannan's. I have also examined the returns from the assays of concentrates. . . . . It is apparent that you are losing more than 50 per cent. by your present plan and treatment. . . . . I fail to see why your property should not yield enormous profits."

A full Prospectus will be published on Thursday. In the meantime any further information may be obtained from Mr. Percy J. Hays, Secretary of the West Australian Joint Stock Trust and Finance Corporation, Limited, and the New Zealand Joint Stock and General Corporation, Limited, Finsbury House, Blomfield-street, London, E.C.

THE APPLICATION LISTS WILL CLOSE ON WEDNESDAY, THE 9th DECEMBER, 1896, FOR TOWN AND THE FOLLOWING MORNING FOR THE COUNTRY.

Before issuing the Prospectus the Directors, for their own satisfaction, decided to obtain an absolutely independent report upon the properties proposed to be acquired, and instructed Messrs. John Hart Bridges & Son, of Hart-street, Bloomsbury, W.C., to this effect. Their Certificate accompanies the Prospectus.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to purchase as going concerns and amalgamate the Freehold Breweries, known as Bucknall's Brewery, Kidderminster, Worcestershire (established in 1807), and the Delph Brewery, Brierley Hill, Staffordshire (established in 1876). And the Company will acquire the licensed houses now held with the breweries, as well as the Unicorn Hotel, Worcester, and other valuable licensed houses, making a total number of 126 licensed houses, of which 87 are freehold, three copyhold, 24 leasehold, and twelve annual tenancies, or tied by loan. Further, the Company will acquire the Malting attached to Bucknall's Brewery, the Lion Maltings, Kidderminster, all freehold, and Hodges' Maltings, Kidderminster (part freehold and part leasehold), with the benefit of the businesses attaching thereto. In addition, the Company will acquire the premises (part freehold and part leasehold), of Messrs. F. R. and T. C. Dalley, of Bewdley, Worcestershire, and the wine, spirit, and bottled beer businesses of that firm, and of Messrs. J. W. Hickling & Co., of Kidderminster. Besides the properties already mentioned, 18 shops, 100 cottages, 12 villas, and about 40 acres of freehold land will be included in the purchase.

The two Breweries are situate about 9½ miles apart, and very conveniently placed for the purposes of amalgamation, Bucknall's Brewery being situated in the centre of the town of Kidderminster, and the Delph Brewery in the thickly populated district of Brierley Hill. The Breweries will thus be able to supply the licensed houses acquired by the Company on most profitable terms, as well as to do a large trade with the general district surrounding.

Attached to Bucknall's Brewery is a mineral water plant, and both Breweries are fully equipped and provided with drays, waggons, horses, casks, and other necessaries for the business. Besides the trade of beers in Cask, the Company will have the benefit of a large trade in wines, spirits, mineral waters, and bottled beers, and the businesses of Messrs. Hickling and Messrs. Dalley (both of which are well known in the neighbourhood) have been secured with this view.

The several properties to be acquired (including fixtures, plant, and rolling stock) have been valued by experienced firms of valuers, as under:—

Messrs. Bromley, Son, & Kelday, of 21, Finsbury-pavement, London (Vendors' Report), at ...	£440,785
Messrs. Henshaw, Beard, & Watts, of 23, Hart-street, Bloomsbury, London, at ...	£443,654
Messrs. John Hart Bridges & Son, of 20, Hart-street, Bloomsbury, London (Directors' Report), at ...	£427,780

Copies of these valuations (without the full schedules) are enclosed with Prospectus.

The purchase price payable by the Company has been fixed at £440,000, in addition to which the Company will pay for the stocks, stores, and book debts at a valuation in the usual way. After providing the purchase price a cash surplus will remain, which, with the stock, book debts, &c., will provide the Company with a total working capital of upwards of £45,000.

The £230,000 First Mortgage Debenture Stock is consequently more than doubly secured on the lowest of the above valuations, being that of Messrs. John Hart Bridges & Son, at ... £427,780

To which sum must be added:—

The cash surplus above referred to, which, with the stock, book debts, &c., provides the Company with a working capital of upwards of ... 45,000

Making a total value of ... £472,780

As security for the £230,000 First Mortgage Debenture Stock.

The Certificate of Messrs. John Hart Bridges & Son as to value (extracted from their Report) is in the following terms:—

"The whole of the properties are situate within easy distances of the Breweries for delivery by road, and form an excellent combination for further development and increased trade, and we value the same, together with the plants, rolling stock, easks, fixtures, and other effects, as per inventories, at the sum of four hundred and twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and eighty pounds.

JOHN HART BRIDGES & SONS."

Messrs. Bromley, Son, & Kelday report on the profits to result, based on the last three years' trading, and including rentals of property, as ...	£32,400
And their Report is confirmed by Messrs. Henshaw, Beard, & Watts.
Messrs. John Hart Bridges & Sons furnish the profits from the amalgamated businesses, including rentals, as amounting to ...	£20,930
The interest on £230,000 Four-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Debenture Stock is ...	9,775
The Dividend on £130,000 Five-and-a-Half per Cent. Preference Shares requires ...	7,150
Together ...	£16,925

There is, accordingly, on the lowest computation a surplus of £14,000 a year to provide dividend on £130,000 Ordinary Shares, Reserve Fund, Directors' fees, &c.

The Vendors (who promote the Company, and have acquired the properties to re-sell at a profit) pay the whole of the expenses of the formation and registration of the Company (including the issue of the Prospectus and brokerage) up to the first allotment of Shares, except Stamp Duties and the legal charges of securing the Debenture Stock, which will be paid by the Company.

Until final completion of the purchase of the several properties, the proceeds of the issue of the Debenture Stock will remain under the control of the Trustees for the Debenture Stockholders, to be drawn upon by the Company in proportionate parts, as and when properties are conveyed, and the Company reserves to itself the right not to take over any particular property included in the purchase, should the title thereto not be satisfactory, deducting the like proportionate value thereof.

A Contract for purchase has been entered into, being an agreement dated the 1st day of December, 1896, between Edward Stopford Claremont (who represents the Vendors) of the one part, and H. Broadbridge, as a Trustee on behalf of the Company, of the other part.

During the negotiations for the purchase of the properties and the formation of the Company, contracts have been entered into between various parties, with reference to the formation and promotion of the Company and the subscription of its capital, but to none of which the Company is a party. The businesses agreed to be purchased, or some of them, will be taken over subject to all existing contracts, which are of the ordinary trade character. The contracts referred to in this paragraph are or may be contracts within the meaning of the 38th Section of the Companies Act, 1867; and, accordingly, applicants for Shares are to be deemed to have notice of the said contracts and to have agreed with the Company (as Trustee for the Directors and other persons liable) to waive all claims, if any, against them for not more fully complying with the requirements of the said Section, and allotments will only be made upon this express condition.

Copy of the above-mentioned Contract and print of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, together with the original Reports of Messrs. Bromley, Son, and Kelday, Messrs. Henshaw, Beard, and Watts, and Messrs. John Hart Bridges and Son, and a draft of the Debenture Stock Trust Deed can be inspected at the London Office of the Company by applicants for Debenture Stock and Shares until allotment.

Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full. If the amount allotted is less than that applied for the balance of the deposit will be applied towards payment of the amount due on allotment. Failure to pay any instalment will render the previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Application will in due course be made for a settlement in and quotation for the Debenture Stock, Preference and Ordinary Shares on the London Stock Exchange.

Applications must be made on the following forms, or the forms enclosed with the prospectus, and sent with the deposit to the bankers.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained at the offices of the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and at the offices of the Company.

This Form may be cut out, filled up, and sent with the deposit of £1 per Share (or 10 per cent. per Debenture), being the amount payable on application to Lloyds Bank, Limited, 72, Lombard-street, London, E.C., Kidderminster, or any other Branch; or to Messrs. Brown, Janson, & Co., 32, Abchurch-lane, London, E.C.

PROSPECTUS.

THIS Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the well-known Brewery and Wine and Spirit businesses of Messrs. Bramwell and Company (established for upwards of 100 years), of the Church-street Bond Vaults, and the Wear Brewery and Maltings, Sunderland, and of the old-established firm of William Story and Company, of the Moor-street Brewery, and Hendon-road Maltings, Sunderland, and the business for many years carried on by Richard Murray, Wine, Spirit, and Ale Merchant and Aërated Water Manufacturer, of Consett, and the businesses of J. H. Graham, Wine, Ale, and Spirit Merchant, Middlesbro'; P. B. Junor, Brewer and Spirit Merchant, Tudhoe Grange, Spennymoor; and Thomas Elwen & Son, Ale and Porter Merchants and Aërated Water Manufacturers, Frederick-street, Sunderland, together with the three Breweries, Maltings, and Licensed houses, of which 139 are freehold, copyhold, and long leasehold, and 43 are short leaseholds, tenancies, and tied houses, together with various business and private premises and places of entertainment of the whole of which Mr. Richard Murray is the present proprietor. It is intended to continue the businesses subject to certain improvements, having for their object economy of management, under the same organisation and staff as at present.

The Company acquires as from December 1, 1896, the whole of the assets (except book debts) of the respective businesses of Bramwell & Company, Wear Brewery, William Story & Company, Richard Murray, J. H. Graham, P. B. Junor, and Thomas Elwen & Son, including the properties mentioned in the report of Mr. J. G. Smith, set out below, free from all encumbrances and trade liabilities.

The properties have been valued by the well-known north country brewery and licensed house auctioneer and valuer, Mr. J. G. Smith, of Gateshead, who reports as follows:—

"3, West-street, Gateshead, December 1, 1896.

To the Directors of the North-Eastern Breweries, Limited.

GENTLEMEN,—

I have surveyed:—

I.—The Church-street bond vaults, offices and houses, Sunderland, three breweries and maltings situated at Sunderland and Spennymoor, the aerated water manufactories situated at Sunderland and Consett. Three theatres at Jarrow, Spennymoor, and Consett; masonic hall and cattle mart at Consett; 139 licensed freehold, copyhold, and long leasehold properties, together with numerous houses and shops in connection therewith owned by the above Company, and 43 licensed properties tied or leased to them as tenants, all situated in the counties of Northumberland, Durham, and Yorkshire.

II.—The rolling stock, horses, carts, working plant, stocks, loans to customers, unexpired term of Excise licenses, furniture, &c., and cash less deposits by tenants, and in my opinion the following are fair and reliable market values:—

I.—Freehold, leasehold, and copyhold properties	£585,386
II.—Rolling stock, &c.	65,000
(Six hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and eighty-six pounds)	£650,386

I am, Gentlemen,
Yours faithfully,
(Signed) J. G. SMITH."

The Mortgage Debenture Stock will be secured by a specific First Mortgage on the above-mentioned freehold, copyhold, and leasehold properties, and also by a floating charge on the business, undertaking, and general assets of the Company. The £100,000, balance of the £400,000 Debenture Stock, will be only issued if, and when, required to buy additional licensed property and other concerns engaged in similar trade (to be vested in the Trustees for the Debenture Stock holders by way of additional security), or for the improvement of the Company's property.

The Wear Brewery, Maltings, Cellars, and Stabling cover 2½ acres of valuable ground, a portion being the site of the old Sunderland Waterworks. The water from the old well is used for engine, cooling, and other purposes, and a well which has been sunk 65 feet below the old well and which is considered to have an inexhaustible supply of water, is used for brewing purposes, thus effecting a large saving by not having to obtain the necessary supply from the Water Company's mains.

The Manorial rents, fines and heriots being nominal, the Copyholds may be considered to be practically equivalent to Freeholds.

The books of the respective firms of Bramwell and Co., the Wear Brewery Company, W. Story and Co., R. Murray, and T. Elwen and Son have been examined by Messrs. Rawlings and Wilkinson and Mr. Joseph M. Nicholson who report as follows:—

"To the Directors of the North-Eastern Breweries, Limited.

"We have examined the Books and Accounts of the respective businesses carried on by Mr. Richard Murray, under the several names of Bramwell & Co., The Wear Brewery Co., Sunderland, and Richard Murray, Benfieldside, Co. Durham, for the two years ending 31st August, 1896, and under the name Wm. Story & Co., Sunderland, for the 10 months ending 31st August, 1896; and also of the business of Messrs. T. Elwen & Son, Sunderland, for the two years ending 31st January, 1896, and certify that the combined Profits for the above periods have been £62,275 6s. 6d., averaging £31,543 3s. per annum without charging Interest on borrowed or other Capital and Income Tax, but after providing for Depreciation, Repairs and Bad and Doubtful Debts, and also that they have during such period been of a progressive character. The books of Mr. J. H. Graham's Middlesbro' business have been examined by Messrs. Monkhouse, Goddard, and Co., who report as follows:—

"St. Nicholas Chambers, Newcastle-on-Tyne, 29th October, 1896.

Messrs. J. H. GRAHAM and RICHARD MURRAY, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

DEAR SIRS,—

We have examined the books and accounts of Mr. J. G. Graham, so far as they relate to the 'Grand Hotel' and the 'Eagle,' 'Alexandra,' 'Volunteer,' 'Palmerston,' 'Queen's,' and 'Captain Cooke' Public-houses, all situated at Middlesbro', and certify that the combined profits for the last completed year of trading amounted to £10,238 11s. 3d. The periods covered by our examination were, in the case of the 'Grand Hotel,' the twelve months ending 30th June last, and in the case of the public-houses the twelve months ending 17th July last.

No sum has been charged against profits for head-office management or for depreciation of furniture, fittings, &c.—We are yours faithfully,
(Signed) MONKHOUSE, GODDARD, and Co.,
Chartered Accountants."

In addition to the businesses dealt with in the Accountants' certificates as given above, there are various licensed properties (including those of Mr. P. B. Junor), recently acquired by the Vendor, included in the above valuation of £585,386, but the results of which are not included in the Accountants' certificates. The Directors estimate these will realise a further profit of about £7,500.

The total profits of the entire business will thus amount to about £49,300.

Certified Profits as above, £31,543 3s. 0d. and £10,238 11s. 3d. ...			£41,781 14 3

The proceeds of the present issue of Debenture Stock are to be applied in part payment of the purchase money to the vendor (who will vest the undertaking and the various properties in the Company free from incumbrances).

As the Company takes over the business as a going concern, as from December 1, 1896, with the stock of Hops, Barley, Malt, Wines, Spirits, Beer, Aërated Waters, Plant, Fixtures, Machinery, Horses, Carts, Casks, Rolling-stock, &c., and as the property and business are purchased free from all liabilities, no further working capital is now required to maintain the business in its present position.

The properties are being acquired from Richard Murray, the vendor to the Company, the amount payable to whom by the Company has been fixed at £700,000, payable as to £200,050 in cash, £100,000 in Debenture Stock, £150,000 in fully-paid Preference Shares, and £249,950 in fully-paid Ordinary Shares. This purchase price includes the three Breweries, three Maltings, two Aërated Water Manufactories, Plant, Casks, Hotels, Public Houses, Beer Houses, Fixtures, Furniture, Rolling-stock, Horses, Stock-in-trade, Loans to customers, and the goodwill of the respective businesses.

Mr. Richard Murray will join the Board as Chairman after allotment, and act as Managing Director.

No promotion money has been or will be paid. The Vendor will receive the premium on this issue of the Debenture Stock, and will pay all expenses of the formation of the Company and the issue of its capital up to allotment and also the expense of transferring the property and assets to the Company.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and the Draft Trust Deed and Form of Debenture Stock Certificate can be seen by intending applicants at the offices of the Solicitors to the Company and the Trustees and at the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, Bishopsgate-street, E.C., and the original Reports of the Valuer and Accountants can be seen at the office of the Solicitors to the Trustees.

Applications for the Debenture Stock with the deposit of £10 per cent. are to be made to the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, on the Forms accompanying the Prospectus.

In cases where no allotment is made the deposits will be returned in full, and when the amount allotted is less than that subscribed for, the balance of the deposit will be applied towards the payment due on allotment. Failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

It is intended to apply for a Stock Exchange quotation for the Debenture Stock in due course.

Prospectuses, together with Forms of Application, can be obtained from the Bankers to the Company in London, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sunderland and Branches, also from the Solicitors, Brokers, Auditors, and at the offices of the Company.

SUNDERLAND, 7th December, 1896.

No part of this Issue has been underwritten or guaranteed in any way, and the Vendors have stipulated for the Allotment to themselves of the largest number of Shares, in payment of the purchase-money, permissible under the rules of the Stock Exchange.

The Lists are now open, and will close for London on or before Wednesday, the 9th day of December, 1896, and for the Country and Abroad on the following day.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

1. This Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring and working on an extended scale the well-known and remarkably rich Copper Mines belonging to The Mountain Mines, Limited, situated at Iron Mountain, Shasta County, in the State of California, the Smelting Works connected therewith, and other extensive property, as well as the entire interest in the Railway to the Mines; and also the Refining Works in the neighbourhood of New York, owned by the New Jersey Metal Refining Works, Limited.

2. The Mines at Iron Mountain were acquired, as from 1st February, 1895, by The Mountain Mines, Limited, who have since expended very large sums in constructing the railway, and otherwise equipping the property, and in opening up the mines in a systematic manner, thereby proving the existence of an immense mass of ore unusually rich in copper, and containing gold and silver in paying quantities. Meanwhile, in order to justify the large expenditure they were incurring, The Mountain Mines, Limited, obtained the services of Mr. James D. Hague, of New York, to give his opinion upon the mines. Mr. Hague is well known as one of the most experienced, reliable, and cautious of authorities on mines of this description, and his report, which has since been put into writing at the request of The Mountain Mines, Limited, is published with this Prospectus, and shows what a high value he places on the property.

3. The property has also been personally visited twice, the last time during this summer, by Mr. C. W. Fielding and Mr. H. J. Wenham, both of whom are joining the Board of the new Company, and who on each occasion remained on the spot for a considerable time, and subjected every detail to close examination. Mr. Fielding, who for many years held a responsible position in the Rio Tinto Company, Limited, has furnished the Board with a careful report, a copy of which accompanies this Prospectus, as also do extracts from a letter of the well-known copper authority, Professor Douglas, of New York.

4. Mr. Hague, in his report, speaking of the ore body that had been laid open by drifts and cross-cuts at the time of his visit, says: "It has been developed with unusual thoroughness, and its actual dimensions are known beyond doubt by the measurements of drifts and cross-cuts shown on the maps submitted. . . . The quantity of ore contained in this body of sulphide is estimated by Mr. Hill at little less than 1,500,000 (1,338,183) tons, and, in my opinion, this estimate is safe and trustworthy. . . . I think it reasonably certain that the larger portion, probably three-fourths, of the ore now developed contains on an average more than 7½ per cent. of copper, and that the remainder carries from 2 two 4 per cent. copper. . . . The assays indicate an average content of 3 ozs. of silver, and about 65 cents worth of gold, say, together, $2.50 per ton of ore. . . . The Mine is unquestionably one of great value, unusually well developed; already assured as a source of ore supply, well equipped for operation, fully justifying the requisite outlays for an adequate smelting plant, and promising large profits for a long time to come." The plant here referred to has since been erected and is in active operation.

Mr. Fielding, in his report, shows that 84 per cent. of the samples taken from the 1,338,183 tons of ore already in sight, or 1,100,000 tons, average, 8¾ per cent. of copper. Also, that the production of electrolytically pure copper, after allowing for losses in smelting and expenses of every kind, is now costing the Company £2 19s. 9d. per ton of ore, or £34 3s. 4d. per ton of copper, and that it is estimated that this cost can be reduced by about 15s. per ton of ore, or £8 12s. 0d. per ton of copper, when the Company has its own Bessemer and Electrolytic Plant.

The market price of this Electrolytic, or high conductivity, Copper, is now about £53 per ton, being from £4 to £5 above that of the Chili Bar, or G.M.B. Copper, which serves as the usual basis of transactions and public quotations. The net profit, at the present cost of production is therefore £18 16s. 8d. on each ton of Copper that the Company produces. An annual output of only 150,000 tons of 8¾ per cent. ore (500 tons per working day) should yield 13,000 tons of Copper, which at the above rate of profit and adding £75,000 as the value of the precious metals, should give a net profit of about £320,000 per annum, or over 25 per cent. on the whole of the Company's capital, while the total profit on the richer portion alone of the Mines thus far developed would, at the above rate, exceed £2,400,000 sterling, or about double the entire capital of the Company.

The Directors feel confident, therefore, that large Dividends will be earned immediately, and, if reasonable expectations are fulfilled, that they will be steadily maintained for many years to come.

In the above estimate of Profits no account has been taken of—

a. The body of poorer Ore. This is similar, in character and per centage of Copper, to that of the principal Spanish copper mines, whose Ores contain less than 3 per cent., and are yet worked at handsome profits.

b. The ore body, lying under the present lowest level of about 150 ft., which has as yet not been touched.

c. The large undeveloped portion of the property. At present only some 800 ft. in length, under one end of the Outcrop, have been opened up, whereas for nearly a mile and a half the general trend of the Outcrop shows strong indications of containing other similar deposits. In fact, at the other extreme end of the property the same Copper ore has already been found.

d. The "Gossan," covering the copper deposits, to the extent, it is believed, of some millions of tons. It will be seen from the accompanying reports that this "Gossan" is likely to become an important source of future profit.

e. The Company's various other interests and claims, including lands of an aggregate area of about five square miles, and numerous Quartz mine claims. Most of these claims are, for legal reasons, vested in an American corporation, the Iron Mountain Investment Company, all the Shares in which are owned by The Mountain Mines, Limited.

f. The reduced cost of production when the Company has its own Bessemer and Electrolytic Plant.

g. The profit which it is expected to make on treating as fluxes the gold-bearing quartz existing in the district.

5. Owing to the peculiarly favourable position of the Mines, high up in hilly country, no sinking, pumping or expensive timbering of any sort are required; quite unusual facilities therefore exist for the cheap production of Copper and successful competition with other Mines.

6. A most substantial Railway, connecting at Keswick with the Main Line of the Southern Pacific Railway to San Francisco, distant about 250 miles, has been constructed and equipped for bringing down the ores to Keswick, where an extensive series of Roasting Kilns, two large Blast Furnaces, and a number of Buildings and Residences, with steam, water and electric power, have already been erected. All these are now in full and successful operation, and important extensions are in course of being carried out. After the Ores have been converted into Matte at Keswick, they are forwarded to the before-mentioned refining Works at Elizabeth, New Jersey, in the neighbourhood of New York, for the finishing processes and to be treated for extraction of the precious metals. All the Copper thus far produced has been first-rate in quality, and has been readily sold in the New York market, where there is likely to be a ready sale for all the Company may produce. For legal reasons the actual Railway is vested in an American Corporation, the Iron Mountain Railway Company, all the shares in which are owned by The Mountain Mines, Limited.

7. The mines have been most ably opened up by Mr. Alexander Hill, the Engineer and Resident Manager of the Company, who has had great mining and engineering experience in various parts of the world, and has displayed conspicuous energy and ability in the business generally.

8. In view of the present depleted condition of the copper stocks of the world, the remarkable increase of consumption that has taken place in Europe, and is now likely to take place in the United States of America, and elsewhere, in connection with the development of electric power, and of the belief that most of the large copper-producing mines are already working to their full capacity, a scarcity of copper and correspondingly high prices are extremely probable.

9. The respective Vendors are The Mountain Mines, Limited, and the New Jersey Metal Refining Works, Limited, and all the Directors of this Company are either Directors of or interested in one or other of the Vendor Companies. The Mountain Mines, Limited, was privately subscribed in order to acquire the Mines, open up, prove and fully equip them as regards transport and treatment of the products, and to bring them to the point of assured success. This, which in such cases is usually left for the purchasing Company to do, has, it is considered, now been done, and the Company will take over a well-equipped going concern.

12. The purchase price has been fixed by the Vendors at £1,150,000, payable as to £416,630 in fully-paid Shares, and as to £733,370 in cash or in fully-paid Shares, at the option of the Company, leaving a balance of £100,000 out of the proceeds of the issue, for working capital. For the above price the respective Vendors undertake to hand over, as on the 31st December, 1896, their entire interest in the above-mentioned Mines and Smelting Works, including Land, Buildings, fixed and loose Plant and Machinery thereon; also all other Lands and Mining, Water, Timber, or other rights to which the Mountain Mines, Limited, are entitled in California; also all the interest of the Mountain Mines, Limited, in the above-mentioned Iron Mountain Railway Company and Iron Mountain Investment Company; also the Refining Works at Elizabeth, New Jersey, including about thirty-five acres of Freehold Land, with an excellent Water Frontage, Buildings, Furnaces, fixed and loose Plant and Machinery thereon.

14. Applications for Shares should be made on the accompanying Form, and forwarded to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, 62, Lombard-street, London, E.C., or to their Head Office in Edinburgh, or any of their branches in Scotland. If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and where the number of Shares allotted is less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant. Failure to pay any instalment when due will render the previous payments liable to forfeiture.

15. The Memorandum and Articles of Association, and copies of the Contracts, can be seen at the Office of the Company's Solicitors. Prospectuses may be had at the Offices of the Company, and of their Bankers and Brokers.

PROSPECTUS.

The Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing and carrying on the well-known and highly successful Evening Newspaper, the "Evening News."

The "Evening News" was first published in the year 1881, and a large sum of money, exceeding (it is believed) £180,000, was expended by the original and subsequent owners in the establishment of it.

In the year 1894 Mr. Alfred Harmsworth with others purchased the "Evening News" from the then proprietors; at the time of purchase the Paper had acquired a large circulation, and by the energy displayed in the management since, it has become the most largely circulated of any Evening Newspaper, and one of the most successful Newspapers, published in the United Kingdom.

The net sales of the paper, after deducting returns, for the first year of the Vendors' ownership, was 40,532,000, for the second year it was 51,358,000 copies, and the sales for the months of September, October, and November, the first months of the third year, show an increase of 327,125 copies over the corresponding period of last year.

The Company will acquire the leasehold premises in Whitefriars Street, the goodwill of the Newspaper, the complete and extensive printing plant employed in the production of it (a plant which is claimed to be the most modern and complete of its character in the United Kingdom), and the stock and book debts of the Vendor Company as on the 1st September, 1896.

The business will be taken over as a going concern as from the 1st September, 1896, the Company paying interest at 5 per cent. per annum upon the purchase money from that date until the completion of the purchase. The purchase will include the stock of paper, book debts, and other commercial assets at 1st September last. It is considered that a sufficient working capital will thereby be provided, but, in view of the increasing circulation, a sum of £10,000 will be provided out of this issue for meeting the requirements of the further extension of the business.

The Newspaper will be conducted under the present management, which has proved so successful.

It is universally known that an established Daily Newspaper with a large and increasing circulation constitutes one of the safest and most lucrative investments in the commercial world.

The books of the Vendor Company have been audited from the commencement of its operations, namely, the 1st day of September, 1894, by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co., and they have given the following certificate:—

4, Lothbury, London. E.C.,
10th November, 1896.

To the Directors of the "Evening News," Limited.

We have acted as Auditors of the "Evening News" for some time past, and have regularly prepared the Balance Sheets and Profit and Loss Accounts, and we beg to certify that, during the two years' ownersbip of the Paper by you the profits have been as under:—

For the year ending 31st August, 1895 ... £14,018 0 0

These profits are arrived at after providing for depreciation of Plant and Machinery, but before charging Interest, Income Tax, or Directors' Fees.

The net sales of the Paper, after deducting returns, were 40,532,000 copies in the first year, and 51,358,000 copies in the second year.

Deliotte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co.,
Chartered Accountants.

The above figures show that the profits have amounted during the last financial year to £25,357, thus being more than four times the amount required to pay the Preference Dividend.

The Preference Shares now offered for subscription are Cumulative as to Dividend and Preferential as to Capital, and it is provided by the Articles of Association that no Debentures or Debenture Stock can be created without the consent of a three-fourths majority of the holders present in person or by proxy at a meeting specially summoned. The Preference Shares will therefore practically be a first charge upon one of the most successful and progressive Newspaper businesses in the United Kingdom.

The holders of Preference Shares will not be entitled to vote at General Meetings of the Company unless the Preference Dividend shall not have been paid, or unless a matter directly affecting their interest as against any other class of Shareholders or in respect of any proposed Debenture issue be under discussion.

Mr. Kennedy Jones will continue to act as Editor and Managing Director for eight years from the incorporation of the Company without remuneration, he being satisfied with the profit anticipated to be received by him as a large holder of Ordinary Shares. The other Directors have also agreed to act without remuneration.

The purchase price has been fixed by the present Owners of the business who are the only promoters, at £240,000, of which £115,000 will be paid in cash, and the balance by the allotment of the whole of the Ordinary Shares credited as fully paid up.

The following Contracts have been entered into, dated 8th December, 1896:—(1.) Between The "Evening News," Limited (the old Company) and Harold S. Harmsworth, its Liquidator, of the one part, and The "Evening News," Limited, of the other part. (2.) Between Kennedy Jones of the one part and The "Evening News," Limited, of the other part. The Company acquires the benefit of the existing Contracts entered into by the Vendor Company in the ordinary course of its business, which are too numerous to specify. Subscribers will therefore be deemed to waive the insertion of the dates and names of parties to such Contracts and any further compliance with Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, than herein appearing, and applications for Shares will only be entertained on that footing.

The Vendor Company (which is the only Promoter) will pay all expenses relating to the formation of the Company up to the allotment of Preference Shares; and accordingly has entered into arrangements or contracts with various persons, and the waiver mentioned in the last clause must be deemed to apply to such arrangements and contracts.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, the above-mentioned Contract, and the Auditors' Certificate, may be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors of the Company.

Application will in due course be made to the Committee of the Stock Exchange to grant a settlement and quotation.

Applications for Shares should be made on the following Form, or the Form accompanying the Prospectus, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application. Cheques should be made payable to Messrs. Coutts & Co. If the number of Shares allotted be less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited towards the amount payable on allotment. When no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full. A separate cheque must accompany each application.

Prospectuses and forms of application may be obtained from the Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers, and at the Offices of the Company.

Dated 8th December, 1896.

This Form may be cut out and sent entire, with remittance, to the Company's Bankers, Coutts & Co., 59, Strand, London, W.C. Separate Cheques must accompany each application.

A L.N.W. RAILWAY GUARD AND

DR. TIBBLES' VI-Cocoa

Mr. SAMUEL REEVES, L.N.W. Railway Guard, Stafford Station, writes (November 15th, 1896):—

"For the last few years I have not been able to take any breakfast first thing in the morning, so I commenced taking a basin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa before going out on a journey. I had not done so many mornings before I wanted something to eat with it, and now I want my couple of rashers of good fat bacon every morning when I am out early. I am a L. and N.W. Railway passenger guard, and exposed to cold a great deal. I can honestly recommend it to anyone, especially my fellow railway men, as a grand thing to take." Not only the working man, but the tired student, the exhausted professional man, the teacher, are revived, restored, and strengthened by Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, mainly through the action of that beneficent ingredient, Kola, which brightens the eye and stores up reserve power in the nervous system.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is made up in 6d. packets, and 9d. and 1s. 6d. tins. It can be obtained of all chemists, grocers, and stores, or from Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, Limited, Suffolk House, Cannon Street, London, E.C.

As an unparalleled test of merit, a dainty sample tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa will be sent free on application to any address, if, when writing (a post-card will do), the reader will name Truth.

NURSES OF ENGLAND AND

DR. TIBBLES' VI-Cocoa

Nurse PERE, 2, Hawley-street, Chalk Farm-road, N.W.: "Thank you for Vi-Cocoa. I like it very much, and will recommend it to all my patients. Our doctor here and my cousin, who is a public analyst, say it is very good."

Nurse COLLINGWOOD, 14, Airlie-gardens, Kensington, W.: "I have taken Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa each morning, and I am pleased to say I feel much better for it. I think it is all that you represent it to be, and will certainly recommend it to all I can."

Nurse RAYMOND, 33, Dalton-street, Hulme, Manchester: "I have tested Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and may say that I have never tasted anything to equal it. I shall have much pleasure in recommending it to any patients that I nurse."

Nurse STANFORD, Southcroft, Heavitree-road, Exeter: "I like Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa very much. I think it possesses good nourishing and stimulating qualities. I have recommended it to my patients and friends."

Nurse FAIRMAN, 1, Hanley-terrace, Savile Town, Dewsbury, Yorks.: "I have taken nightly a cupful of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa whilst on night duty with a severe typhoid case, and have found it most strengthening and refreshing. As this beverage resembles chocolate, it is more palatable than other preparations. I consider it an ideal drink for nursing mothers."

ALL MEN AND WOMEN who have to be exposed to the bleak uncertainty of our trying climate should fortify themselves before they face their daily toil with Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and they can then brave the fury of the elements with equanimity. The writer speaks from personal experience, and from observation of beneficial effects on others. Tea opens the pores and temporarily excites, coffee stimulates the action of the heart, whilst Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives strength, stamina, and builds up and strengthens the lung tissues. It is indeed a wonderful food beverage. Nothing has ever been discovered that can approach it in giving lightness of heart, joy of life, fleetness of foot, and that general feeling of comfort which only comes from a full capacity to enjoy every pleasure, moral, intellectual and physical.

DRUGS WON'T DO.

Free Trial of Something that Will Do.

DR. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA, prepared from Kola, Cocoa, Malt, and Hops, has the refreshing properties of fine teas, the nourishment of the best cocoas, and a tonic and recuperative force possessed by neither. Not a medicine, but a wonderful food beverage. Sold everywhere 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d.; or on mentioning this paper (a post-card will do) a dainty sample tin will be sent post free.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
"TRUTH" TOY AND DOLL SHOW.

As already announced the coming Show will be held at the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington Gore, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 16th and 17th of this month. The doors will be open each day to the public between 10.30 a.m. and 10 p.m. No charge will be made for admission, but visitors will be expected to leave an address card with the Commissionaires who will be stationed at the doors. It is hoped that the readers of TRUTH will make known the above announcement as widely as possible amongst their friends, as a large attendance is especially desired.

Will those ladies who have not yet returned the dolls they have been dressing for the TRUTH Show please do so at once, as it will be impossible to guarantee that any dolls received after noon on Saturday, the 12th inst., will be included in the public exhibition at the Albert Hall. All Home-made and other Toys intended for the Show should also reach this office by the above date. The address is TRUTH Office, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W., and the carriage of parcels and boxes should in all cases be prepaid. It will be seen from the appeal made in another part of this paper, that further subscriptions to the Toy Fund are urgently needed.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 927.

I must delay until next week the announcement of the result of this competition.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 929.

The Prize in this competition has been gained by JINGLE, who scored 107 marks out of a possible maximum of 150. The competitor who comes next in order of merit is Toucan; and then follow, in the following order, V. H. S., Apostrophe, Almaviva, Dry Monopole, Verbum Sat, Gros, R. Martin, Culpepper, Pansy Felsberg, Doubtful Jim, and Dandelion. No other competitor succeeded in getting over seventy-five marks.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 933.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

THE BEST EPIGRAMMATIC DEFINITION OF CHRISTMAS.

The definitions, of which a competitor may send more than one, if he or she so pleases, should be as brief as possible and, of course, indued with epigrammatic point. All answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, December 24 at the latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name and the address of the winner of a half of Prize No. 927 is the Rev. JOHN C. CRAWFORD, "Glencairn," Purley, Surrey.

CLAYMORE.—You have just cause for complaint. The answer to your conundrum No. 3 should, of course, have read "One is 'remote' and one 're-motor.'"

BAFFLED BARD, MAGGIE ELDER, AND WAYNFLETE.—I will deal with the points you raise next week.

EAST ANGLIA.—After full inquiry I do not think it necessary to alter the award to which you took exception.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 930.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.
NEW ROUND GAMES SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS PARTIES.

LIVING ACROSTICS.

A round game that we, in our family circle enjoy very much, and find very little known outside, is a form of living acrostic: Two persons retire to guess; the rest of the company choose a character for the whole—say Romeo. In this case all the "lights" must be taken from Shakespeare. Five persons will each take a character beginning with one of the letters, say Rosalind, Othello, Mercutio, Emilia, and Orlando. When the guessers have returned, Rosalind will commence by giving a succinct account of herself, not disclosing too much—usually it is best to use the first person. Then Othello will follow, and so on, till we come to the sixth person, who personates Romeo. No questions are allowed, but in cases of difficulty a second round may be given. This game can be varied by characters from any well known writer, or birds or fishes, or any branch may be taken. This game has always proved a great success, and I hope, if some of your readers do not know it, they will give it a good trial this Christmas.—Avis.

PLEBISCITE.

Materials required:—A few common but useful articles, such as a pair of scissors, a ball of string, a pocket knife, a pair of slippers, a corkscrew, a lead pencil, a watch key, a box of pins, a hammer, a tea spoon, a pair of nut-crackers, &c.; as many slips of paper and pencils as there are players; a prize or prizes for the winners. Method of play:—The articles chosen, say, to the number of ten, are laid on a side table, and the players are allowed five minutes to fix in their memories the name of each article. The table is then covered up or moved out of sight, and the object of each player is not only to write down correctly from memory each of the articles, but also to put them in the exact order of usefulness according to his or her opinion. The slips are then collected by the leader of the game, and the votes for each article counted. The player whose slip bears the names in the nearest order to the popular vote receives the prize. The more diversified the articles chosen the better, and by increasing the number of articles the game can be made very difficult.—Pick.

NOVELETTE GAME.

All being seated in a circle or semi-circle, one begins to tell a tale—e.g., "In a certain town there lived." The next follows with another sentence ending abruptly, and so on till the story has gone twice round. The more startling and ludicrous the incidents, the better. To increase the fun, certain words, or classes of words, should be barred beforehand, and any using such words must pay a forfeit. The second story commences with the one sitting next the beginner of first narration. When the game closes all forfeits are cried.—Esperanza.

DEFINITIONS.

One of the party describes something he or she has thought of by a definition sufficiently accurate, but as obscure as possible, and epigrammatic in form. For instance, "Right" as "The king de jure, but not de facto," or "Rain" as "Returned and transmuted offerings." One and another will then signify his or her guess at the subject, not by naming it, but by suggesting another definition. This, those already initiated will approve or not, as it may deserve, and the initiated, thus recruited, may project more definitions as they occur to them, until the rest of the party is either enlightened or has given it up. The difficulty of the game is increased by adopting examples like the foregoing, whose sound presents different meanings (right, wright, write, rite, and rain, reign, rein), and permitting a jumble of definitions descriptive of them all. Another form of the game is to give a subject for written definitions in a limited time, all competing. Votes being then taken and small prizes awarded on the respective merits of the definitions.—Robt. Martin.

I would suggest a variation of the good old round game of Earth, Air, Fire, and Water. Instead of these words use poet, painter, author, actor. In all other respects the game to be the same.—Malignant.

AWRY ANIMALS.

As type-writing is now so prevalent, it would be as well to have the lists of awry animals type written. There may be from fifteen to twenty animals on the list, of which I give a few examples, viz.: greit, rsheo, leap-then, rugaja, grabed, parti=tiger, horse, elephant, jajuar, badger, tapir. Each player receives a list and pencil, and the host, having the "key" in his possession, explains that the object is to untwist or unravel the animals' names and write them in regular order below the "awry" list. In from fifteen to twenty minutes the papers should be signed, finished, and handed to the host, who redistributes them, giving each person another paper. The key is then read out, the correct names in each paper checked off, and a prize is given to the one who has unravelled most animals.—Hibernian.

WHO AM I?

A character party which is most amusing and comparatively new, can be given without costuming and with little or no work in preparing for it. After the arrival of the guests, the hostess pins to the back of each a written slip of paper, telling the name of character he or she is meant to be. The only knowledge the players have as to the persons they represent is gained from the comments of their friends. From these each must guess the name of his or her character. As the opinions expressed differ very widely, the guessing of one's character is often a difficult matter. The names of well-known politicians, authors, musicians, characters in fiction, or local celebrities, may be given, and a prize may be awarded to the player who first guesses his character.—Hibernian.

THE OBJECTIVE LIBRARY.

This game is simply taking the titles of books and representing them by arrangements of various objects. The groups may be arranged on a table, and each numbered with a small card. The numbers being repeated on the left hand side of sheets of paper. Each player is provided with one of these papers and a pencil. The game begins when all the players are admitted to the room where the "Library" is spread on the table, and should last about twenty minutes. In this the players try to solve as many of the problems as possible. The one who guesses the most titles in a given time receives a prize. I give a few examples of titles:—"Ivanhoe" (I've an o), a child cut from an illustration holding a large O, which may be pasted in the hand; "Measure for Measure," a pint measure, round which is twined a tape measure; "The Spy," a telescope. Another variation instead of books, famous men may be represented. "Plato," by a plate on which is laid the letter O; "Gladstone," picture of a laughing girl with a small stone beside it. Another way is to represent cities. Put a slip of paper on an empty can with 2,000 lbs. written on it, "Canton"; a glass in which is a paper with these words, to depart, "Glasgow."—Hibernian.

"HAWKERS."

All the party to be seated except one. The one is supposed to be a hawker, who sells his wares from house to house. He starts, for instance, by saying, "I am a costermonger, and sell apples," at the same time he points at one particular person in the group, who must, before the hawker counts six, name some other article he would be likely to sell, which begins with the same letter—such as "Artichokes." If he fail to hit upon a suitable word he then becomes the hawker, and so on.—Prima Donna.

HOBBIES.

All the party to be seated, except one, who goes out of the room. Each present selects a hobby, such as gardening, carpentering, &c. Then the one outside enters, and asks each of the party in order three questions. In the course of the answers the hobby must be introduced, but the object is to prevent the questioner guessing the one chosen. The first discovered then goes out of the room.—Prima Donna.

THE ZOO.

All the party to be seated except one, who stands in front of the group, and repeats the letters of the alphabet, stopping suddenly at any one letter, and pointing at a particular person, who must, before he counts six, name an animal whose name begins with that particular letter. If he fails to do this in time, he then takes the place of the alphabet reciter.—Prima Donna.

MOCK ADVERTISEMENTS.

Each player must have a piece of paper and a pencil, and any number can play. The idea is to write the funniest mock advertisement, e.g., Wanted—A dog, to teach cycling and darn socks; must know how to milk a cow and smoke herrings; Jew preferred; all found, except board and lodging.—Inga.

Stretch a piece of tape across the room and provide an ordinary balloon ball. The company seat themselves on each side of the tape (as far from it as space will allow), and with the back of the closed hand send the ball to and fro over the tape. Whichever side lets it fall, it scores one to the opposite party. Twenty is the game. Only the back of the hand must be used, and the company keep seated.—Echo.

ALLITERATION.

One of the party starts a story, every word beginning with the same letter, thus:—No. 1: "Every Evening Eva Excited Envy." No. 2: "Because Bertie Brown's Bicycle Brought." No. 3: "Him, Hilariously, Hoping Her." No. 4: "Procrastinating, Prudent Papa Perhaps." No. 5: "Might Mention Marriage," &c., &c. Any one making a mistake must begin another story. There is no limit to the number of words, but they must not be less than three. It ought to be played quickly. —Echo.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Have in the centre of table a box of letters. Each player must be supplied with pencil and paper. One of the players picks out, at random, six letters from the box and calls out their names, the others taking them down meanwhile on their papers. These letters must now be the initials of words (to be used in same order as given out) to form any question. Five minutes only allowed for this, then collect papers, shuffle, and hand round to the players. Six other letters are then chosen, and these are to serve as initials for words to answer the question as well as possible. Five minutes also allowed for answer. If one cares to prolong the game, pass the papers on from right to left, so that each question is answered by all. Any number of persons can play this game.—Beginner.

Let each child alternately choose a letter, which they all write down; then each child must form a word or words from same, the most successful competitor receiving a gift. A further gift may be given for the best sentence constructed with the words given by the prize winner.—Pan.

Each person, having been provided with pencil and paper, writes a common noun on his paper, folds down the paper so as to conceal what he has written. They are all shaken up in a basket, and then each person picks out one and writes on it a question on any subject he likes, but he must not look at the word formerly written. They are then shaken up again, and this time each person has to write a poem of not more than eight lines, which must contain both the noun and the question written above. They are then mixed up again, and a chosen member of the party reads them out one by one, while the others try to guess by whom the poem is written.—Fritz.

The party of players being assembled round the table, a basket containing several blank cards, or pieces of paper, is to be passed around the table, each person taking a card or paper. A chairman is then to be elected. He then calls upon some person to propose a question. After the question has been given the persons playing will each write his, or her, answer on the card given them, taking care that no person reads it, or that no mark is on the card by which its author may be known. The cards are then to be put into th basket, and the chairman then proceeds to rea them out singly. The author of the best card (to be decided by the chairman) next proposes a question, which is answered as before. Example: Question—What is a bachelor? Answers—1. A target for fair hands to shoot at. 2. An old maid's forlorn hope, &c.—Jerichoa.

EXAMINER.

The players sit in a row or semicircle, and one of the number takes the post of Examiner by standing before the others, holding a stick in his hand. He then addresses the person seated at one end of the row (which is supposed to be the top of the class), and, pointing to the latter with his stick, says:—"I'm thinking of a town in England beginning with 'A.' What is it?" The person addressed must mention the name of any town in England commencing with the letter A before the Examiner can count twelve; but, failing to do so, the latter passes on to the next person (repeating the counting twelve), till one of the players answers correctly, who is then entitled to take that individual's place in the class, who first missed the question, whilst the latter seats himself lower down in the successful one's late chair. When the Examiner has finished, or gone through part of the alphabet, asking for names of towns in any continent or country he may choose, the game may be varied by his demanding the name of a river, lake, or mountain, beginning with A, B, C, &c. Example.—Examiner: Name a river in South America beginning with A? Reply: Amazon. The Examiner should fix on some well-known town, river, lake, mountain, &c. in his own mind before asking a question; then, in case the whole class fails to reply (ere he has counted twelve to each player individually), he may supply the name himself. If a player misses a question three times he must take the Examiner's post, and the latter seats himself in the player's vacant chair. He who is made Examiner twice in the course of the game must pay a forfeit, leaving the room while some penalty is devised by the vote of the company in general. This game should be played briskly to ensure amusement.—E. S. Wilde.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS.

Office of the Central Pacific Railroad Co.
New York, November 17th, 1896.

This Company has made arrangements to EXTEND its $3,997,000 FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS, maturing January 1st, 1897, so that the principal thereof shall become payable in one year from that date, viz., on January 1st, 1898, with interest meanwhile payable semi-annually, January 1st, and July 1st, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, principal and interest payable in United States gold coin. The right is reserved to redeem the Bonds so extended, at any time, on paying to the Bondholders the par or face value of the Bonds, and interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 1st, 1897, in United States gold coin, less such interest accrued subsequent to that date as may have been paid thereon before such redemption thereof. The right of the Bondholders to avail themselves of such extension has been reserved to such holders as, prior to December 15th, 1896, shall deposit their Bonds for that purpose with Messrs. Speyer & Co., New York, or with Messrs. Speyer Brothers, London, or Mr. Laz Speyer, Ellissen, Frankfort-on-the-Main, or Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Brothers, Amsterdam.

The extended Bonds will be stamped to show the extension, and new coupon sheets will be annexed, representing future interest.

Copies of the extension agreement can be obtained at the Company's Office, and at the Offices of the Bankers above mentioned. The present extension is made to the date of maturity of the latest maturing Central Pacific First Mortgage Bonds, on or before which date the Company expects to arrange a long extension of the entire First Mortgage issue.

C. P. HUNTINGTON,
Vice-President.

Until 10th instant inclusive a bonus of ½ per cent., viz:—£1 on each bond of $1,000, will be paid by us to Bondholders, upon presentation of their Bonds at our Offices for extension under the foregoing Notice.

ENTRE NOUS.

By the time this number of Truth is in the hands of its London readers the Seventeenth "Truth" Toy and Doll Show will have commenced at the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington. The doors will remain open to-day (Wednesday) until 10 p.m., and will be open again to-morrow (Thursday) between the hours of 10.30 a.m. and 10 p.m. The public will be admitted free of charge on presentation of a visiting-card to the commissionaire on duty at the entrance. I hope I am not too sanguine in expecting an attendance of visitors which will surpass even the unprecedented total of last year.

The Royal Albert Hall Organist, Mr. H. C. Tonking, has again kindly promised to give Organ Recitals at frequent intervals during the hours that the "Truth" Show is open.

Mr. Tom Smith has once more, in the most generous way, written to inform me that he has reserved his firm's usual contribution of 25,000 Christmas Crackers for the Truth Toy Show. His kindness is all the greater, I think, seeing that at this festive season the demand for crackers is exceptionally large. Every endeavour will be made to exhibit this seasonable gift at the Albert Hall, but in any case the crackers will be delivered in good time for distribution to the Hospitals and Workhouses at the end of the week.

I have not yet disposed of the two Yorkshire terrier female pups, which, as I stated last week, are to be sold for the benefit of the Truth Toy Fund. To stimulate my readers' interest in these intelligent and well-bred little animals, let me say that an offer of twenty-five guineas has been refused for their father, who with their mother and their grand-parents is duly inserted in "the book." A pup of a previous litter has been shown four times, and has taken four prizes—three first, and one second. Once more, then, how much, if you please, for the Yorkshire terrier pups?

There is one point which I must earnestly press upon all those who may inspect the show of toys at the Albert Hall, as well as upon other readers of Truth who may not be able to be present. It is that all these toys have to be paid for, and that I am still very far from having received the amount required to pay for them. The toys have largely been bought in reliance upon the generosity of the readers of Truth, and from my belief that it is their wish that every child in the London workhouses and hospitals should have a present on Christmas Day. Hitherto my confidence in the generosity of the public has never been disappointed. But the time is getting short. Christmas is only a week distant. Is there any one who would not wish to enjoy on that day the pleasure of having helped to make one little friendless or suffering child happy?

The following sums have reached me:—

The Queen is to leave Windsor Castle on Friday morning for Osborne, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, and her Majesty will reside in the Isle of Wight until about February 16.

The Princess of Wales is to return to Sandringham on Saturday next, and the Prince will follow next Wednesday. The last of the Sandringham shooting-parties for this season is to assemble on Monday, the 28th, and there will be a lawn meet of the West Norfolk Foxhounds during the holidays, with a hunt breakfast.

The Prince of Wales is going to have his racing yacht, the Britannia, fitted out at Cowes for the Mediterranean regattas, and H.R.H. will proceed to Cannes early in February for a stay of about two months, while during a part of that period the Princess of Wales and Princess Victoria will go to Copenhagen on a visit to Prince and Princess Charles of Denmark.

The St. James's Gazette announces that disappointment is expressed at Copenhagen that Princess Charles of Denmark has so long delayed her home-coming, as "a charming villa has for months been ready for her." This is a pure fiction, the fact being that the reason for the prolonged stay of Prince and Princess Charles in England has been that their flat in the palace of the King of the Hellenes at Copenhagen had to be got ready for them, and the decoration and furnishing of the twenty-eight apartments in their new abode have only just been finished. The "disappointment" is as entirely imaginative as the "charming villa," it having been known for months past that Prince and Princess Charles would not arrive at Copenhagen until about Christmas.

Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg are settled in their residence in Valletta for the winter, with their children. The season is just beginning in Malta, where the weather has been better than on the Riviera. Sir M. Culme Seymour was entertained by the Governor and many others previous to giving up his command of the Mediterranean Fleet. Lady and Miss Seymour had left Malta many months before.

Lord Ranfurly and Lord William Cecil are next Tuesday to replace Lord Bridport and Sir Edmund Commerell as Lord and Groom in Waiting on the Queen, and they will be on duty until January 5.

Lord Cadogan's attendance at the meeting of the Cabinet last week did not allow him to be present at the Winter Show held by the Royal Dublin Society at Ball's Bridge. Lady Cadogan visited it with a Viceregal party on Wednesday. The weather was extremely wintry and cold, wet and dark, which made the occasion more instructive than amusing. Lord Cadogan returned from England in time to visit the Potato Exhibition held at the Rotunda, Dublin, to commemorate the tercentenary of the introduction of the tuber into Ireland by Sir Walter Raleigh. In the speech which he made on the occasion of his visit he announced the intention of the Government to create an Agricultural Board for Ireland. The formation of such a Board will present many difficulties. It may be safely predicted that one of them will not be want of candidates for the places, and, further, that the initial difficulty will be to escape from the jobbing traditions of Dublin Castle in filling these places.

The usual rumour of a Royal visit to Ireland, which it is customary to start in Irish newspapers at this season, has made its appearance. On the face of it there is nothing humorous, or even strange, in the suggestion that the Sovereign would visit the island which is as much a portion of her kingdom as England or Scotland. Nevertheless, it is said in Ireland that the humour lies in the fact that the Royal visit is always for the coming year. The year never absolutely comes; for over thirty years it has been coming. Apropos of Royalty in Ireland, there is little doubt that Princes, and especially Princesses, would have been a success there—if it were only for the fact that they begin with "P," the charmed letter of the country. It may reasonably be supposed that they would have enjoyed popularity and flourished in the island, like potatoes, pigs, punch, politics, and polemics.

Lady Waterford has just recovered from an attack of bronchitis, and is nearly convalescent. After Christmas she is expected in Dublin, where she intends to stay with her daughters for some weeks during the season. Lord and Lady Iveagh are expected in Dublin for part of the Castle season, and Lord Iveagh will probably attend the installation of Lord Caledon as a Knight of St. Patrick.

Not long since I called attention to the inadequacy of the accounts published by Captain Walford-Gosnall in reference to his Home for Horses at Mount Maskall, Chelmsford. The Captain's financial year ends at Michaelmas, and I was in hope that my criticism would bear fruit on the issue of the accounts for the year ending Michaelmas last. I am disappointed, therefore, to learn that the Captain is now circulating a fresh set of appeals without any financial statement at all. Have not the accounts for last year been made up yet? If not, I would suggest to Captain Walford-Gosnall that he should devote himself to this business before that of soliciting more cash. An appeal is always more effectual when backed by a full and satisfactory financial statement.

Next year's show of the Highland and Agricultural Society is to be held at Glasgow in July, and £2,200 will be given in prizes, as against £1,673, which was the amount distributed at Perth last summer.

I always read with pleasure Lord Rosebery's orations when they deal with any of the vast number of subjects which are outside politics, for his social speeches are as good as his political speeches are bad. There was much in his recent oration on Stevenson that was excellent, although I cannot quite agree with his observation that "no man of ancient or modern times since the beginning of the world has ever left behind him so splendid a collection of his works as Robert Louis Stevenson." But I do thoroughly agree with him in his protest against the modern abuse of testimonials. "The minister," he said, "as he enters and as he quits his manse is hallowed by such presents; the faithful railway porter who has been for five years at his post is honoured in the same way." But why should he have subsequently thought it necessary to explain away his allusion to the ministers, and to inform his auditors that "none are more fitting as the recipients of these testimonials than the class to which I thoughtlessly alluded—I mean the ministers of the churches of Scotland"? Admitting that a minister should receive a testimonial after lengthy and honest service to a congregation, why should he be given one on entering his manse? Speaking generally, I should be far more inclined to give a testimonial to a railway porter who has been for five years at his post than to a minister who is just entering on the duties of his. But then I can freely express my opinion, because I care neither more nor less for the good opinion of all the ministers in Scotland than for that of a like number of railway porters.

Testimonials to living nonentities are not more absurd than "celebrations to keep alive the memory of the eminent dead." What more utterly silly can be conceived than the celebration of the "golden wedding" of Robert and Elizabeth Browning, that took place last week? The Brownings have gone to that bourne where there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage. Robert Browning may have been a great man, but a poet, in the ordinary acceptation of the word he was not, any more than a man can be termed a musician without an ear for music. If, however, he had been the greatest poet that ever lived, this celebration would have been equally ridiculous. But with a considerable number of persons the sense of the ridiculous is non-existent. As a general rule all these functions are designed rather for living men to fuss themselves into notoriety than to do honour to those who are not living.

GADARENE STATUARY.

In his speech at Edinburgh last week, Lord Rosebery expressed a wish that it might be possible for the restless spirits which once possessed the Gadarene swine to enter into the Edinburgh statues and induce them all to rush headlong down into the deepest part of the Firth of Forth.

It was all very well for Lord R. to express
The wish that we quote from his recent address;
But we'd like to extend its beneficent scope,
And re-echo for London a similar hope.
We, too, 'neath the sculptor's curs'd dominance groan;
We, too, have our horrors in bronze and in stone;
And most surely all London with pleasure would flush,
If its statues some day to the river would rush.

The supremest of joy it to us would afford,
To observe the mad race of the nondescript horde;
To watch it increasing whilst onward it went,
As each square and each garden its effigies sent.
'T would be rapture indeed then to pass in review
Pr'aps the worst lot of statues a city e'er knew;
And to give a last glance at our open air "gems,"
As they all lumbered by on their way to the Thames.

Well in front, let us hope, would the Griffin be found,
Which too long at the Law Courts has cumbered the ground;
With begrimed George the Fourth on his stirrup-less steed,
And the poor Duke of York from his pillory freed.
Well in front, let us hope, would Achilles stride down,
And that mildewy Cobden from dull Camden Town;
With ill-used Mr. Fox, who, with such little care,
Is exposed in his bed-quilt in Bloomsbury-square.

With a sigh of relief we the features should scan
Of the frock-coated Peel and the Belt-carved Queen Anne;
We should shout with delight, as well up in the race,
Came the quoit-throwing female of Waterloo-place;
We should hail pig-tailed George as he went prancing by,
And greet John Stuart Mill with a jubilant cry;
We would gladly assist, were it needful, to haul
Mr. Peabody down to the Thames—chair and all!

The Embankment contingent the bustle would swell—
Robert Burns, Mr. Forster, R. Raikes, and Brunel;
King Charles would trot down with Napier at his side;
Lord Clyde on his lion with Franklin would ride;
Dr. Jenner, Lord Byron, King William, and Pitt,
Themselves, arm in arm, to the stream would commit;
And the tide, swiftly ebbing, would sweep to the Nore
The eyesores which London has now to deplore.

Just think how our city would look the next day,
With its stony monstrosities all cleared away!
Think how nice it would be when we walked through a square,
To know that no terror in bronze still lurked there!
So come, restless spirits, if still you incline
To repeat what you did with the Gadarene swine,
Enter into the statues that litter our town,
And into the river, pray hurry them down!

Numerous Liberals have been recently solicited by circular to join the Primrose Club at the modest figure of one guinea per annum. This is not due, I take it, to any desire to infuse Liberal blood into the Club, but is simply because the circulars go out indiscriminately at this time of year, like those of the wine-merchants and charity-mongers. There is nothing in the circulars to prevent Liberals joining the Club, no intimation being given that members must be of any particular political complexion, and I take it that, provided a candidate has a guinea in his pocket, the management does not care whether he is a Radical or a Tory, or a peer or a prize-fighter. For this very reason, however, Liberals who are at all careful about the company they keep should hesitate to avail themselves of the invitation.

Various accounts, all incorrect, have been given of the late Mr. J. L. Baldwin's work on Whist. This valuable little book, which was published in 1866, is entitled "The Laws of Short Whist: Edited by J. L. Baldwin; and a Treatise on the Game, by J. C." Mr. Baldwin's code is compressed into sixteen pages, whereas M. Deschapelles' "Traité du Whist" extends over 284 pages. It was at Mr. Baldwin's request that Mr. James Clay (J. C.) wrote his lucid, compact, and thoroughly practical essay.

It has also been stated in nearly all the papers that Mr. Baldwin was chairman of the famous Whist Laws Committee of the Arlington Club, and that he was chairman of the Portland Club, and a constant player at that establishment. As a matter of fact, Mr. Baldwin never in his life belonged to the Portland Club, nor was he a member of the Arlington Committee (which sat in 1863 and 1864) whose code was considered by a specially-appointed committee of the Portland Club, who made several alterations and additions, all of which were adopted.

It is generally considered that the best whist-players ever known were Lord Granville, who was long Ambassador at Paris, Lord Henry Bentinck, General George Anson, Mr. James Clay, Comte Deschapelles, and Comte Achille Delamarre. Deschapelles declared that with Delamarre for a partner he would be ready to play dummy against Le Père Eternel. He preferred Delamarre to Lord Granville, through an idea that English and French players of the very highest calibre usually misunderstood each other's game.

One afternoon, early in the reign of William IV., Lord Granville, being about to return to Paris, went to Graham's (then the great whist club) for a rubber before starting. His carriage and four were ordered to come for him at five o'clock. They waited until ten, when he sent out to desire that the horses might be changed, as he would not be ready for an hour or two. Lord Granville played for eighteen hours, and the horses were changed three times. When the party broke up they were up to their ankles in cards, and Lord Granville had lost £8,000. It was on this memorable occasion that his Excellency lost a rubber, after laying the long odds in thousands (£5,000 to £2,000) by miscounting a trump.

I prefer Mr. Rudyard Kipling's prose to his poetry. But if I am right in this estimate, how very laudatory ought to be my language in respect to the former if I am to keep pace with the critics of his poetry. As the reader has doubtless heard, the bard has published some new poems, entitled "The Seven Seas," and this is what I read about them in the advertised Press notices:—

They are engines, throbbing with energy aglow with fire, every stroke of them in the service of a great purpose.
It is impossible to read them through without being lifted on the breath of prophecy.
They are animated throughout with indubitable genius.
They are packed with inspiration, humour, and pathos.
They mark an epoch in literature, and their author bears upon his brow the seal of a sovereign destiny.
Their verse stings the pulse of the ready.
It provokes in him an unwonted emotion.
The intellectual and spiritual might is keen.
They are full of the Imperial spirit.
The Empire has found a singer.
Statesmen may have to take account of them.
Patriotism is their solid concrete foundation.
All the death-scorning flush, which is the very bone and marrow of the British character, are here.

Well, all this may be very true, for all that I know. But what does a critic mean by telling us that their "author bears upon his brow the seal of a sovereign destiny?" What is the seal of a sovereign destiny? Why is Mr. Kipling's brow stamped with this seal? What, in short, does the phrase mean?

Although some charitable people have generously subscribed the £140 required for the return to Burmah of the troupe of native performers who were recently cast adrift in London owing to the failure of their managers, there is one point in the case which ought not to be lost sight of. Why should the relief of these natives of our Eastern Empire have been left to private benevolence? If they had happened to be stranded in a foreign country, they would have been sent away by the British Consul at the expense of the British Government—in fact, three of them who got to Hamburg were so shipped back to London by the British Consul. But here, at the very centre of the Empire, these hapless and destitute Burmans were denied any assistance whatever, beyond the cold comfort of the workhouse, the explanation of the India Office being that there was no fund available for the purpose. This seems an absurd state of things, and one which might easily be remedied. It would surely be only right and reasonable that the India Office should give such help as is afforded by a British Consul abroad in cases of the same kind.

It would scarcely seem like Christmas if we did not get a new "big dog" picture to herald the season. Messrs. Frost & Reed, the enterprising art publishers of Bristol, supply the inevitable engraving this year in the shape of a reproduction in photogravure of Mr. A. J. Elsey's "Who is it?" a picture intended as a companion for the widely popular "I'se biggest" of the same artist. More to my own taste are two reproductions, issued by the same publishers, of pictures of great merit by Mr. Reginald Smith, called respectively "A Storm-Girt Coast," and "The Pembrokeshire Stacks," those lofty sea-girdled rocks which

"Hôtel Burlington," at Sunny Boscombe. (200 rooms.) Every luxury. Delightful grounds. Magnificent golf links. Sea-water baths. Moderate charges.—Bournemouth East Station.

Like giants stand,
To sentinel enchanted land.

These are really admirable works which cannot but increase the artist's reputation. Another of Messrs. Frost & Reed's publications is a mezzotint engraving by Mr. Alfred J. Skrimshire, of a picture called "The Ferry," by Mr. E. M. Wimperis, R.I. The number of impressions taken of this delightful summer scene has been limited to a hundred and twenty-three; and I understand that the plate has been already destroyed. Sportsmen who, when they are unable to sally forth and hunt or shoot something, are so fond of contemplating on their walls pictures of the birds and animals they are able, in happier circumstances, to kill, will be certain to find placid enjoyment of the latter kind in a photogravure called "The Home Coverts," just published by Messrs. Leggatt Brothers, of 62, Cheapside. The engraving is after a drawing by Mr. Archibald Thorburn, an artist whose correct and highly finished drawings of bird life are already well known. "The Home Coverts" in the present instance are well stocked with that sacrosanct bird, the pheasant.

The proposal of the Salford Corporation to cut the legs off the portraits in the Municipal collection, in order to economise space, has naturally excited much interest in artistic circles. I am overwhelmed with correspondence on the subject—mostly from indignant artists. One of this class asks whether there are no portraits of mayors and councillors in the collection which could be reduced to half-size by trimming off their robes and other insignia of Bumbledom. Another suggests that, to complete the Salford collection, a portrait group should be added representing the Arts Committee without heads—in which condition he is confident that no one could fail to recognise them. Another correspondent advises the Corporation to get over the difficulty by cutting up all their pictures and exhibiting them from time to time in sections. The public could then go and look at the head of a famous character one day, his body the next, and his legs on a third. Vast possibilities are thus opened up for provincial art-authorities. But the prospect is more novel than attractive.

Apropos, here is a good story, which I have not heard before, about the painter Haydon:—

We are told by Borrow (an author well known to all municipal bodies), in the pages of "Lavengro," that on one occasion he went to see the portrait of a certain Mayor, limned by the "painter of the heroic" (poor Benjamin Robert Haydon). The upper part of the picture was very noble; the features, though somewhat blunt, were serious and intelligent; the robes and chain were perfect, and for background there was a castellated arch, a machicolated tower, a portcullis, and everything correct and conformable, as Mr. Weller senior would say. Still, the general result was undignified and disappointing—there was something wanting; but what it was Lavengro could not make out until he saw a second heroic portrait from the same hand. Then, all at once, it dawned upon him that the painter, while scrupulous with regard to the heads and bodies of his patrons, had only one model for legs—his own, which he inserted indiscriminately in all portraits, to the great detriment of the work.

This outcry about Salford has raised an echo in Liverpool. A resident in that town complains bitterly that the local Permanent Collection has degenerated into "a dumping-ground for rubbish in the shape of spurious pictures presented by prominent citizens, evidently with the double object of getting rid of worthless lumber and earning for themselves a little cheap popularity." The complaint refers specifically to certain pictures, but Heaven forbid that I should involve myself in a controversy upon such a point. It is only too true, of course, that a municipal picture-gallery which is abused in this way is not worth keeping open, but one need not go as far as Liverpool in search of such abuses.

Some people seem to find a strange pleasure in correcting other people's grammar. The other day a reference appeared in Truth to "a brother of Lord Fermoy's." An Irish correspondent wants to know by what grammatical rule I justify "the double possessive" in this expression. Heaven forbid that I should set myself up as an authority on grammar. I have no higher ambition than to speak and write the language which I hear spoken and see written around me. The "double possessive," however, although my Irish friend speaks of it as "unique," is, to my mind, a well-established English idiom. There is plenty of sanction for such expressions as "A play of Shakespeare's," "A speech of Gladstone's." In some cases the double possessive is the only form tolerated. You do not say "A brother of me," "A friend of him," "An uncle of us," but "A brother of mine," "A friend of his," "An uncle of ours." Grammar is founded, I take it, upon speech, not speech upon grammar, and if grammatical rules take no account of well-established idioms, so much the worse for the rules.

If Oxford had not been so excited over the recent rumpus at Christ Church, more would probably have been heard of a piece of gross injustice that has just been perpetrated by the authorities at Jesus. On the 7th inst. a smoking concert was held in the Junior Common Room, by permission of the Vice-Principal. The President of the J.C.R., however, in applying for leave, omitted to state the exact date of the concert, After the concert, but in no way in consequence of or in connection with it, some disturbance took place in the college, and on the following morning the Principal sent for the President of the Junior Common Room, and incontinently "sent him down," on the pretext that he had not stated the date of the concert when applying for leave. The President of the J.C.R. had not attended the concert, and was in no way concerned in the subsequent disturbance; but no opportunity of explanation or defence was given to him. At the best of times the practice of vicarious punishment is a stupid and mischievous one, but this seems to have been an exceptionally irrational abuse of authority. Were a son of mine so dealt with, I should promptly remove him from the college.

I have one or two little matters which I would commend to the attention of the managers of the Mercers' School in Holborn. One is the practice of "keeping in" the whole of a form of little boys if one boy misbehaves himself, even to the extent of such a trifling offence as "fidgeting." I happen to know a gentleman who daily brings his little boy of nine up from the suburbs to attend this school, calling or sending for him in the afternoon; and the result of the above practice is that the father, or his messenger, is frequently kept out (possibly in the rain) for half an hour while his boy is kept in. The practice of punishing a number of individuals, whether a class of boys or a regiment of soldiers, for the shortcomings of one of their number is always a bad one, and it becomes worse when part of the punishment falls on an outsider.

There is another bad practice at the same school which deserves to be held up to the strongest reprobation, wherever it is found. It is that of forbidding a child, no matter under what necessity, to leave his class, except on pain of an imposition. Serious consequences have followed before now from this practice, and at this time of day one would have thought no schoolmaster required enlightenment on such a point. The managers of the Mercers' School expressly notify that no complaints from parents will be noticed, and they have, therefore, only themselves to thank if their domestic affairs come under the notice of the Press. How a schoolmaster can expect to enjoy the confidence of parents, when he openly announces that he will not pay any attention to anything they may have to say, I am at a loss to understand.

The Bishop of Ripon has just perpetrated a job which is exciting intense indignation among Yorkshire ecclesiastics, and which, indeed, has caused many laymen in the diocese to express themselves strongly on the subject of episcopal nepotism. A few months ago Archdeacon Danks, Vicar of Richmond, was appointed by the Bishop to a residentiary stall in Ripon Cathedral, on the understanding that he would in a short time resign his living, which is one of the most desirable benefices in the diocese. It was, of course, expected that the Bishop of Ripon, who is the patron, would appoint to Richmond some experienced clergyman in the diocese, who had worked well in a poorer parish, and thereby earned promotion. To the general disgust of both clergy and laity, Bishop Boyd Carpenter has pitchforked into the good living the Rev. L. Stewart Robinson, who has been only nine years in orders, and who has done no parochial work whatever in the diocese. Mr. Robinson was brought to Ripon from London by the Bishop, who made him his chaplain, and for some time past he has been one of the diocesan inspectors of religious knowledge, and "private chaplain" to Lord Zetland at Aske Hall. Instead of the Bishops interfering with lay patrons, as they propose, it seems to me that it would be well if they reformed their own scandalous abuses of patronage.

Another Church patronage scandal has occurred at Liverpool, where a young cleric of less than three years' standing in holy orders has been instituted to the Vicarage of St. Michael-in-the-Hamlet, Toxteth Park. The gross value of the living is about £500. When it is added that the young cleric is the Rev. H. G. Jones and the patron of the living the Rev. W. Jones, the why and the wherefore of this appointment will be sufficiently apparent. In reply to a protest from the Curates' Union, the Bishop of Liverpool says:—

> Mr. Jones is undoubtedly very young. But in the course of my episcopate I have frequently seen that men who have been only three years in orders are more fit to be incumbents than others who have been ordained ten years, and I have not always found that age qualifies a man for promotion.

If this was the only defence Bishop Ryle could think of for this outrageous job he would have done better to say nothing at all. It is really too ridiculous. No doubt there is a certain amount of truth in his generalisation. Some men with only three years' experience are more fit for an incumbency than some others with ten years' experience. But does the Bishop expect us to believe that the particular clerical fledgeling on whom this valuable benefice has been conferred is better qualified for such a charge than not merely some, but every one, of the scores of men in the diocese who have been toiling and moiling in ill-paid curacies for ten, fifteen, or twenty years? Will he, in fact, affirm that Mr. H. G. Jones received this preferment solely on account of his superior merits? I rather think myself that the Bishop would shrink from saying so much straight out, though he does not mind making a disingenuous attempt to suggest it.

I am glad to see that the Lord Chancellor has given the Rectory of Sedgbrook, near Grantham, to the Rev. T. Ewbank, who has been for several years the curate in charge of the parish. It would be well if episcopal patrons would follow Lord Halsbury's good example in this respect, instead of almost invariably promoting their friends or relations whenever they have anything good to dispose of. The living of Sedgbrook, which became vacant by the death of Canon Drake, is worth about £500 a year, with residence.

There is to be a special service in St. Paul's Cathedral next Wednesday, at which the Archbishop-elect of Canterbury will preach a farewell sermon to the diocese of London. All patronage belonging to the See of London which may fall vacant between next Tuesday and the day on which Bishop Creighton does homage to the Queen, will pass to the Crown.

The Paris Figaro published the other day, in all solemnity, and apparently without the slightest doubt about its authenticity, the following extract from a sermon alleged to have been addressed by Mr. Ellis, an English missionary, to his native flock in Madagascar :—

Oui, mes chers frères, Christ aimait les Anglais, et il avait les Français en horreur ; et la preuve en est que, lors de son séjour en Angleterre, jamais on ne put le décider à aller visiter Paris.

None but a French editor would be capable of offering such a thing seriously to his readers ; but, as the French public are apt to take their editors seriously, it might be as well if this ridiculous utterance were formally repudiated. I am told that Mr. Ellis is at present in England, and it seems desirable that his attention should be called to the allegation.

I have received several letters in reference to the dispute at St. George's-street Baptist Church, Macclesfield, which was noticed in TRUTH on December 3. It has been strongly represented to me that the pastor, the Rev. E. A. Hobby, is an ardent and active Radical, and so I had better, perhaps, say at once that I do not allow party considerations to influence my judgment in a matter of this kind, though I am, of course, sorry to have to fall foul of a gentleman of my own political creed. Nor can my opinion be affected, let me add, by the photograph of the pastor, with which I have been favoured. The statement on which I commented a fortnight ago was to the effect that a local reporter was expelled from the Baptist Church, where he had held the office of deacon, because he went to the theatre and the circus. He has since repeated this statement. On the other hand, the deacons and committee have sent me a lengthy communication, in which they give the statement "an unqualified denial." They assert that at a committee meeting the reporter "severely criticised" a sermon in which he considered that the pastor had personally attacked him for going to the theatre and the circus ; and also that he had been "guilty of criticising" previous sermons. The only inference one can draw from this is that his name was erased from the Church roll, not on account of his attendance at certain places of amusement, but on account of his protests against being publicly preached at for going to such places, together with his generally shocking conduct in criticising his pastor's utterances. This really does not seem to me to put the action of Mr. Hobby and his flock in any better light than before.

In reply to many critics who have taken me to task, I must sorrowfully admit that I was to blame the other day in publishing a statement to the effect that every Bishop has to begin his ecclesiastical career as a curate. There are, of course, plenty of men who have taken Orders as schoolmasters or Fellows of Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge ; and not a few of these have gained the episcopal bench without ever having held a curate's berth—the Archbishop-designate of Canterbury among them.

The following resolution was, I understand, solemnly forwarded to the War Office a few weeks ago. The Rev. Jacob Primmer has, in this instance, fairly out-Primmered himself :—

Resolution by the Dunfermline Protestant Defence Association.

That this meeting of the Dunfermline Protestant Defence Association is highly indignant, and strongly resents the recent stealthy and surreptitious invasion of the sanctity of the Sabbath by the Military Band of the First Life Guards, who held a so-called "sacred" concert in St. Margaret's Hall on Sabbath evening, October 4 last, at which, we are credibly informed, a "silver collection" was bagged ; that such a proceeding constituted a gross outrage on the feelings of the large majority of the people of Dunfermline, who respect and honour the Sabbath as a day of rest and worship, and was also a violation of the law of this Protestant and Bible-loving land ; and that we call on the Government to take immediate steps to put down this rude and reckless form of Sabbath desecration and profanation, and to insist that such shall not occur again either in Dunfermline or out of it.—Signed in the name and by authority of the meeting,

Jacob Primmer, President.
Wm. Wallace Drysdale, Secretary.

Dunfermline, November 2, 1896.

From the fact of a "silver collection" having been bagged, it would seem that a certain number of the people of Dunfermline had sufficient sense not only to attend the 1st Life Guards' performance, but to pay something for the privilege. In what way by so doing they grossly outraged the feelings of the vast majority who preferred to go somewhere else, is not evident, any more than is the violation of the law of a Protestant and Bible-loving land. I trust that the Government will request Mr. Primmer to explain these obscure points before responding to the call which the D.P.D.A. makes upon them. A performance by a military band on Sunday may or may not be contrary to Protestantism, but I will swear there is nothing in the Bible that forbids it—either expressly or by implication.

I have been looking through Mr. Hare's voluminous autobiography, and should much like to hear his explanation of the following entry in his diary for 1851 :—

November 25.—To-day we have been to the Chapel Royal at St. James's, where Dr. Vaughan had to preach a funeral sermon for the King of Hanover. The old Duke of Cambridge was there, and startled people by the cordiality of his loud assent, "By all means !" to the invitation, "Let us pray."

Now this was the old Duke's well-known habit, but how Mr. Hare could either have seen him or heard him on November 25, 1851, passes comprehension, seeing that H.R.H. died on July 8, 1850.

The Rev. James Rogers has been making a statement to the Ulverston News with reference to the recent paragraphs in TRUTH identifying him with the "Rev. S. Horn" and the English Agency of the Universitas Nationalis Illinoiensis. At first sight the statements of the reverend gentleman are incomprehensible to me, being completely at variance with all that I have previously heard. I propose, therefore, to make a few inquiries before dealing further with the matter.

How is it that the Roman Catholic community have so little respect for the Lottery Acts, and why do they select these forms of gambling as a religious exercise ? Not only does the system of raising money by lotteries flourish among the Irish clergy, but it is continually breaking out among Roman Catholics in England. The latest example takes the form of "a grand distribution of presents" in connection with the Sacred Heart Church, St. Helens, Lancashire, the first prize offered being a pony and cart complete, with other prizes in proportion. I suppose that the Rev. Thomas Dobson, who is running this enterprise, is under the impression that a lottery is not a lottery when you call it a distribution of presents. But in this he is mistaken, and I trust that the St. Helens police will give him a hint to that effect; not because I have any hostility to his work, but because I object to the law being enforced against journalists and not against the clergy. Those who received from Mr. Dobson books of tickets, with a request to sell them, would also do well to remember, as recently pointed out in TRUTH, that by so doing they render themselves liable to be convicted as rogues and vagabonds, not to mention other penalties.

A serious question for the management of the Church of England Waifs and Strays Society is raised in a circular that has been issued by the Vicar of Lemsford, Hatfield. His statement is to the effect that the Society, having taken charge of an illegitimate child when he was six weeks old, and placed him with foster-parents, decided, more than four years afterwards, "to return him to his own mother because she had fallen again, and, further, was unable or unwilling to pay the stipulated shilling a week towards his maintenance." In consequence of the Vicar's protest this particular child was re-adopted; but in a subsequent letter to the Secretary he pointed out that what had been done seemed to show "that this giving up of children to their natural guardians when these latter have fallen beyond hope of recovery is quite normal and in the ordinary course of the Society's administration." To this a merely formal reply was vouchsafed. The statement made by the Vicar of Lemsford is, however, too important to be dismissed in this way. Is what he describes the practice, or anything like the practice, of the Society? It will be interesting to hear what the Managers of the Society have to say on the subject.

Copies have been sent to me of two letters written in answer to the Guy's Hospital "snowball," which has so long been rolling its rounds. The first letter was written by a recipient of the snowball, to Miss Weston, of Thurlow Park-road, West Dulwich, the promoter of the collection; and the other to the Secretary of Guy's Hospital. In both letters the writer inquired how much money Miss Weston had handed over to the Hospital as the proceeds of the snowball—which is now in its fifty-third series, and ought by this time to have yielded many thousands, if not millions of pounds. Up to the present I have not heard what answer, if any, has been returned, but it is to be hoped that either the lady or the Secretary will answer the question, for the Hospital has been so much compromised by the dissemination of the circulars, that everybody will be curious to know what has been gained by it; and, besides, it is due to Miss Weston herself that some statement should be published as to the amount she has received and paid over.

A Lancashire paper reports that after Lord Wolseley had inspected the barracks and troops at Preston, he paid a visit to some famous gold lace works in the neighbourhood. Now we shall see something!

We seem to be infected with veritable insanity in regard to armaments. I see it stated that there is to be an increase in the number of our soldiers. Lord Wolseley demands it, because large sums have been spent on the Navy. I should have thought that, if we are to have an invincible Navy, regardless of cost, this is a reason for not spending additional money on the Army. Still, of course, we must do the latter if we are to keep a British garrison in Egypt—to provide troops to conquer the Soudan—and yet to have a sufficiency of men to indulge in further aggressive follies. Lord Lansdowne is entirely under the thumb of Lord Wolseley. Whatever Lord Wolseley demands Lord Lansdowne supports. I do not blame Lord Wolseley; he is a soldier, and nothing but a soldier. He looks at everything from a soldier's standpoint. Why we have a civilian as Minister of War is, that he should resist increased expenditure suggested by soldiers; and that he may be able to do so is why Lord Beaconsfield laid it down that the Minister of War ought always to be in the House of Commons.

An Indian contemporary has the following:—

> The 4th Hussars have, it is said, leased Mulberry for two years from Captain Firman, and the regiment intend to race on a large scale.

I take the earliest opportunity of warning any who may be tempted to bet on horses run by this historic regiment, to make sure that the horses that go to the post are really the horses that appear on the card. Otherwise, backers may find that an outsider quoted at six to one is really a recent Derby winner, running in the outsider's name by a private family arrangement among the officers of the regiment.

A complaint comes from the Depot of the Royal Marines at Walmer respecting the erratic way in which the N.C.O.s are classified as "Very good" or "Good" in the periodical assessment of their character and abilities. As the facts dealt with took place a year ago, it hardly seems worth while to go into the cases now; but it always seems to me that, whether in the Marines, or the Army, or anywhere else, the system of classifying characters in this particular way is unsatisfactory. The truth is, of course, that the only good character is "Very good." "Good" really means that a man's conduct has not been very good, or that it has been good with a qualification or exceptions. The man thus classified has in fact only a second-class character. Now an officer does not always appreciate this when he marks a man as "good." It sounds a nice complimentary epithet, which no one can quarrel with, and it is apt to be doled out without a clear perception that it really places the recipient under a stigma. It would be better to classify conduct as "first class" or "second class;" and if this were done, I fancy that a great many men would rank as first class who are now let down into the second by this compromising term "Good."

Here is a subaltern's grievance that is well deserving the attention of the military authorities. An infantry subaltern goes on duty as galloper or orderly officer during manœuvres, each General being allowed one officer in such capacities. He brings his own horse. He has to provide himself with riding-breeches and various incidental accoutrements and equipment. All he gets in return is forage allowance and his expenses to and from Aldershot. He receives no extra pay for his special duty, no compensation for the extra kit he has to buy or for the use of his horse. On all these points he clearly has a strong claim to the benevolent consideration of his Government.

By the way, it is high time that some notice was taken of the claims of subalterns to extra pay when placed for long periods in command of companies, in the absence of senior officers. This is a matter which has frequently been noticed in Truth. It is no uncommon thing—especially when a captain is away at the Staff College, in which case he is by regulation not seconded—for a subaltern to be commanding a company for a year or two at a time. He does the captain's work and bears all his responsibility, and he ought to have the pay.

From the 1st Battalion Leinster Regiment I have received some further light, interesting in its way, on the question of the sergeants' mess caterership, which came under notice in Truth the other day. To begin with, I am told that the proposal for the appointment of a married sergeant as caterer did not even find a seconder at the meeting. If this is correct, it certainly absolves the sergeant-major of all blame. As to the objection to married N.C.O.'s, it is stated that, in consequence of the conspicuous failure of two married sergeants in this post some years ago, the C.O. decided not to have any more married men as caterers. Judging from what is said to have happened at the recent mess meeting, the C.O.'s opinion is cordially endorsed by the vast majority of the mess.

My present informant states that "it is pretty well known throughout the Service that married sergeants do not make the best caterers." Is it? I am always desirous of acquiring information on military matters, and I should very much like to know whether this is the case, and why it is so. Primâ facie a married man ought to have the advantage in such work over a bachelor. But perhaps the married sergeant's mind is apt to be too much absorbed in the business of catering for his own family.

Reference was made in Truth a few weeks back to the block of promotion in the higher ranks of the Transport branch of the Army Service Corps, which is preventing men in that branch obtaining warrant rank and depriving them of all chance of commissions, while others, far junior to them in the Supply branch, are continually passing over their heads. One of the sufferers has since pointed out that, a few years ago, things were the other way about, and in 1887 the disparity was redressed by transferring some of the Supply N.C.O.s to the Transport. Why should not the reverse process be adopted now?

It is an astonishing thing to learn that there exists any grievance of the Army Pay Corps that has not been ventilated in Truth. Such, however, appears to be the case. The Army Estimates, in making provision for gratuities for meritorious service, enumerate the various corps for the benefit of which the money has been allotted, but for some reason the Army Pay Corps is not among them. At the present moment there are at least two men in the corps who have been recommended for such gratuities, and they have received formal notice that their claims will be considered. How the War Office is going to grant them annuities when Parliament has provided no funds for the purpose I do not know, and if either of the men referred to could get a reasonable offer in cash down for his prospective annuity, I should strongly recommend him to take it. Possibly the omission of the Army Pay Corps in the Estimates is merely an accident. If so, it ought to be put right next Session.

By the blundering perversity which now seems to be the rule in this matter, the 1st Worcestershire Regiment, on their return home from the scorching heat of Aden, are quartered in the most bleak and exposed of the outlying forts around Plymouth. As if this were not bad enough, the sufferings of the women and children (not to mention the men) from cold have been intensely aggravated by the scarcity of coal. At Fort Tregantle barely enough fuel is issued to keep the fires going half the week (though there is plenty of coal in store), and at Scraesdon Fort last week the women were seen wrapping their babies in shawls, cloaks, and other garments of their own, which they could ill afford to spare. No blame attaches to the Commanding Officer for this state of things; on the contrary, a report on the subject having been made to him the other day, he gave express orders that more coal should be issued. The order, however, has been disregarded, for reasons which will be guessed by those who remember the recent articles in Truth on the Army coal trade. I would respectfully suggest to the Colonel that he should look a little further into this matter.

There is no more glaring instance of the mutton-headed obstinacy of Government departments than this practice of sending regiments fresh from the tropics into winter quarters in the Plymouth and Portsmouth forts. If the folly and cruelty of it required demonstration, the results have demonstrated them again and again. There is not a man at the War Office, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, who could defend the practice; but simply because it has been the practice in the past it will continue to be the practice in the future, until pressure from outside the War Office compels a reform. I trust that the requisite pressure may be speedily applied.

"Madge" advises, buy your Xmas Gloves, Veils, Handkerchiefs, &c., at Lee's, Wigmore-street. The Sale is now on. The best and most fashionable at low prices.

Some time ago attention was called in TRUTH to the insufficient provision for the baggage of soldiers with families in the military regulations dealing with this subject. It is now my agreeable duty on behalf of Mrs. Thomas Atkins to thank the authorities for having increased the allowance by one hundredweight in the revised regulations. This emboldens me to put forward another little suggestion. The concession which the railway companies were induced to make a few years ago, in the matter of return tickets for soldiers going on furlough, is at present deprived of half its value when a man is visiting one or two places and returning by a different route. When a soldier has a month or six weeks' leave he does not usually spend it all at one place. Why not give him the same reduction on a single ticket out by one line and a single ticket back by another that he is allowed at present on a return ticket?

An artilleryman at Gibraltar inquires why furloughs should only be granted at that station to men who have completed at least three years' service abroad, while at Malta there is no such restriction. At a guess, I should say that the difference is due to pure caprice, and has nothing in the nature of a reason to justify it. But if any rational answer can be given to the question, I shall be pleased to make a note of it.

From time to time a good many complaints have reached TRUTH office about the arrangements under which shirts are made by soldiers' wives. One of the latest of these comes from Normanton, where the regulation price of 8½d. per shirt is reduced to 7½d., the explanation of the deduction being that it is a payment towards the cost of warming the workroom. As this means a charge of about 4d. per week against each woman, the amount seems excessive. Another matter deserving attention is the allowance of ½d. per shirt made to the sergeant-major's wife for folding the work before it is issued to the women. Not only does this mean that the folder is paid very much higher than any of the workwomen, but the fact is, I believe, that the folding is not really done by the lady in question, but by a fatigue party which attends to the cleaning of the room. These are samples of complaints which are continually coming from one place or another, and there certainly seems to be room for improvement in the present arrangements.

A Board duly assembled at Wellington Barracks, Dublin, last week to inquire how a lance-corporal of the Dublin Light Infantry contracted enteric fever. I wonder what the Board discovered by means of its deliberations. From thirty to forty such Boards must have assembled, investigated, and reported in the last twelve months, and a complete record of their proceedings would make an invaluable chapter in the history of red-tape. Meanwhile, of course, enteric fever continues to flourish with unabated energy, and will doubtless afford employment for Boards and undertakers for an indefinite period to come.

Not only is it in the Army that vigorous steps are being taken (chiefly in the tailoring line) to prepare for any political complications that may arise. Our Naval authorities are equally on the alert. Look at this:—

Moustaches.

"Centurion," at Nagasaki, October 14, 1896.

General Memorandum No. 75.

Having observed that moustaches are in some cases worn very much out of proportion to the length of the beard, I request Commanding Officers will see that the spirit of the Instructions on the subject is adhered to.

ALEX. BULLER, Vice-Admiral.

To the Rear-Admiral, the Commodore, and the respective Captains, Commanders, and Officers Commanding her Majesty's Ships and Vessels employed on the China Station.

There may be difficulty about manning many of the innumerable ships we are now completing, but it is a comfort to know that the men we have will be equipped with beards and moustaches of the right relative length when the hour of danger arrives.

It is reported that the Duke of York will be promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral on January 1, when there is to be a huge batch of New Year honours. If this is correct, the Duke will jump over the heads of considerably more than a hundred captains senior to himself, most of whom entered the Navy many years before H.R.H. was born! As a matter of fact, however, the promotion of the Duke of York has been unprecedentedly rapid from first to last. He was a sub-lieutenant for only sixteen months, although the rule is for at least four years to elapse before there is promotion from this rank. The Duke remained a Lieutenant for six years, and then he became a Commander, the average period for officers to pass in the lower rank being at least twelve years. Finally, H.R.H. was made a Captain in less than eighteen months, in absolute defiance of the regulation which forbids the posting of a Commander until he has served for at least seven years in the lower rank. It is a flagrant fact that whenever Princes enter either the Army or the Navy all Service rules are deliberately ignored in order to facilitate their speedy and repeated promotion. The worst feature is that this scandalous and sycophantic favouritism is practised at the expense of other officers.

A certain Norwegian skipper whose vessel was in Aberdeen Docks the other day must have left these shores with the conviction that, despite our boasts about our freedom, we are a desperately police-ridden people. The captain in question, who is also the owner of his ship, was accompanied on his voyage by his wife. They were peacefully sleeping in their cabin one night when they were aroused by two policemen, who demanded instant admittance, threatening to burst open the door, if it was not unlocked. The captain let them enter under protest, and after closely inspecting the cabin and flashing a "bull's-eye" lantern on the lady they departed. Through the intervention of the Norwegian Consul, an apology was offered for this impudent and unwarrantable intrusion; but it is explained in a local paper that the constables at the Docks have the right of thus searching vessels for the purpose of putting down improper practices. Is this so? Such a system of police espionage would not be tolerated for a moment on shore, and it is astonishing that mariners submit to it.

Here is a pretty piece of official iniquity—this time from the Colonial Office. In Ceylon there is established a Civil Service Widows' Pension Fund, formed by a 4 per cent. tax on the salaries and pensions of Civil Servants. The salaries and pensions of Civil Servants are, of course, paid in rupees, and the widows' pensions out of the said fund are paid in rupees also. But when the tax is deducted from the pension of a retired Civil Servant, it is calculated, by express order of the Colonial Office, at the rate of 1s. 10½d. per rupee. This, in itself, is a monstrous piece of extortion, but it becomes downright robbery if, as I am informed by the highest authority, the tax is only paid into the Pension Fund in rupees at the current rate of exchange. One retired Ceylon official, for instance, is paying Rs. 1,000 per annum to the fund—having elected, as every man is entitled to do, to continue paying after his retirement at the same rate as before. The Crown Agents, under the orders of the Colonial Office, make from his pension a deduction of £93. 17s. At the present rate of exchange Rs. 1,000 are equal to £62. 10s., so that there is a mysterious disappearance of over £31 per annum on this one gentleman's contribution. What is the amount netted on all the contributions treated in the same way, and where does it go to? I commend the question to the attention of Mr. Chamberlain, who is just the man to ferret out an answer to it.

There has been an agitation among the superintendents of the Indian Post Office for better pay, but the Government declines to do anything, owing, it is said, to "financial depression." More weight might be attached to this stock excuse, were it not seen that financial depression never stands in the way of increases for the higher-placed officials. Hitherto, for instance, the pay of a Postmaster-General has been limited to Rs. 2,000 per month, but now the stipend for one of these berths (all of which are occupied by members of the Indian Civil Service) has been raised to Rs. 2,500 per month. Again, the Comptrollership has been filled by an accountant from the Finance Department at a salary of Rs. 1,200 per month, but it is understood that when this post shortly becomes vacant, an official who is a member of the Indian Civil Service is to be appointed to it and the pay increased to Rs. 2,000 per month. However much cheese-paring may be practised in other directions, it is evident that the exigencies of Indian finance are not allowed to interfere with the working of the familiar official rule, "To him that hath, &c."

By the way, I still hear complaints with regard to promotions to the rank of Superintendent in the Indian Post-office. The rules prescribe that an examination shall be passed for these appointments, but, nevertheless, the claims of candidates who have passed are set aside in favour of others who have not so qualified, but who possess influence at headquarters.

For a member of a body entrusted with "judicial functions" to adjudicate upon his own case is so manifestly unfair and irregular, that one would think no man with any sense of self-respect would venture to do such a thing. This, however, is what Mr. Edward Jones, Chairman of the Oswestry Incorporation Assessment Committee, has been doing; and he declares that he would do so a hundred times over in similar circumstances. The circumstances were whether Mr. Jones should get the benefit of the Agricultural Rating Act for certain land of his. The Surveyor of Taxes objected to his doing so on the ground that it was not agricultural land, and in Mr. Jones's absence the Committee supported the objection. At an adjourned meeting, however, Mr. Jones insisted upon his and other similar cases being reconsidered, and, on a division being taken in regard to his own land, he voted in favour of its being entered, for the purpose of the Act, as agricultural land. The votes were equal—four on each side—and Mr. Jones, as Chairman, thereupon gave a casting-vote against the objection, and declared that it was disallowed, thus securing for himself the relief from the rates which the Act affords.

It is distinctly laid down in the regulations of the Local Government Board that, in these matters, the Assessment Committee has to "exercise judicial functions, and due care must be observed in the discharge of this duty." Mr. Jones's votes were a gross abuse of his "judicial functions;" yet, when the question was brought before the Board, they professed their inability to offer any advice or assistance. What in the name of common sense is the use of issuing such a regulation unless there is some means of enforcing it?

Apropos of the above case, I may mention a complaint from Bristol respecting the practice of members of the Town Council voting upon matters in which they are pecuniarily interested. My correspondent particularly refers to a recent division with regard to a railway extension scheme, in which shareholders in the railway company and other directly interested parties voted; and to a second instance of a similar character last week, when a director and shareholders of the tramways company voted against a proposal affecting that concern. On the latter occasion the Mayor explained that the matter must be left to the "good taste" of the gentlemen concerned, and the Town Clerk added that they incurred no penalty by voting. "Good taste" does not prevent such votes being given, but a penalty would, and the law should be altered to provide one.

The Cheltenham Guardians appear to be among those who impose religious tests on candidates for employment as workhouse nurses. They have just rejected a candidate solely because she is a Roman Catholic, and they appear to think that they are justified in insisting upon a Protestant by the fact that most of the inmates are Protestants. Rubbish! I am no advocate for inconsiderate treatment of paupers, but it is absurd to suggest that any sick person—pauper or millionaire—can be in any way inconvenienced by being tended by a nurse of a different religious denomination from his own. Of the hundreds of nurses engaged every day for work in private houses, is a single one catechised about her religious belief before she is engaged? I doubt it. Have the Cheltenham paupers ever expressed a desire for a Protestant nurse rather than a Roman Catholic one? I doubt it. Still more do I doubt whether, had such an objection been expressed, the Guardians would have deemed it worth consideration. The only motive for the action of these worthies is their own sectarian bigotry.

There is a boy in the Ormskirk Workhouse who has the misfortune to be entered in the books of the union as a member of the Church of England. I consider it is distinctly a misfortune in his case because, but for this fact, he would now have been taken from the workhouse and adopted by a market gardener living in the district. It seems that the market gardener is a Wesleyan, and on being asked by the Guardians whether he would allow the child to go to church he replied that he would give him his choice, but that he would naturally prefer to take the lad with him to chapel. To safeguard the little pauper Churchman from this awful sin of going to chapel was, to the minds of the bigoted majority of the Board, infinitely more important than to provide him with a good home and a fair start in life, and so it was resolved that he should remain in the workhouse.

It takes between three and four months for the simplest little seed to fructify in the minds of the Wem Guardians. I speak with authority. On August 20 I myself sowed a little seed in this somewhat stony soil. It was in the shape of a paragraph commenting upon certain figures in the half-yearly financial statement of the Union, and more particularly upon the fact that five workhouse officers were credited with the consumption of 783 lb. of meat, while seventy-two paupers had to be content with only 1,090 lb., and that, too, of inferior quality. Not until their last meeting, a week or so ago, did this criticism bear fruit in a discussion at the meeting of the Guardians, though according to one of their number many of the ratepayers have been "making remarks" on the subject. The only statement I am concerned to notice is one to the effect that the seventy-two paupers spoken of were really "something like fifty-two." If that be so, the mistake was due to the misleading form of the official statement from which my figures were taken. But even taking the number of pauper inmates of the workhouse at fifty-two, the accounts would still suggest either that they get too little to eat or else that the five officers get too much. About the beginning of next April I shall expect to hear what more the Guardians have to say on the subject.

Jones's Charity at Monmouth appears to be one of the numerous cases in which money bequeathed primarily for the benefit of the poor is now chiefly devoted to the education of children of the well-to-do classes. The revenue of the charity, which is mainly derived from property in London, has vastly increased during recent years, and I gather from the papers on the subject that have been sent to me that an agitation has been going on at Monmouth in favour of applying part at least of the next surplus to the erection of additional almshouses and an orphanage. The poor certainly have a strong claim in the matter, and it is to be hoped this proposal will be carefully and sympathetically considered by those in authority before they decide upon the adoption of a further scheme for handing the money over to the County Council for the purpose of intermediate education.

In one of the Unions in Pembrokeshire it is the custom of the Board of Guardians to give outdoor relief, not in cash, but in the form of an order on a shopkeeper for the amount of the weekly allowance. Whether this is a common practice I do not know for certain, but I rather think the usual arrangement is for the recipients of such relief to have so much bread and so much money per week, the spending of the latter being left to their own discretion. No doubt the object of the system in the Pembrokeshire Union is to ensure that the outdoor paupers' dole shall be used to the best advantage. But, as a correspondent who has written to me on the matter points out, the shopkeeper on whom the orders are issued is under a strong temptation to foist inferior articles on such customers, and, unless the Guardians are in the happy position of dealing only with immaculate tradespeople, it is extremely probable that this is done. The result is that the paupers may be far worse off than if they were permitted to buy their provisions where they pleased.

The Local Government Board will do well to institute a rigorous investigation into the sanitary condition of Kingsbridge Workhouse. The medical officer has reported that the water supply is altogether inadequate, while there is not a single trap of modern type, and the existing state of matters is "a great source of danger to all concerned."

The Helmsley Bumbles again! At their last meeting the Medical Officer drew attention to the necessity of replacing the old drains in Bridge-street by new ones. These old drains, he said, were utterly useless—"jump-jointed" pipes, worse than no sewer at all, as all the fluid portion of the sewage passed through the joints and saturated the soil, while the solid matter remained in the pipes, forming a bed for the incubation of typhoid and other germs. As to the fall, the old sewage system was "more like a switchback than anything else." Any ordinary sanitary authority would have been alarmed by such statements, but not so the Helmsley District Council, who simply resolved to let the report "lie on the table." The state of things described by their medical officer has been brought to their notice time after time, and months ago they promised the Local Government Board to remedy it "as soon as practicable." But nothing has been done, and nothing will be done, until they are absolutely forced into action, the one idea of Lord Feversham and his colleagues (most of them also his tenants) being to keep down the rates. How much longer are they to be allowed to have their own pig-headed way in this and the various other matters on which they have so long set the Local Government Board at defiance?

To judge from their bully-ragging of the workhouse chaplain and boycotting of a local newspaper, the Medway Guardians must be a particularly insolent and overbearing set of jacks-in-office. The bother arose out of a report which the chaplain had presented with regard to the unwholesome and demoralising conditions under which the children in the workhouse are being brought up. Without troubling to consider whether his statements were true or not, the Guardians passed a resolution censuring the chaplain for "exceeding his duty," and when the reverend gentleman subsequently showed that the orders of the Local Government Board authorised him to make such a report, some of the members stormed and raved at him as though he had been a pauper. As for the newspaper, it actually had the audacity to publish the chaplain's report, and for this high crime the Guardians decided to deprive it of its share of the official advertisements, and to exclude its reporter from the meetings of the Board for the next three months. The ratepayers of the Medway Union must be humiliated indeed when they see what sort of men they have chosen as their representatives.

Taunton has been greatly agitated over a question as to the precise position which a cabman's shelter shall occupy on the Parade. The subscribers to the shelter and the cabmen themselves naturally wish the structure to be near the cab-stand; but a body called the Market Trustees has insisted upon placing it some distance away, where it is utterly useless to the cabbies. One wet day last week, the latter, exasperated by this absurd arrangement, marched in force to the shelter, hauled it to the cab-stand, and quartered themselves in it for the evening. Next morning, however, the shelter had disappeared, and it was ultimately found that it had been removed in the night to the "pound," where it has since remained. All this seems a huge joke, but it is one which is not very creditable to the authorities.

Apropos of what has been said in Truth on the barrel-organ question, I have been favoured with some interesting particulars of a movement at Bournemouth for the suppression or mitigation of street noises. A resident at Boscombe, having succeeded in getting an order stopping barrel-organs from playing outside the Public Reading-room, was encouraged to get up a memorial to the Town Council, influentially signed, praying for restrictions on the shouting of newsboys, the blowing of coach-horns, &c. A sub-committee of the Council to which the matter was referred proposed a by-law on the subject, in similar terms to one in force at Cambridge, but after a long discussion the proposal was defeated by two votes. This strikes me as another strong proof of the thickness of municipal heads at Bournemouth, for there is hardly a town in the kingdom where a regulation of this kind would be more conducive to the welfare of the place. By the way, I should like to know more of the Cambridge by-law above referred to. Why should not sauce for Cambridge be sauce for London?

Some of the inhabitants of Pirbright, assisted by men imported for the occasion from other parishes, have just shown their servility to the Grand Panjandrum of the district in a fashion which few rural communities would, I hope, care to emulate. Lord Pirbright some time ago enclosed a piece of waste land, putting up a fence which obstructed a public footpath. The enclosure passed without objection, but the Guildford Rural District Council have successfully fought for the preservation of the right of way, and in this struggle the representative of Pirbright, Mr. R. D. Mangles, has taken a leading part. His action was naturally displeasing to Lord Pirbright, and, as a consequence, all the toadies of that magnate were eager to show that they also were displeased. To enable them to do this, a meeting was held, attended by the noble lord and packed with his partisans from the parish and the neighbourhood; and, after jeering and howling at the District Councillor in the most disgraceful way, a resolution was passed strongly condemning his action. It is not pleasant to see a man who has championed a public right treated in this manner, but in such cases virtue is its own reward. The free use of the footpath has been maintained, and that, after all, is the chief thing.

In the exercise of their judgment the Blandford Borough Justices recently dismissed a summons for alleged furious driving, which had been issued on the information of Major-General L. H. Denne. This decision, which seems from the report of the evidence to have been a very proper one, has had a curious and instructive sequel. The Chairman of the Bench on the occasion was the Mayor of Blandford. He is in business as a tailor in the town, and for ten years or more Major-General Denne has been one of his customers. A few days after the hearing of the case the Major-General called upon the Mayor, referred to the dismissal of the summons as a reflection upon his veracity, and asked that his account should be made out, as he would no longer deal with his worship. No one will question Major-General Denne's right to take his custom where he pleases; but every one is at liberty to form an opinion as to the reasonableness and propriety of his conduct towards this worthy tradesman. Mine is that it was both unreasonable and improper, and the fact that Major-General Denne is a magistrate himself makes his action all the more reprehensible. Of course he did not expect his patronage of the tailor to influence the Mayor; yet that is the unfortunate impression which his method of showing his resentment of the decision is likely to create in many minds.

There is much complaining, I hear, on the subject of judicial unpunctuality in the county courts in which his Honour Judge Lushington presides, more especially at Wandsworth. The list at this court is always heavy, usually containing five or six cases in which counsel are briefed; but his Honour rarely thinks it necessary to put in an appearance until 11.30 a.m., or even later. The result is that the jury summoned for 11.30 a.m. are kept waiting while the applications to the judge, which ought to be taken at 10.30, are being heard, innumerable unnecessary adjournments of cases are caused, and parties, witnesses, and lawyers are put to incalculable expense and inconvenience. The best remedy for this evil, as I have pointed out before, is that judges should be fined for unpunctuality. There should be a scale of progressive penalties for each minute a judge is late, and the fund thus raised should be applied in compensating the sufferers.

Concerning the political complexion of the county magistracy in Hampshire, a correspondent informs me that since Lord Northbrook became Lord Lieutenant he has nominated "three Radicals of the most sturdy type" in the Gosport division. It is also said that there is one magistrate of "Liberal proclivities" in the Aldershot district. I willingly place these appointments (which seem to have been made a considerable time ago) to Lord Northbrook's credit. But what are they among so many? It still remains true that the magistracy of the county is overwhelmingly, if not exclusively, Tory, and that gentlemen in every way qualified for the position are excluded from the Bench because they happen to be Radicals.

The result of some recent proceedings at Worship-street Police-court stands out in striking contrast to the case of Murray, the Hampstead constable, whose conviction for perjury I dealt with last week. A newsvendor, one Mahoney, was brought up at Worship-street on two charges of robbery from the person. The first charge was dismissed because, though a policeman swore that Mahoney was the thief, the prosecutor swore that he was not. The second charge resolved itself into one of highway robbery with violence. The robbery took place in Shoreditch on June 3, and it was witnessed by two detective officers, who swore that Mahoney, whom they knew, was one of the two culprits, and that they gave chase, but were unable to catch him. On this evidence Mahoney was remanded. It happened, however, that he was in a position to prove that, on June 3, he was in prison undergoing a sentence which did not expire till July 29. This was too strong an alibi for the police to contest, and on hearing of it they made haste to represent the facts to the magistrate, who thereupon took the unusual course of ordering Mahoney's discharge without having him brought back into court.

In the Hampstead case, Murray was convicted of perjury practically on the evidence of one man, who denied the charge which the constable had made against him. In Mahoney's case it was not a question of oath against oath, but of the absolutely conclusive evidence of the prison records and the prison officials that the detectives were wrong. Yet when an application was made for summonses against these officers for perjury, it was refused on the ground that there had been nothing more than a mistake—a mistake which, if Mahoney had not had the good luck to be in gaol last June, would probably have ended for him in a dose of the cat and a term of penal servitude. Anybody who has read a full report of Murray's trial at the Old Bailey will see that there were far better grounds for giving him the benefit of the doubt, and it is a travesty of justice that he should be serving nine months' hard labour while these two detectives are not even to be prosecuted. Still, the mere exposure of the latter's "mistake" will do some good if it only teaches magistrates (Mr. Newton particularly) the danger of placing too blind a faith in the infallibility of the police.

As to Murray's trial, I am told that a number of "absolutely untrue statements" have been made about the action of the magistrates, upon which the Common Serjeant waxed so wroth. This, however, is a side issue which it is hardly necessary to discuss now; whether it was well or ill founded, the Common Serjeant's outburst on the subject was calculated to influence the jury against the prisoner, though it really had nothing whatever to do with the question of his guilt or innocence. I understand that the memorial for his release is now under the consideration of the Home Secretary, and, judging from all that I have heard of the case, I doubt not that his reply will be favourable.

It is surely nothing less than a burlesque of justice to mete out the same punishment to the man who steals a hammer as to the man who is convicted of manslaughter on evidence which, in the opinion of the Judge, would have warranted the jury in returning a verdict of wilful murder. My Legal Pillory shows that this is what happened at Leeds Assizes last week, and in the same Court, also, a woman was awarded three years' penal servitude for the theft of a shawl worth ninepence. It is true that the thieves were old offenders, but after making reasonable allowance for that fact, the contrasted sentences still seem to me to exhibit an utter misconception of the relative heinousness of crimes against property and crimes against the person. Such samples of Judge's justice unfortunately have the mischievous effect of encouraging the magistracy in their monstrous system of punishing the offences of petty larceny, poaching, and vagrancy more severely than acts of brutality or cruelty:—

Leeds Assizes. Before Mr. Justice Grantham. John Winter, a rough-looking individual, known as "Black Jack," indicted for the wilful murder of an old man of sixty-seven, and convicted of manslaughter. The Judge said it was a very brutal case, and prisoner undoubtedly attempted to kill the deceased. The evidence in fact amounted to murder, and the jury would have been justified in finding him guilty on the capital charge; but they had very properly taken a lenient view. Five years' penal servitude.

Wakefield Police-court. John Burke charged with having been drunk and disorderly and assaulting George Clarke. Prisoner violently assaulted his wife, and on Clarke remonstrating prisoner kicked him several times. There were 27 previous convictions against the prisoner. Fined 12s. 6d. for the drunkenness and £1. 12s. 6d. for the assault.

Halifax Borough Police-court. John Peter Poulter, charged with cruelty to his child, aged 17 months. The baby toddled to its father, who knocked it down, and then picking it up threw it with much force into a chair, giving it a black eye and cutting its lip. Fined £2. 19s., including costs.

Marylebone Police-court. Before Mr. Rose. Robert John Rose, convicted of assaulting his wife. The woman, who appeared very weak and ill, said defendant frequently came home drunk and ill-treated her. As results of his cruelty and misconduct, she had had a tumour on her breast, and two of her children were born dead. On Sunday week he punched her about the head and body till she was black and blue. A policeman, who was called in, said he found blood-stains all over the front room and passage. Fined 40s., and ordered to pay his wife 15s. a week under a separation order.

Leeds Assizes. Before Mr. Justice Grantham. Patrick Higgins, pleaded guilty to stealing a hammer and a mallet. He seemed to have a special fancy for stealing hammers, his record of previous convictions including seven or eight for this offence. Five years' penal servitude.

Sarah Robinson, aged forty, pleaded guilty to stealing a shawl, value 9d. There were a number of previous convictions. Three years' penal servitude.

Ottery Police-court. Before Colonel Darnell, Mr. J. Y. Morshed, and Rev. F. B. Dickinson. George Cann, coachman, charged with stealing 40 lb. of coal belonging to his employer. Prosecutor did not wish to press the case as prisoner had a wife and six children. Fined £5, or one month.

Huntingdon Police-court. Before Lord Sandwich and Mr. J. S. Smith. Charles Jaggard and John Rowland, charged with stealing a pair of boots which were exposed for sale in the street. One month each.

Romsey Police-court. Before the Mayor, Alderman Osborne, and Mr. C. Medley. Sarah Powell, widow, charged with stealing a quantity of rags belonging to N. Hougnerz. Prosecutor had employed her as a rag-sorter; the work being done at her cottage. It was found she had stored in the cottage a large quantity of rags which she had accumulated during many years by keeping a few from each lot she sorted. The prosecutor said he would be willing to give her employment again at his stores. He urged the Bench to be lenient. Three months.

East Norton Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Palmer, Messrs. C. B. Fernie, W. H. Kendall, and T. Burton. Arthur Henry Turnbull, farmer, convicted of assaulting the Rev. W. Chippendall. Defendant violently assaulted complainant, holding him by the beard and punching him in the face. Both complainant's eyes were blackened, part of his beard was torn out, and a tooth was driven, he said, "right down his throat." Fined £2, including costs, the Chairman remarking that "the magistrates thought they ought to have imposed a heavier penalty."

Heywood Police-court. Before Mr. T. Mackison and other justices. Samuel Wolstenholme, summoned for cruelty to a horse by allowing it to be worked while in an unfit state. The horse was an aged animal, exceedingly lame, and in great pain. The tendons were badly contracted, and there was inflammation of the parts. Under the saddle was an old sore. Fined 5s. and costs.

Dorking Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Calvers and other magistrates. Mark Bacon, charged with working a horse in an unfit state, and Jesse Gatehouse, charged with causing it to be so worked. The animal was described as thin and emaciated, very weak, lame in the near hock, spavined, and, in fact, literally worn out. Fined 10s. each and costs.

Bromyard Petty Sessions. Before Captain Enderby, Messrs. Cresswell, Jenks, and McIntosh. Herbert Lewis and his wife, charged with stealing one piece of coal, valued at threepence. The coal was taken from the yard of a beerhouse where prisoners had been drinking. The woman pleaded guilty, but said her husband knew nothing about the theft. Seven days each.

Dunfermline Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Gillespie. John Muirhead, charged with poaching. Fined £4.

Bearsted Petty Sessions. Frederick Smith, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined £2, and 12s. 6d. costs.

Salford Hundred Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. W. Goldthorpe. Jane Hile, an elderly woman, pleaded guilty to stealing a shawl. Twelve months.

Kingsclere Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. Holding, E. H. Fox, and A. Southby, and Sir F. W. Carden. Charles Cross, charged with poaching. Two months.

At Larne Police-court the other day a tramp named M'Donald was charged with having been drunk and disorderly, and with having assaulted a constable; and on the evidence of the police the magistrates committed him for seven days' imprisonment for the first offence and two months for the second. So far as the charge of assault is concerned there is reason to believe that M'Donald was very unjustly punished. His arrest for drunkenness was witnessed by a number of people, and it is alleged that two policemen trailed him along the road by the arms almost the entire way, and that the only assault which he could be said to have committed was that he attempted to free himself from this brutal treatment. The crowd which gathered loudly protested against the conduct of the police, but were promptly driven away. If the magistrates who heard the case, Mr. A. Williams and Colonel M'Neill, would take the trouble to make a few independent inquiries, they would probably find that, in the matter of the assault, M'Donald was more sinned against than sinning.

They seem to manage swindlers better in Ireland than we do on this side of St. George's Channel. Mr. Fred. J. Mason, of Oswestry, who was last week convicted at Galway Assizes on various charges of fraud, and sentenced by Mr. Justice Holmes to three years' penal servitude, is a conspicuous example of this. This man, under the name of "Mason & Co.," was fully exposed in Truth a year or more ago, and I have from time to time repeated my warnings in the interval. The English police, however, did not feel called upon to interfere, and newspapers all over the country continued to publish Mason's advertisements. One of these advertisements met the eye of an intelligent officer in the Royal Irish Constabulary, who was also a reader of TRUTH. He answered the advertisement, and eventually, after much labour and difficulty, brought Mason to justice. Why cannot our police do a little business of this kind? Mason's particular "lay" was the "Home Employment" swindle. There are plenty still left at the game, and a perusal of the columns of TRUTH will quickly show where they are to be found.

Many curiosities of bankruptcy administration have been brought to light at one time and another, but I have come across nothing to compare with the case Re Robert Wilson, which was before Mr. Registrar Linklater one day last week. This bankruptcy commenced in the year 1811, and seems to have been jogging along placidly ever since. In the course of eighty-five years dividends of 19s. in the £ have been paid, and it was announced last week that further funds have come to hand, which will probably enable nearly another shilling in the £ to be paid. It will doubtless be a highly gratifying circumstance to the creditors who put Mr. Wilson into bankruptcy in 1811 when they finally receive their 20s. in the £, and one can easily understand the rapture with which the debtor will receive his long-deferred order of discharge. I trust he will find it useful, wherever he is. What I should chiefly like to know, however, is the exact amount that has been spent in the course of eighty-five years in realising and distributing Mr. Wilson's estate. The costs in Jarndyce v. Jarndyce would probably be insignificant by the side of this little bill.

It is satisfactory to know that some good results occasionally follow from the exposure in these columns of the area-gate touts who prey upon servant girls. A gentleman at Reigate, who had been reading TRUTH, recently found that an emissary of "Howard & Co." 611, Chiswick High-road, had left a watch and chain with one of his servants entirely against the girl's will, and that an invoice for £2. 8s. had been forwarded. The master had the watch valued, and found it to be worth about 12s. 6d., which I take to be the normal value of this class of goods. He then wrote to Howard & Co. that the watch must be taken away, that he declined to return it at his own or the girl's cost, and that he would not be responsible for it if not fetched within seven days. Howard & Co. at once climbed down, and forwarded 4½d. for the return of the watch. The old story!

Another example of this class of trade comes from the West End. On receiving a visit from a canvasser, who was endeavouring to sell a monthly issue of the plays of Shakespeare, a tradesman agreed to purchase one number, taking care to have a witness by him as he signed the order. In due course attempts were made to foist upon him other numbers. On his refusal to take them he received a printed letter from Mr. A. W. Cowan, of 30 and 31, New Bridge-street, E.C., beginning thus:—

SIR,—My deliverer informs me that you refuse to take in the plays of Shakespeare.

I beg to remind you that I hold your written order for this work until completed, and, having paid the canvasser his commission for obtaining it, your non-compliance will entail upon me a serious loss.

Under these circumstances, I must ask you to fulfil the order given.

The parts will be again forwarded you in the usual course.

Should you then refuse to receive them, I shall have no other alternative but that of suing you for goods tendered, &c.

The recipient of this letter replied that he could prove that he had not ordered the whole work, and that Mr. Cowan could sue him if he pleased. Mr. C. has not done so as yet. The curious point about this case is that the letter threatening proceedings is printed throughout, with the exception of the name of the work referred to. From this it would seem to be a regular incident in Mr. Cowan's business for people to disclaim having ordered his publications, and to be dealt with by this stereotyped threat of legal proceedings. I take it that it is an equally common incident that these threats come to nothing when the party threatened takes no notice of them.

Since writing the above, I have come across a still more remarkable curiosity of the book-canvassing trade. The principals in this instance are Messrs. Blackie & Son, Limited, of Liverpool. A canvasser from this firm called on a corporation official at a Midland town and solicited an order for an encyclopædia, representing that, in consideration of the appearance of the official's name on the list of subscribers, he would be allowed to take the work at 12s. per volume instead of one guinea—the price to undistinguished members of the public. After some consideration, the order was given on one of the usual forms. A day or two afterwards the first volume was delivered by another representative of Blackie & Son, when the purchaser discovered that 12s. per volume was the ordinary price to all sections of the public alike. He at once wrote to Messrs. Blackie & Son, repudiating the order. This was the reply:—

19, Islington, Liverpool, November 18, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—We have received your letter to-day, and in reply beg to point out to you that before we send out any parts or volumes of the Encyclopædia we print a prospectus of the same, and prepare a specimen so that intending purchasers may see for themselves and judge of the work before they order. Such a specimen Mr. Hy. Leese submitted to you, and in order to protect the public as well as ourselves against any mistake or wrong statement the traveller may make, who works on commission only, we print an order form as plain as possible, setting forth the number of volumes, price, &c. If after we have done this such a gentleman as yourself allows himself to be deceived, surely he ought not to throw the onus of the blame on us.

Under the circumstances we are unable to accept cancellation of your order, a copy of which is enclosed for perusal.—Yours truly, BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED.

This is about as cool a communication as I have ever come across. In plain English it comes to this: "We employ a canvasser on commission. We take sundry precautions to prevent his swindling the public in our name. In spite of our precautions, he has swindled you in our name. If you are such a fool as to be swindled, you must take the consequences. We intend to avail ourselves of our agent's superior intelligence, and hold you to the contract which you have been swindled into signing." I am told that Messrs. Blackie & Son are a highly respectable firm. They need be.

About this time last year, comment appeared in TRUTH upon a circular issued by Messrs. Batey & Co., of Munster-road, Fulham, suggesting to their customers that instead of tipping Messrs. Batey & Co.'s employees individually at Christmas they should forward their offerings to Batey & Co. themselves, who would see that they were properly distributed. I see now that Messrs. Batey & Co. have been advertising for a clerk, who must be a married man, and who is offered the magnificent stipend of 25s. a week. Presumably the advertisers consider that it would be impossible to get a competent and trustworthy man at such a miserable price, unless he were some improvident clerk who has given hostages to fortune in the shape of a wife and children. However, I trust that I shall soon see Messrs. Batey & Co. whipping up their customers again for further Christmas boxes for the staff; for if this firm cannot pay their clerks more liberally themselves, the least they can do is to try and get something for them out of their customers.

Here is a little matter which an anxious parent asks me to bring to the notice of the Edinburgh Evening Despatch. As part of a weekly column or so of college notes and news, with which that paper specially appeals to the local student community, it conspicuously prints an advertisement informing the same class of readers where they can raise money on the security of books, surgical dressing-cases, watches, &c. The young men at Edinburgh University are fortunate if they have no more insidious and baneful temptation than this placed in their way; but still that is no reason why a respectable journal should spread such a net for spendthrifts.

One John Thompson, "phrenologist, hygienist, and publisher," of Broughton House, South Cliff, Scarborough, has fairly beaten all records in the use of religious cant for commercial purposes. In a circular headed "Christmas Presents" Thompson begins:—

Dear Madam,—We are approaching a season of the year which Christian nations celebrate as the anniversary of the birth of Christ. What a travesty on the life and labours of Christ that people who profess to be His followers should spend this season in eating, drinking, balls, and spending time and money in things that gratify the lusts of the flesh, and that blunt or destroy the finer aspirations of the soul. It would be more becoming if people would do something to improve their minds, morals, and bodies. There will be much killing of oxen, geese, turkeys, ducks, &c., to feast the stomach. There will be presents of wine and other "good things" for the body, but not a thought for the mind—not a thing for the soul that Christ lived and died for. Few people will make presents of books to elevate, improve, instruct, warn, or help the immortal part of man. . . ."

Thompson then calls attention to the merits of his own publications from this point of view. And the beauty of it is that several of these works, judging from their titles, would provide precisely the sort of moral elevation for which you would generally look in Holywell-street.

I wonder whether the progress of education will ever result in enlightening the "lower orders" of the public as to the humbug of "clairvoyance." A "prodigious sensation" is reported to have been created in Cambridgeshire by the performances of a "Mrs. Rochelle," who is travelling about with her husband and a miscellaneous musical and conjuring entertainment. Not only have a large number of bumpkins become persuaded that this lady is the possessor of "occult" gifts, but the editor of one of the local papers seems to have been either taken in or to have been conspiring with the showman to mystify his readers. A Mr. R. F. Bertolle, of March, writes a letter to the Press informing the public that he "has investigated clairvoyance with a keen interest for many years, ... and knows the power to be a positive fact." I could truthfully say as much as this myself. No great amount of investigation is needed to discover that the power in question—the power of imposing upon fools—is not only a "positive fact," but one of the greatest factors in the course of human affairs.

George Thomas is a new acquaintance among money-lenders, but he is evidently entitled to a prominent place in my gallery of extortioners. Thomas recently sued a brewery labourer named Kelcey, in the Burton-on-Trent County Court, for £13. 10s., and it appeared that the defendant had borrowed £10 on the understanding that he was to pay back £11 at the end of three months. Thomas, however, induced him to sign a second promissory note, which he substituted for the original one, and Kelcey afterwards found that under this document he was required to pay back £13. 10s. "on demand," so that if the usurer had called for his money next day the interest would have been at the rate of something like 13,000 per cent. per annum. As it was, reckoning from the date of the loan to that of the demand for repayment, the rate was 1,000 per cent. It is satisfactory to record that the blood-sucker did not get even this, the Judge giving judgment for the defendant.

The following seasonable announcement appears in the Exchange and Mart. For aught I know the property may be, as stated, "a bargain," but a man who could derive satisfaction from a bargain in this line must be of a somewhat sombre turn of mind—unless, of course, he were contemplating homicide on a large scale:—

BARGAIN.—Lady leaving England permanently must sell family grave, hold five, marble slab. Meredith, &c.

The day on which the law allowed motor carriages to use the public roads was, we were told by the Press, to mark an epoch, and much ink was wasted in describing the thousands of these carriages that would at once fill the public thoroughfares. I saw on that epoch-making day a file of the most ramshackle conveyances, either emitting smoke or stink, pass over Westminster Bridge under the guidance of the Mr. Lawson, who has since asked the public to give him and his friends three millions for some patents in connection with them. I have since then seen one motor omnibus stuck fast in Whitehall, and two engines drawing trucks very slowly. When are we to have motor omnibuses, motor carriages, and motor cabs? I had imagined, in my ignorant credulity, that they were impatiently panting to issue from their coachhouses on the day that the law gave them a right of way.

No man ought to be punished on account of his opinions. For the London and North-Western Railway Company to have asked its employees, who are members of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, whether they would obey the orders of their society, if called upon to strike, and to turn them off because they replied that they would, was one of the most monstrous acts of injustice ever perpetrated by a railway Board. The society had demanded certain alterations in hours of labour and wage. There was no evidence that a strike was even contemplated. But to act on the principle that no employee of a railroad is under any circumstances to join in a strike ordered by his union, is to attack the principle of unionism, for this principle involves the right to strike under grievances that the employers decline to remedy. Far more simple would it have been for the North-Western Directors to announce that no man in their employ could be allowed to join a union. I am glad that the North-Western Board have seen the error of their ways, and have agreed to reinstate the discharged men, as a preliminary to discussion.

The Midland Railway Company have just given a further example of what can be done to make railway travelling a luxury by constructing new first-class dining carriages, fitted with every convenience that could be expected in a first-class hotel or restaurant. These cars are to run regularly between London and Manchester, and they will be a blessing both to those who object to sacrificed business to dinner, and those who object to sacrifice dinner to business.

A correspondent, who has been reading Sir Harry Johnston's somewhat paradoxical speech at the Colonial Institute last week, sends me the following metrical comments upon it:—

THE BLESSINGS OF CIVILISATION.

Sir Harry Johnston, K.C.B.,
On one point holds a view most curious:
Free-trade in spirits, he asserts,
Is not 'mongst native tribes injurious.
To importation stop, says he,
Confers of benefit no particle,
For black-men, barred from British brands,
Drink an inferior home-made article.

Therefore, he argues, in effect,
Since native brews make Fuzzy sicker,
He'd better far, when he imbibes,
Get drunk on well-made British liquor.
For then, when quickly he succumbs,
He has at least the satisfaction
Of knowing he's helped British trade
By his inebriative action.

Alas! though, Fuzzy little thinks
(So great his mental obfuscation),
How much, in many other ways,
He owes to British occupation.
But for our pure philanthropy,
Which him in closer quarters squeezes,
He'd never have the chance to die
Of first-class civilised diseases.

But for our aid he might be doomed
On patriarchal age to border,
And then—the pity of it!—sink
'Neath some low, native-born disorder.
Whereas—unless he leads a life
Of isolation, like a weasel's—
He's now a chance to die at once,
As we do, of small-pox or measles!

Again, when formerly he fought,
His fate was one our souls to harrow;
For he was roughly assegaied,
Or wounded by some clumsy arrow;
But now should he attempt to fight,
When unremorselessly we tax him,
He's killed in scientific style
By a "Lee-Metford" or a "Maxim"!

So Fuzzy, though he knows it not,
Should raise his voice in acclamation,
And bless the gods for their great gift—
The gift of British occupation:
For thanks to that, on this at least,
He now may reckon most securely;
His death will be quite "up to date,"
Although it happens prematurely!

The Liberal Party is on its very last legs. Mr. Guthrie has announced that one of his reasons for not coming forward as a candidate in Forfarshire is, that Lord Rosebery has resigned the Leadership of the Liberal Party, but, he adds, that if his Lordship would again agree to become Leader, then Forfarshire might possibly be privileged to elect Mr. Guthrie as its member. The loss of Mr. Guthrie, as a Liberal candidate, is so very serious a matter to the Liberal Party, that I really think that we ought to consider the expediency of entrusting him with the duty of selecting the Peer to lead us who finds favour in his eyes, if only on these terms we can hope that he will consent to enter Parliament. Some people, however, will be inclined to ask who Mr. Guthrie is? As a politician he is absolutely unknown. He did get in once for a Northamptonshire constituency, but he lost his seat at the last General Election. He seemed an amiable and harmless young gentleman, but as a candidate he did not strike me as endowed with such exceptional excellences as to render his loss to his Party a matter of vital importance.

All the noble army of cadgers who masquerade as Radicals with a view to being rewarded by their grateful Leader with a peerage or a baronetcy, are fanatically attached to the Peer Premier heresy. They have money, and if they spend it, they look forward to their outlay being blessed to them. As they usually are political incapables it would be almost impossible to bestow upon them the smallest official position, but any moneyed fool is clever enough to be converted into an hereditary legislator or a baronet.

We have often come forward to relieve distress in foreign countries, and no foreigner has ever questioned our philanthropic intent. A meanness of this character has been reserved for our own Jingoes. Corn has been purchased in Russia by public subscription to feed those suffering from the famine in India, and the Russian Government has undertaken to forward it free of cost to its destination. Our Jingo organs, instead of expressing their gratitude, assert that they feel "uneasy" at the effect on India of natives being saved from starvation by Russia! It would seem, therefore, according to them, that rather than allow our Indian fellow-subjects to be fed by Russia we ought to leave them to die.

I shall be very curious to see what form the advance to the Egyptian Government will take when it is submitted for approval to the House of Commons. It is difficult to contest the legality of the decision which orders restitution of the £500,000 abstracted from the reserve funds of the Caisse de la Dette. When a composition was made between Egypt and her creditors, the latter agreed to a reduction in their interest on the ground, that certain specified revenues should be handed over to an International Commission for the payment of interest and liquidation of the debt by a sinking fund; all surplus funds coming in any year from these hypothecated revenues being set aside to meet possible deficiency for interest and sinking fund in any subsequent year. As the International Commissioners are in the nature of trustees, it is clear that it requires the consent of all of them to agree to any portion of the accrued surplus being devoted to the conquest of the Soudan; and even were they to grant this request, they would be untrue to their trust. By the terms of the composition, Egypt is precluded from making any new loans. The only way in which she could make herself liable for the £500,000 advanced by us would be by a very strained interpretation of the right that she has to float £1,000,000 of Treasury Bills; for certainly this right was not intended to cover the advance of a loan of £500,000 by a foreign Power. But assuming that she can issue this loan, how are the further advances to be met that will be needed if the conquest of the Soudan is to be continued?

No aperient water can boast of such sure and beneficial purgative efficacy as the "Franz Josef." It was known on the Continent 20 years ago, and is now sold everywhere.—Head office, Budapest.

SCRUTATOR.

A BRAHMIN ON DUAL LEADERSHIP.

I AM an admirer of Sir Henry Fowler—up to a point. He is not precisely what I should call a Radical, but, as Secretary for India, he showed himself an able administrator, and his speeches are always clear and incisive. Addressing a Wolverhampton audience last week he professed a love and admiration for Lord Rosebery of a very effusive description; but what, it would seem, particularly excites these feelings in his breast is, I gather, that his Lordship chivalrously and patriotically proclaimed, by his resignation of the Leadership of the Liberal Party, his disagreement with Mr. Gladstone's suggested mode of dealing with the Sultan. Sir William Fowler then went on to deduce, from the story of the differences between Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston, that it is somewhat of an advantage to the Liberal Party to have two Leaders. "If in those days," he continued, "there had been a periodical devoted to the weekly circulation of truth, what confidential revelations would have mystified, and amused, and surprised the public!"

I do not agree with the dual Leaderhip theory, for it is even more absurd than Bimetallism; but I would point out that the differences between Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston were personal, not political. Lord John Russell turned Lord Palmerston out of his Cabinet for having sent off a despatch to one of our Ambassadors abroad without first having submitted it to the Queen. Lord Palmerston reciprocated by turning Lord Russell and his Cabinet out of office, as a "tit for tat." The case between Lord Rosebery and Sir William Harcourt is essentially different. What the "periodical devoted to the weekly circulation of truth" has stated is, that immediately after the last General Election Lord Rosebery informed his late colleagues by letter that he would no longer hold any political communication with the Leader of the Party in the Commons. Practically this announcement amounted to a resignation of the Leadership of the Party, unless Sir William were dismissed from the Leadership in the Commons, for Sir William Fowler would, I should imagine, hardly be inclined to carry his doctrine of dual Leadership so far as to assert that the Party could thrive under two Leaders, one of whom declined to hold any communication with the other on political issues. A year later, Lord Rosebery announced his resignation of the Leadership, basing it upon a divergency of opinion with Mr. Gladstone on the Armenian question; although, as a matter of fact, Lord Rosebery had himself in a previous speech urged that very isolated action that he ascribed to Mr. Gladstone, but which—also as a matter of fact—Mr. Gladstone himself never suggested. On the resignation becoming public, Lord Rosebery's friends denounced Sir William Harcourt for having "betrayed" Lord Rosebery. All that I have sought to do has been to give to Liberals an opportunity to form their own judgment, with a full knowledge of all the facts, as to the occurrences which culminated in the resignation of Lord Rosebery. The public resignation of the Leadership was the necessary outcome of the situation created by Lord Rosebery, and the so-called difference of opinion between Lord Rosebery and Mr. Gladstone was only a peg on which to hang this public resignation.

One thing at least is certain: Lord Rosebery's refusal to act with Sir William Harcourt was penned long previous to Mr. Gladstone's public expression of his views on the Armenian question. His continuance as nominal Leader of the Party, after that refusal, paralysed all united action. The Liberal Party ought at once to have been made aware of it, but it was not; for the official gang appears to have considered that the Liberal Party was no more entitled to be informed of the serious state of things that had occurred, than if they had been a litter of blind puppies. Even now attempts are made by innuendo to imply that Lord Rosebery never did refuse to act with Sir William Harcourt, or, that if he did, he was justified in taking this course. By all means let us have the correspondence, together with any reasons that Lord Rosebery can allege in justification of his strange action. What shocks Radicals is the hole-and-corner fashion in which Lord Rosebery was made Liberal Leader and the hole-and-corner way in which he ceased to be Leader. The selection of a Leader and the reasons why the selected Leader declines to act with the House of Commons' Leader, are not matters that concern alone some dozen official Brahmins. A full, clear, and explicit explanation is due to the Party. That men of capacity as administrators, and by no means averse to afford their country an opportunity to benefit by this capacity, should be desirous to convert their Party into a sort of syndicate, banded together with the one aim of securing to itself the distribution of offices, is not very surprising, for it is strictly in conformity with human nature. Probably they persuade themselves that this aim is in accordance with the true interests of the country, and that all else should be subordinated to it. When, therefore, they fall out amongst themselves, their object is to conceal divergencies of opinion that may conflict with office being entrusted to them. In fact, they would act on the old adage by washing their dirty linen privately. But if Sir William Fowler really holds that Lord Rosebery is the embodiment of the views on which the Liberal Party is to be floated back into office, he would do well to realise that any endeavour to do this will result in Radicals declining any longer to act with Liberal officialdom. They left the policy of the Party, and the means to carry into effect this policy, in the hands of this officialdom, and the result was the most disastrous defeat of modern times. What is the use of these gentlemen celebrating each other's virtues and calling on Radicals to tread once more the road that has led them to perdition? If Sir William Fowler really believes that Radicals are likely to allow themselves once again, in spite of the experience of the past, to be led into the bog in which they hopelessly floundered until the country stepped in to administer the coup de grâce to them, he must deem them the daftest of dolts that ever termed themselves a Party.

THE FAR EASTERN QUESTION.

Strange, indeed, is it that there are persons who actually imagined that Russia would build a railroad through Siberia, thus connecting Europe with the Pacific, and then consent to its Eastern terminus remaining a port closed to shipping for the greater part of the year. Such, however, seems to have been the mental obscuration of a good many. They cannot clear their brains of the illusion that Providence made Asia to serve as a dumping ground for goods manufactured in the British Isles, and that any interference with this divine law is a crime against God and England so atrocious that it is hardly conceivable that it can be entertained by any intelligent human being. Whether the Treaty which has been published between Russia and China be correct in its details, I do not know—and, judging by experience, it is probably incorrect—but that a somewhat similar treaty will be the outcome of the Siberian Railroad, I do not entertain a doubt. With the railroad once made, Russia can always mass an army which might, without serious resistance, occupy Pekin; and this fact, which is based upon geography, is independent of all treaties. We are told that we ought to consider any treaty which makes Russia paramount in Manchuria, and gives her an open harbour on the Pacific, so harmful to our interests in the far East, that if we do not declare that we will resist by arms its provisions being carried into effect, we must meet it by ourselves laying hands on a portion of Southern China. Sorry, indeed, should I be to hear that we had taken upon ourselves the responsibilities of ruling the Chinese, for the weak joint in our Empire is the number of subject races already within its confines. Such an annexation would, indeed, hardly be to our commercial benefit, for we should have to allow other nations to trade on equal terms with ourselves in "British China," and Germany would take advantage of this to compete with us there, whilst we should have to accept the costs and risks of keeping up the Civil Government. What we have a right to demand is, that the Chinese market shall remain as open to us as to any other Power, for this has been secured to us by treaties. Beyond this, it would be foolish to go.

That Russia should bring the Province of Manchuria within the sphere of her political influence is a matter which concerns that country and China. I see nothing more monstrous in it than that we should have annexed Burmah to our Indian Empire. Indeed, given the Siberian railway, Russia could hardly do otherwise. Our action in Central Asia, as in Turkey, has long been a negation of all justice and humanity. There were in Central Asia a number of Khanates, and so vile were their Governments, that they were a scandal to civilisation. We could not well deal with these blots on the face of Asia, but we objected to Russia doing so, because their barbarism acted as a barrier against Russian advance towards India. We failed in our detestable policy, and now these Khanates form a portion of the Russian Empire, with which they are connected by roads and railways. Russia, according to our view of the fitness of things, was eternally to be cribbed, cabined, and confined in Asia within the regions of snow and ice; whilst, in Europe, she was to be allowed no access to the sea. As our nearest route to the East lies through the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, we maintained the Turk in Europe in order to keep Russia from approaching our sea way. A railroad through Siberia gives to Russia a direct land route to the far East. It makes Russia the neighbour of China in reality as well as in name. We are not able to prevent this railroad being made, but we—as it would seem—had expected that we might be able to hinder Russia from deriving commercial advantage from it; and there are those amongst us who would actually have us go to war in pursuit of so hopeless an undertaking.

My own conviction is that the day will some time come when the Chinese and the Japanese with their cheap labour will manufacture for themselves most of the articles that Europe now sends to them; indeed, it would not surprise me if they were eventually to compete with us for European markets. But in the meantime, and so long as the far East is supplied with goods from European manufactories, we shall do well to be well equipped with the means to get our fair share of the trade. This should be done, not by seeking to dictate the law to other European Powers, nor by annexations, nor by building each year more and more ships of war, nor by war or threats of war, but by manufacturing the goods that are most in request amongst the inhabitants of the far East; by gaining a good name for these goods, and by having intelligent agents to learn what is wanted, and how it can best be brought to the notice of those who want it.

Far more reasonable would it be for us to spend public money in schools to educate good and efficient workmen, and good and efficient commercial travellers, than in iron clads. Time was when we had a manufacturing monopoly We alone had capital and skilled labour. This monopoly we have lost. We have competitors, and formidable competitors. We must accept the fact, and make the best of it. The Armenian massacres have had at least one good result. The public conscience will no longer allow us to consign millions of human beings to perpetual misery and misgovernment for the sake of our supposed political interests.

THE PEDAGOGUE AND THE PUPIL.

The Governors of Coventry Grammar School met last week, and passed a resolution rescinding the expulsion of the boy whose case has been dealt with in TRUTH. So far so good. The decision of the Governors is the most unequivocal justification that could have been given of my comments on their previous resolution. I remarked in last week's TRUTH that the expulsion of the boy was so unjustifiable that it could only be explained on the assumption that the Governors did not understand the facts when they passed their resolution. In the paragraph in the Coventry Herald announcing the decision arrived at last week, it is now stated, with an air of authority, that the resolution of expulsion "proceeded on the assumption that the boy was still a member of the school, and that he would return to it at the next term. In point of fact the boy had finally left. The resolution as to expulsion, therefore, could not apply. . . ." Stopping for a moment at this point, it will be seen that it is now admitted, as I have asserted from the first, that the boy had left the school before the resolution to expel him was arrived at, and that my inference that the resolution was, under such circumstances, ultra vires, is accepted as a matter of course. This completely disposes of the most important point in the case, though it would certainly be interesting to know how the Governors came to be uninformed on a point which entirely determined, one way or the other, the validity of their action.

This is not the end, however, of the Governors' action. They have taken another step on which a good deal requires to be said; but before coming to it, it will be convenient to dispose of two communications addressed to me in reference to what was said in last week's TRUTH. The first is from Mr. H. C. Perrin, Mus. Bac., who, I understand, conducted the examination for the musical scholarship. He writes:—

> I shall feel greatly obliged if you will in your next issue inform your readers that the statements made with regard to myself and the musical scholarship at King Henry VIII. School are unauthorised by me. Also, that I do not know the sources of the information upon which those statements are based, and that the facts as set forth in your article are so distorted and misrepresented as to be decidedly more fiction than fact. However, as I do not consider TRUTH the proper place to discuss the matter, I shall not enter into details. . . .

As TRUTH is the paper to which the matter was communicated by various parties concerned, and as the school authorities have themselves twice communicated their version of the facts to TRUTH, it is a decided impertinence to all parties for Mr. Perrin to accompany a contradiction of statements which have been made, with an expression of his opinion that TRUTH is not the proper place to discuss the matter. I take it that this gentleman, for reasons which may be guessed, is unwilling to figure personally in the controversy, and I have no objection to oblige him by stating that he is not directly responsible for what has appeared respecting his action. But indirectly he is responsible, because what I have stated on the subject is derived from what he has himself told other people. If he wishes now to contradict anything that has been attributed to him, he ought either to do so specifically or to keep silence. The allegations in which he is concerned are that he placed at the top of his list the boy who was placed last in the final award, and that he subsequently took exception to the award, and asserted that the boy he placed first was the best musician. If he declines now to state how far this is correct and how far inaccurate, as it is founded on what he has told other people I must decline to give any weight to his contradiction. Will Mr. Perrin deny this—that after the examination he informed the father of the boy whom he placed first that his son had been successful, and congratulated him on the boy's success? If he did that, how can he seriously suggest now that his share in the transaction has been misrepresented?

The other communication above referred to is from Mr. E. W. Dorrington, one of the Assistant Masters. As it has already been communicated to the local press, it is unnecessary for me to reproduce it in extenso, but here is the passage dealing with the case of the boy who was expelled:—

> I. The Latin Play for Speech Day was regarded as a piece of school work, and all rehearsals took place during school hours.
> Had the boy expressed any real objection to taking part in the play there would have been no compulsion put upon him.
> There was no idea whatever of throwing the boy over at the last moment. There was an idea that the boy might throw us over: hence the "understudy"!
> II. Our statement was intended to show that the Headmaster had no knowledge of the boy leaving. We ourselves were entirely ignorant of the fact, and so, we believe, was the Headmaster.
> III. The Headmaster's "recommendation" was published in the programme for Speech Day, July 27, the election to the Lane Exhibition taking place at the next meeting of the Church Charity Trustees.

In regard to the first two paragraphs here, it is a somewhat singular fact that, though no compulsion was employed, there was an idea that the boy might throw up his part, and that the "understudy" was brought in for this reason. It is scarcely credible that if the boy spontaneously undertook to play, he would have contemplated deserting at the last moment. This passage in Mr. Dorrington's letter seems to indicate pretty clearly that relations between the school authorities and this boy were somewhat strained long before the letter was written on which he was expelled, and in this fact may possibly be found a motive for the strong animus that has been shown against him. With regard to the correction as to the preparation of the play having been part of the school work, the mistake here was mine, and was due to what I had heard as to the boy having had to walk twelve or fourteen miles a day during the preparation of a play in the winter. But whatever the Masters may now say, I believe that there is no doubt that both the boy and his parents objected to his being put into the Speech Day play. As to Mr. Dorrington's second paragraph, the evidence is as strong as it can be that the boy was allowed to remain at the school for the summer term at the Headmaster's request, and for the sole reason that he might go in for the Oxford Local Examination from the school. What the Assistant Masters "believe" that the Headmaster knew is not evidence, and I may here remark that it seems to me that it would have been much more satisfactory if the direct statements of the Headmaster on these points had been put forward, instead of the Assistant Masters' account of what they have heard from him. If an official reply on a matter of this kind is to be made by the school authorities, the Headmaster is the proper person to make it.

With regard to the musical exhibition, Mr. Dorrington writes:—

> IV.—The Examiners for the Musical Scholarship were not to elect the scholar; they were asked to assign marks (1) for instrumental playing, (2) for a paper in theory and harmony. The Headmaster adjudicated on the result.

Just so. And the question is, on what principle the Headmaster adjudicated, and how he came to put last a boy whom one examiner put first. The important question, who was the second examiner, Mr. Dorrington strangely omits to notice.

The last paragraph in the letter states that the Headmaster has only one residence—private and official—and that the young ladies educated with his daughters have been boarded in the private portion of the residence, and have never been taught by masters of the school. This disposes of one minor point, but without fuller information than I possess respecting all the circumstances, I cannot say how far it settles finally the question of the position of the young-lady boarders in the Headmaster's house. The great question, to my mind, is whether this arrangement has the formal sanction of the Trustees. If it has, cadit quæstio.

Now to return to the case of the boy who was expelled. The Governors, at their meeting last week, after rescinding the resolution of expulsion, substituted for it a further resolution, advising the Headmaster that no certificate of good conduct should be given to the boy until he had made the apology required. This makes the matter little better than it was before. Expulsion being clearly an act ultra vires in the case of a boy who has left, the Governors have simply cast about for some means of injuring this boy, or forcing from him an apology for a trivial indiscretion committed before he left. The position of affairs will be more clearly understood when I mention that no demand of any kind for an apology has ever yet been made to the boy himself. The statement of the Masters, in their letter published last week, that the boy was given "more than one opportunity of apologising," appears to be inaccurate. The only communications on the subject of an apology that have passed were two letters addressed by the Headmaster to the father, which the father regarded as impertinent, and, therefore, left unanswered. The boy's father can of course now please himself as to whether he will let his boy eat humble-pie after the arbitrary and unjust manner in which he has been treated, or whether he will stand on his dignity, and trust to the existing records of the boy's exemplary conduct during his seven years at the school, as a sufficient answer to the malicious attempt to injure him after he has left. But whichever course is adopted, the action of the Governors is equally discreditable to them. Although they knew at their meeting last week that they had been once deceived on a most material point in the case, they seem to have taken no steps to make more sure of their ground this time. They have held no inquiry into the circumstances preceding the writing of the letter which got the boy into trouble; and they have made no attempt to do justice between the boy's father and the school authorities. Their only idea of their duty in the matter seems to be to support the Headmaster through thick and thin, and if they cannot damage the boy in one way to damage him in another. It is not surprising that there should be strong local dissatisfaction with the management of a school, the Governing Body of which takes so singular a view of its responsibilities and duties; and if, on further reflection, the Governors do not see their mistake a second time, higher authority should be invoked for the purpose of bringing it home to them.

CHRISTMAS AT THE PLAY.

London this Christmas presents a very curious spectacle. In London proper there is to be but one pantomime, viz., that at Drury Lane. But just outside London we are completely fringed round with pantomimes of all descriptions, and the suburbs offer far more attractions than the "West End." The mere word pantomime is an anachronism. It is not a pantomime at all, at least not as I remember one many years ago. The harlequinades and comic scenes belonging so essentially to the Christmas pantomimes of days that are, alas! no more, have dwindled down into shadows, and even the shadows are growing smaller and beautifully less. No, the so-called pantomime of to-day is solely and chiefly a "variety show." It contains ballets, dances, comic songs, topical allusions, breakdowns, nigger melodies—everything, in fact, that is provided at the best ordered music-hall. If you like to call it "Aladdin," "Sindbad," "Mother Goose," "Little Red Riding Hood," or "Cinderella," do so by all means; but they are only names which really embrace a brilliant variety entertainment. And all these "side shows" look as if they were going to be uncommonly well done indeed, as if no expense whatever is to be spared on them; so that here for the first time in London, 1896, we shall have the Grand Christmas Competition of the suburban theatres competing with the West End, with cheaper rates, with playhouses quite as comfortable and attractive-looking, and with artists not a bit inferior. It will be a novel and curious experience, no matter which way it turns out.

THE LADY JOURNALIST.

I paid a damp but cheerful visit to the "Woman's World" the other afternoon, and came away hopelessly mystified, painfully unconvinced, and brilliantly dull. The author's spectacles must be made of smoked glass, for he seems to see all his characters through a thick fog, which atmosphere he carefully conveys to his audience, and it is useless to attempt to penetrate the obscure, meaningless, and indefinite reason for such a veritable "storm in a teacup," which is presumably the plot of this quaint play. Conceive a very up-to-date, matter-of-fact independent lady journalist, who is always entreating the opposite sex to "come to the point at once," to "be concise," business-like, and, above all, not to waste her valuable time—every moment of which is worth a big bit more than six and eightpence—suddenly, and without rhyme or anything else, falling a victim to the "tender passion" through the insinuating advances of one of the most swindling, double-dyed, deceitful, nothing-ever-seen-like-it lady-killers ever created by man. This same extraordinary heroine, after discovering her lover dandling another fair siren on his fickle knee, is awarded, as a recompense for her bruised heart and lacerated feelings, the post of manageress of a newspaper possessing a staff of lady journalists who are nothing more or less than a gang of ruffianly blackmailers. Why didn't such a goodly crew of strong women turn and cut the hero into dramatic mincemeat in their female newspaper instead of trying to sympathise with the limp heroine over the loss of such a shoddy trickster? It was no use trying to mend matters with a bit of sham sentiment in the last act. The whole scheme is cheap and tawdry from start to finish. Esmé Beringer worked hard as the ill-used Constance Glyn; but the more brilliant the acting the more inconsistent appears the "Woman's World."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE APOTHEOSIS OF BERNHARDT.

THE Sarah Bernhardt festival was very Parisian, and tout à fait "Vie Parisienne." Before going farther, I shall say that Sarah, in dress, in youthful spirits, in physical grace—and, when she did not pile up agonies on the stage—was delightful. She was full of charm; every one said how well she wore. Dramatic authors who hope to reap new or fresh laurels in her theatre were enchanted to see her in such good form. The apotheosis was so much grist to their mills. Henri Bauer, obviously the most favoured person at the banquet, is now the chief of the theatrical critics. It was he who set on foot the idea of the apotheosis. Sardou astonished us all by following closest on Bauer's heels. Jules Lemaître was a good many degrees farther off, both as an ovationist and at the banquet, where he was fifth from the enchanting actress.

The Triumph of Sarah Bernhardt was to be at once literary, pictorial, gastronomic, and histrionic. To pay for the privilege of contributing to it, and enjoying it, each admirer subscribed 40 fr. The subscribers were in return given an album quite worth the money, were invited to the Grand Hotel déjeuner, and to the theatrical matinée to follow at the Renaissance. They were to have three pictorial menus—respectively by the great decorator Mucha, by Cheret, the maître par excellence de l'affiche, and by Mlle. Abbema. The first gives in line or outline engraving, of the freest execution, a beautiful portrait of Sarah sweeping on; while two scantily-clad votaries—petites amies—offer her fruits and flowers. She is in a kind of Moorish archway. The flowers fall about capriciously. But there is hidden system under the apparent whimsicality. The Abbema menu is pretty fan-painting. A muse is decorating with flowers a pedestal, on which stands Sarah's bust. Cheret gives her attended by the muses of tragedy and comedy, Parisian-looking graces—all in ecstasies of admiration. The invitations were in small pocket-books the size of those containing Cook's tourist coupons, but bound in delicate bluish grey morocco, and containing two parchment-paper leaves. One of the leaves was a coupon for the banquet—the other for the theatrical apotheosis. Ladies were requested to come in dinner and gentlemen in evening dress.

General Saussier, Governor of Paris and generalissimo—in case of war—was to have figured as chief personage at the Triumph. This was to have been without prejudice to the great critic who took the place that Leonardo gives to the Beloved Disciple in his painting of the Last Supper. But the promoters reckoned without Paul de Cassagnac and Drumont. I dislike slang. But I must resort to it to describe De C.'s mode of warfare. He "slated" the poor General three or four days before the feast. Mars grown fat and gouty at the feet of a strolling actress! What would the army say? What would soldiers think—soldiers who may any moment be sent to face German rifles by this Falstaffian Commander-in-Chief? Drumont is no match for Paul in abuse. He is best in eau-forte effects. He devoted a few articles to the Governor of Paris that bit into the plate. All, therefore, that came of the Saussier patronage was the mounting of Horse Guards in full-dress uniform at the entrance of the Grand Hôtel Renaissance. The General, despite his need for an anti-fat treatment, retains his military courage. He has to be lifted by two strong orderlies into the saddle; but once in the saddle, he is ready to face all the hosts of Germany. He did not, however, dare to expose himself to a second slating by De Cassagnac or to Drumont's eau forte. The splendid-looking Horse Guards were sent to the Grand long before the time arranged for the déjeuner. They stood like equestrian statues on the Boulevard, just as they stand before the Opera House when the President is expected there. You may imagine what a crowd their presence attracted. A stranger who had just arrived from the Antipodes might have thought some Emperor had come in state to Paris. There was another crowd—a Society one—round the courtyard and on the steps of the Grand. It was just as ironical as the one outside. It was the crowd that attended the obsequies of the Marquis de Morès, and, I fancy from the remarks made, takes its opinions from La Libre Parole.

Actresses are not fond of daylight. "Half-past twelve precisely" was the time set down for the banquet in the invitations. I arrived at twelve, to see the company enter, and was shown to the Zodiac Gallery, which was to serve as a drawing-room. It was lighted artificially, daylight being excluded. "La Bohême dorée et la Petite Pologne" were numerously represented. I saw all the theatrical beauties whose charms are, through the medium of the photo, on view in so many shop windows. The sisterhood of the Français, sharing in the mourning of Mlle. Bartet, absented themselves. But Mlle. Brandès was one of the attractive persons who came. She wore a grey, flowered dress and sleeves, and a low pink bodice with a jet garniture at back and front. A pink ruff tippet was thrown over her shoulders. It was made of white lace, silk muslin, and pleated soft gros-grain silk, with edges ravelled into a fringe.

Lady Cardigan's Portuguese husband was there—you may remember him as a cotillonneur at the Tuileries. He seems the ghost of his former self, condemned to haunt ball-room buffets, matinée "lunches," weddings in high life, and theatrical celebrations in which the chefs play a part. The De Monacos, De Greffulhes, and so on reserved themselves for the Renaissance. Literary women had not the same reasons for such reserve, and came. Gyp, of course, was present. One might fancy a resemblance in her to Baudry's Thalia on the ceiling of the Opera House green-room. That Thalia has a saucy, turned-up nose and dimpled face. To look at her is to laugh.

Of course, all the great theatrical critics, besides Bauer and Lemaître, were present. L'oncle Sarcey was accompanied by his young wife and très entouré by risen, rising, and wanting-to-rise actresses. He looked Socratic; as I saw how he took the court paid him, I fancied that poor Xantippe could have written a monograph of her husband widely differing from the Dialogues of Plato. Henri Fouquier, who writes on pitchy cases of feminine conscience as Colomba (a variety of Colombier), and criticises works of art as Nestor, was accompanied by his really beautiful daughter. Mdlle. Fouquier has the nose, the full eyelids, and the forehead of the Queen before her marriage, but a more regular mouth, and I know not what of splendid Oriental expression in the eyes. Her complexion is pale, but has a healthy glow—the texture of the camelia. She wore her hair waved and twisted into a careless knot above the nape of the neck, like a Greek statue.

We were fearfully hungry as the time ran on to one o'clock. It must have been near half-past one before we were allowed to descend to the great dining-room, where a table of honour and eight other tables were spread. Meanwhile, critics and authors flirted; ladies—mostly young or determined to remain lovely for ever—eyed each other's dresses. As all the theatrical mondes arrived, curious chit-chat went on in groups. A sly, elderly critic got into a corner with a stage beauty, and ate up her white arm with kisses. I heard a jealous fellow-artist notice that she had a costly dress and no jewels. Said another, "She was chez ma tante the other day with the casket, because Ducher would not give her credit for the dress." "You anticipated what I was going to say," replied the green-eyed petite amie. "Did I? But I fancy that others whom we see have also been visiting my aunt" (Anglice, my uncle). The fine and wealthy monde is still in the country for the shooting. We are en saison morte. Fine dresses, and no jewels to light them up, seem to be the rule. Yet we were invited to come in dinner dress. "If you don't wear jewels at grand dinners, when are you to bring them out?" "We are to reflect the light of the grand Sarah's countenance." "That horrid truceuse! Doesn't it enrage you to see how her trucs succeed? She has bewitched that good, open-hearted Bauer, who would now go through fire and water for her sake. But I'm so glad that De Cassagnac frightened away Saussier. My pleasure would be perfect if Sardou were not to be No. 2 at the banquet—next in eminence to Bauer, who is No. 1. Old B., of the Institute, repeated me last night a conversation at the last dinner at the Princesse M.'s about Sardou and Sarah. They were all astounded to hear that he was coming forward as No. 2, and that he was going to beg the red ribbon for her of Faure, on the ground that she was great, glorious, and good—in short, an angel of charity. You know that to merit entrance to the Legion of Honour a woman must devote herself to charity. We shall next hear of a few charitable trucs!" "Que voulez-vous, ma chère; sans trucage pas de réussite! There's George Hugo and Léon Daudet. What a handsome fellow! What a humanised and fined-down eagle! And what a clever fellow, too. I read his 'Suzanne' from cover to cover the other night in bed. Cela mord." "Has Hugo his pretty wife (encore une gentille petite femme celle-là) with him?" "No danger of his bringing her." "I hear that Madame Alphonse Daudet is coming?" "No." "Yes." "Ask one of the Committee. Depend upon it, she is keeping herself for the Renaissance."

At length the doors at the top of the two corkscrew stairs were opened, and we descended to take our places at the table. Oysters were spread on each plate. For every two persons there was a bottle of Chablis, one of ordinary Bordeaux, and one of champagne, with the promise (afterwards fulfilled) of hock, Pommard, and Margaux. It was not proper to eat or drink until the chief guest arrived. Punctuality is not the politeness of great actresses. The pangs of hunger sharpened tongues and made them wicked. You may guess the subjects of their malice. We were feeling faint, when the orchestra struck up, the hymn to Sarah was sung, and, heralded by a flourish of trumpets, she appeared on the top of the left-hand winding stairs. She was just as serpentine. Her arms seemed tendrils as she clung to the velvet-wrapped central column and to the rail of the bannister. She blew kisses. She opened her arms to hug us all in a transport of affectionate gratitude. Her steps faltered. She seemed to blush from sheer joy, and then made her way, like the Queen of Spain going on foot to the Atocha, to the table of honour. Every one—backbiters included—was transported. She was robed in a dress of stamped Persian silk, with a creamy ground and faded designs. A kind of boa warmed it up. The train was never-ending; the style, loose tea-gown; the girdle, jewelled and abdominal; the hair, fair, golden, glossy, and curly as a healthy child's. The pantomime already described was continued at the high table, where lights, concealed by épergnes, threw a converging glow on the heroine of the day. A canopy, as in "Cléopâtre," overshadowed Mme. Bernhardt. She ate oysters with apparent gusto, said little to Sardou, on whose face a sardonic smile played, and paid marked attention to Bauer. Every one near me wanted to know the names of le Pair et la Pairesse d'Angleterre who sat between Mme. Terka and Maurice Bernhardt. They were a very great pair et pairesse. He was a Lord-in-Waiting to the Queen, and supposed to be sent by the Princess Beatrice to congratulate Sarah. She was a Scotch heiress, and both were to stay in Paris. A paper stated next day that the noble admirer of Sarah was the Master of the Queen's Buckhounds. As I never previously saw that nobleman, I could not say whether the news was true or false. His wife was tall and slim. Both were very much in earnest. She wore two tall, upright, white feathers in her hat, and a black and white striped silk dress.

The Renaissance affair was lively. But Sarah showed that she has for years been acting before audiences who do not know French. Sardou was behind her throne (in her own theatre) while the poets were reciting verses in her honour. He looked as sarcastic as Voltaire in his most ironical mood. Perhaps he will let posterity know what he was thinking.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

It is the custom, dear Lady Betty, at most of the long-established London clubs, for the elections of candidates to begin immediately after the reassembling of Parliament. It has been officially announced that this event will take place in the middle of next January. The announcement has prompted many candidates, who expect to undergo the ordeal of election by ballot during the coming session, to write to ask for advice. This I will gladly give; for advice costs nothing to him that gives it, however much it frequently does to him that follows it.

Any man who is over thirty years of age, and either knows many people personally, or is known to many by reputation, has little or no chance of being elected to a prominent London club; for the more people a man knows, or the more people there are who know him, the more enemies he is sure to have. It is practically impossible to go through the world without offending some of our neighbours, and it is evident, therefore, that the larger the number of our acquaintances, and the greater the opportunities for friction, the more enemies we must make. But apart from this, it is a peculiarity of human nature that many hate us more bitterly for offences which we have committed unintentionally than for those which have been committed wilfully, and that many hate us even more for our sins of omission than for our sins of commission. Thus many a man bitterly hates another, because the latter wears his hat tilted on one side; because his coats are longer than the regulation length; because he prefers music to hunting, or hunting to music; because the two travel frequently together, but have never spoken to each other; and for a multitude of singular reasons too numerous to mention. A very common cause of enmity between two people is either that they have never met, or that one has a friend who has a friend who hates the other. Some hate us because we are succeeding; some because we are failing. Some hate us because we are well known, others because we are obscure. In the face, then, of the numerous strange reasons which human beings have for detesting each other, it is unreasonable for any man who either knows many people, or is known of by many, to expect to be elected to a prominent London club. Under the circumstances, unless a candidate is obscure, or has no antecedents whatever, an election resolves itself into a matter of chance, with the odds considerably against the candidate. To those who have written asking for advice I recommend the foregoing remarks. They should consider them carefully. So generally recognised are the difficulties I have mentioned, that, except upon rare and especial occasions, no humiliation now attaches to being rejected for a club. But in this age, and at this particular period of "peace and good-will," the facts provide a curious commentary upon the difference which exists between Christianity as it is preached and Christianity as it is practised.

This generation has done much to develop the scope of certain senses. With one optical apparatus we can see stars that are imbedded in the sky millions of miles away; with another we can magnify into the size of a rock an atom so small as to be invisible to the naked eye. Again, by the aid of the microphone attached to the telephone we can hear a person who is a hundred miles distant speak as distinctly as if he were at our side. But the entire inventive capacity of the race appears to have concentrated itself upon improving the powers of sight and of hearing, of quickening communication and expediting transit. We know that animals, and especially dogs, have the sense of smell immeasurably more developed than we have, and this goes far to assure us that this sense, too, may be considerably improved in man. The immediate advantage of improving it is, perhaps, not so easily perceived as in the case of other senses. It appears that an inventor has recently manufactured an apparatus which he declares makes the sense of smell in man as keen as it is in the dog, and he especially wishes to recommend this instrument to the Detective Department at Scotland-yard. To give one instance in which he maintains it would be extremely useful: A burglary has been committed at the house of Lady Dorrington, in Dover-street, and the thieves have stolen jewels of much value. Inspector Muggins of the A Division proceeds to Dover-street, places the Patent Smell-Magnifier upon his nose; sniffs at the jewel-case; then at the door-handles; and finally at the scullery window, where entrance to the house was effected. He succeeds in identifying the smell as that officially associated with Bill Sikes, a notorious burglar. Bill Sikes is arrested. At the trial, by means of the Patent Smell-Magnifier, Mr. Justice Hookem and the gentlemen of the jury identify beyond possibility of doubt the perfume which is distinctive of Bill Sikes with that which still lingers about the jewel-case of Lady Dorrington. Sikes is found guilty, sentenced, and the law has been speedily and inexpensively avenged by the Patent Smell-Magnifier! The invention opens an altogether new field—for ridicule!

them to run their machines through the London streets, an incident which occurred last week must startle those who advocated the removal of recent restrictions. At seven in the evening, when the traffic was tremendous, a traction-engine, dragging six or seven trucks, steamed serenely down the Brompton-road in the direction of Piccadilly. The policemen along the road stood staring, and evidently at a loss what to do. The horses shied, and the people in the street apparently imagined that a wild train had escaped from one of the railway stations. If trains of trucks are to be added to the already congested traffic of the London streets the situation will be hopeless. This Government appears to make laws in a hurry; it will have to repeal some of them at leisure.

Several Conservative members are indignant at the proposal of the War Office to establish a universal helmet for the Army. These, together with many members of the Opposition, intend to bring the matter before Parliament almost as soon as the House reassembles. There is no doubt that the scheme will be opposed vigorously and to the utmost limit. It has become a master-passion at the War Office to meddle with the uniforms of soldiers. Buttons do not win battles.

The vacancy caused by the promotion of the British Chargé d'Affaires at Bangkok will, it is believed, be filled by the appointment of an official who is not a member of the Diplomatic Service. In this particular instance the members of that Service will have no serious cause for complaint, for the post was not formerly administered by a Diplomatist. If, however, it was thought a short time ago to be well to appoint Mr. de Bunsen at a salary of £1,600 a year, recent events in Siam do not make it obvious why a Diplomatist should not now succeed him. But in this matter the Foreign Office officials must be the best judges.

Baron Gevers, who was for many years Secretary of the Netherlands Legation in London, and was several months ago promoted to be Netherlands Minister at Berne, has been transferred to Bucharest in the same capacity. Though his many friends in England will be much pleased to observe Baron Gevers rapidly ascending the ladder of promotion, they will regret that this, the latest rung upon which he places his foot, removes him so far from them.

Many Catholics, and many who do not belong to that Church, will hear with regret of the death of Monsignor Talbot, who was for years in charge of the Catholic Parish Church in Warwick-street. The late Monsignor Talbot was a good man and a good priest, who devoted himself during the greater part of his long life to good works.

It is strange that when so many automatic machines have been devised, no apparatus of the kind for the sale of newspapers has yet been established in the streets and at the railway stations. An automatic machine could easily be constructed in an octagonal form for the sale of eight of the most popular papers. The newspaper carts, instead of distributing the various journals to gangs of boys, who shout the latest intelligence to the great annoyance of all who hear them, might stop at each machine, and the drivers would then fill the apparatus with a sufficient number of the latest edition. On each of the surfaces of the octagon could also be affixed the latest "contents bill." For a long time it has been felt by many that there is room for a Sunday afternoon paper, but the difficulty of distribution is so considerable that no one has yet discovered a way of overcoming it Automatic newspaper machines would effect this, for if these were scattered over London plentifully, whoever required an afternoon Sunday paper would only have to go to the nearest apparatus, and drop a penny in the slot to be supplied with the paper.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE official report of the proceedings at last week's meeting of the Jockey Club will repay the reader. The opponents of the drastic proposals of the Stewards had the wind taken out of their sails by the disclosure of Major Egerton's "admissions of failures." That it had become a matter of urgent and imperative necessity to increase the number of handicappers, and to cut down the work of each of them within reasonable limits, was obvious to every one. We shall see how the new arrangement works next season, as, if it proves unsatisfactory in any respect, it will be easy to amend it as may be found expedient. Lord Durham has rendered another valuable service to the Turf in raising this question.

The reporter of one of the sporting papers, in his account of the Newmarket sale on Thursday, states that Omladina won the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot, "the race for which the sporting correspondent of TRUTH said Persimmon ought to be reserved, as he would be found deficient in stamina." I have no recollection of mentioning the Fernhill Stakes in connection with Persimmon, but perfectly well remember remarking that the St. James's Palace Stakes at Ascot should be a good thing for the Prince of Wales's colt, and that such race would have been won by him is sure enough if the Prince had not been so ill-advised as to keep his steed for the Princess of Wales Stakes at Newmarket, the result being that he was defeated for that event by St. Frusquin. After Persimmon had most palpably failed to stay the Middle Park Plate course, when he was easily beaten by St. Frusquin and Omladina, I certainly did expect that as a three-year-old he would prove deficient in stamina, and so did a good many other people. The Prince of Wales must by this time be perfectly nauseated by the fulsome, uniform, excessive, and absolutely undistinguishing eulogies of which Persimmon has been the subject ever since his début at Ascot last year. Nothing more could be said in favour of the greatest horse which has ever existed, and every other animal, good or bad, that is owned by the Prince of Wales is never mentioned but to be magnified in a corresponding strain of extravagant and turbid panegyric. If Persimmon had belonged to some plebeian owner—any "little man"—his merits would have been discussed from a very different point of view. In that case our attention would have been directed to his remarkable good luck during his three-year-old career rather than to his superlative excellence, and there would have been lackadaisical croakings over the defeat of "the popular Rothschild colours" in the Derby, and the collapse of St. Frusquin, and so forth. That Persimmon was a lucky horse when he won the Derby is certain, and but for the mishap to St. Frusquin's equipment at the crisis of the finish, Mr. de Rothschild's colt would assuredly have been the winner at Epsom. A month later St. Frusquin defeated Persimmon very cleverly at Newmarket, and that he would have won both the St. Leger and the Jockey Club Stakes if he had kept on his legs is as sure as that the sun will rise to-morrow. Persimmon, so far as his three-year-old career is concerned, must stand or fall by his race in the Princess of Wales Stakes, which was a fair and square test, as it was run over an unexceptionable course; both the Derby winner and St. Frusquin were fresh and well, there was a good pace, and neither colt was interfered with in any sort of way. Persimmon had 3 lb. the worst of the weights, but he received much more than a 3 lb. beating.

An immense number of lots were sent back at Newmarket last week, the reserves in many cases being altogether preposterous. Omladina realised the highest price of the week, as I had predicted would be the case, Sir B. Maple giving 2,300 gs. for her; and she ought to prove a good bargain, whether he races her again next season or sends her at once to the stud. Shaddock has gone back to Kingsclere, his reserve being 4,000 gs., whereas the highest price bid was only 2,900 gs. He would have been a decided catch at the price which was asked for him, and before the end of June the Duke of Westminster will have reason to be well pleased that he is still the owner of this smart and improving horse. Rampion was sold considerably below his value to Mr. J. Jay for 1,400 gs., and the money will be got back with substantial interest in the course of next season if the horse is judiciously placed. He ought to be kept for a good mile race, and, after next year he will make a splendid jumper. Conroy will be cheap to C. Archer at 1,050 gs. if he stands another preparation, but he is something of a rogue, and cannot be trusted unless he has it all his own way in a race. The Duke of Portland's mares could not be described as well sold, and Eisteddfod (530 gs., Mr. James) was about the best bargain of the week, considering her good looks and her running blood; being by Petrarch out of Modwena, sister to Donovan. Novitiate, by Hermit, dam of Marco, was sold to Sir B. Maple for 1,250 gs., and he got her cheap, considering that she is in foal to Isinglass. Lord Falmouth made a great mistake in weeding Milanda, a young mare by Thurio, if she is really in foal to Orme, as was stated, for she realised only 330 gs., and her sire's fee is 200 gs. Pride was not sold, but Mr. Brassey let Macbriar go to F. Webb for only 1,100 gs., and he will make a good jumper if it is intended to send him over hurdles. Devoué, sold to Mr. Joel for 1,700 gs., is sure to win an important handicap next season if he goes on all right. His Reverence was one of the best sold horses of the week at 1,400 gs., as he seems to have entirely lost the form which he showed at Ascot. The Bruntwood mares were sensibly sold for what they would fetch, and they realised fair prices, as there was no hugger-mugger of buying in and bogus bidding.

Velasquez and Chelandry were extensively touted at Newmarket last week, and both animals were considered to have made a very fair improvement since they were last seen out some two months ago. Velasquez bids fair to grow into a very good-looking and racing-like colt, while Chelandry will always be a light and wiry filly. If Velasquez continues to go on all right, he will probably win the Two Thousand, and in the Derby Lord Rosebery has a dangerous second string in Chelandry. The fact that the filly is engaged in the Derby has presumably been overlooked by the individuals who have offered 100 to 7 bar three, as on her two-year-old running she ought to be just as good a favourite as either of the colts.

The Newmarket Stakes for 1899 has failed to fill, and it may be hoped that the Stewards of the Jockey Club will now abandon this race, which has never been a success from any point of view, and it has always been a very costly event to the Fund. There is obviously no room for a great three-year-old stake in the short interval between the Newmarket First Spring Meeting and the Epsom week. If the Stewards desire to strengthen the programme of the Second Spring Meeting, let them start a race of adequate value to run as four-year-olds and five-year-olds, the course being A.F. Such a stake might close on the first Tuesday in January, for then yearlings and two-year-olds. There is a deal of talk about the necessity for encouraging owners to keep horses longer in training, but it all ends in vapour.

The speeches after the dinner of the London Athletic Club are generally not without interest. The recent dinner was no exception to the rule. Indeed, Mr. W. M. Chinnery, the chairman, was guilty of remarks that were not only interesting but of considerable importance to the future of athletics. Incidentally he mentioned that the club colours—gold and green—were the colours of the owner of Blair Athol, the winner of the Derby in 1864, when the club first ran at Bow. But when he referred to the recent defections from the amateur ranks, and to the fact that in its early days the L.A.C. held a professional meeting, many who heard him were astonished, and they even more marvelled when he said he was quite ready to support professionalism if he could do so without doing wrong. Certainly the dinner was an important one in the annals of the club. Twelve months before at the same dinner members were protesting that the Americans beat them at New York because their ways were not our ways, and it was impossible for us to compete successfully on such an entirely different basis. In these columns it was pointed out that the Americans did openly what in this country was done in secret. But such a complete justification of the position that was then taken up could not for a moment have been anticipated. Of the men who went to America two have joined the professional ranks; of those who were asked to go but failed, two have also become professionals. One replied last year to the toast of the Challenge Cup holders, and of his own free will he has apparently joined the "pros.," and that is E. C. Bredin. Three champions in a twelvemonth—Bacon, Bradley, and Bredin—have all gone over to professionalism. Two of them were expelled because they received money for running at certain meetings, but the names of those meetings have not been published, nor have the donors of the money been mentioned. This is neither just nor fair, but it is characteristic of the pharisaical humbug from which amateur athletics at times unfortunately suffer. Several of those who rule the athletic roost make money out of sports. A certain number retail their information for the public press, others get fees for handicapping, and others do both, and yet they are all amateurs. I do not expect a man to do the heavy work of handicapping for nothing. But I do protest against those who make money in this way, adopting the pass-by-on-the-other-side principle when they have to do with a professional athlete. I cannot see why a professional runner should, so far as athletics are concerned, be socially ostracised. Very pleasant, therefore, is it to find the good Samaritan in Mr. Chinnery. He does not see why professional running should not be honest and honourable, and he is willing to help it. For properly organised professionalism there is a big field open. The class of men who have lately seceded from the amateur ranks is of a calibre to give it a lift up, and if those who like running for running sake and who are utterly indifferent whether amateur or "pro." competes, will only come forward and help, the future of professional running should be assured. The remarks of Mr. Chinnery seem to show a possibility of a better understanding between the two classes of sport. Mr. S. K. Holman, the hon. sec., was able to announce that for the public schools a University programme, with challenge cups for several events, had been arranged. Mr. Holman deserves great credit for the energy he has shown in bringing such a satisfactory result to pass, and it is to be hoped that the public schools will give the events a proper support; but care must be taken to prevent immature youths from competing.

The rain spoilt both the big Rugby matches last week. Oxford, on the dry ground and with a strong wind, started off with great dash against Cambridge and scored twice in the first fifteen minutes, the Light Blues being quite at sea. Afterwards their forwards woke up and put in some rattling work. The three-quarters did well when they got a chance, but Crump and Unwin quite outplayed Bell and Jacob at half. It was here that the Light Blues were so abominably weak, and although it is not nice to have to blame any one, it is useless to conceal the fact that Bell was extremely selfish, and when he did pass he did not pass well. He played a very different game at Blackheath. No doubt his style of play succeeded well enough in most of the matches the University played earlier in the term, but if those in authority are wise they will arrange a much stronger card than is usually done for next October term. The Dark Blues had played stronger teams, and so their defence had improved, and both at the start and finish they held the Cambridge pack. Baker played superbly at three-quarter, both in attack and defence, and Smith was very safe at full back. Apart from the fine play of the forwards, the Light Blues were disappointing. Jacob at half was not up to form, and so the three-quarters had little to do. Mackie's defence was very strong, and he had bad luck in slipping on the greasy ground on one or two occasions. Wallis's pace was useful, and Pilkington had but little chance. Thomas at back collared sometimes very well, but his kicking was often weak, and he frequently fielded the ball indifferently. Oxford made the most of their opportunities, and deserved to win. Leslie Jones in a most sportsmanlike way gave the Cantabs their first try when the ball was grounded over the dead ball-line, which was marked only eight yards behind the goal-line. The marking was wrong, and it is curious that neither captain observed a mistake which many of the spectators had noticed. Considering the rain and mud, the North and South match was most interesting. Indeed, a draw would more accurately have represented the game, for it looked as though the North were deprived of a certain win through Byrne holding up a player who was just about to touch the ball down. The feature of the match was the play of F. A. Byrne at three-quarter. He revelled in the mud and picked up the greasy ball admirably. He stopped rushes and attacked splendidly, his low kicks along the touch-line being excellent. He had Foukes opposite him, and he played very coolly. At half Schwarz could scarcely be recognised as the Light Blue player of a few seasons ago. He gave Parlane no chances, and played very steadily. Wells played a great game. He picked up the ball in a wonderful manner, and his practice at Eton has apparently done him a lot of good. Mortimer and Giblin collared well, and many thought that the latter ought to have had his International. Both Ebden and Stout, the West Country players, collared very strongly. They never gave the player a chance when they once got near him. The South dribbles and rushes were very good, while the North kicked rather too hard, and relied on the greasy ball being misfielded. This difference in style may spoil the combination of the forwards against Wales.

In Association football there was again a large number of people to see the Corinthians play Bolton Wanderers, but the class of work shown by the pro.'s was not nearly so good as the display of Aston Villa the week before. The visiting backs worked grandly, but their forwards were spasmodic in their efforts. The amateurs were in great form, and the pro's have probably learned that Gosling, Smith and Burnup can play football. At the same time the Casuals were being beaten by Preston North End after a fairly interesting game. Surely the amateur interest in football cannot be so miserably weak when two amateur teams can meet two leading professional teams, and the one is victorious while the other is not disgraced. The importance of the Corinthians' matches at the Queen's Club is that they afford proof positive of the ability of our unpaid players. It may be necessary to refer next week to the action of the Football Association with reference to Mr. Jackson and his scratch teams. He organised the Corinthians. They have been the salvation of amateur play, and the managers of professional teams can neither forgive nor forget that fact.

Recently I referred to the ban put by the Southern Counties' Amateur Swimming Association on swimming races in Peckham, where the prizes were to be clothes for children swimmers who were at the Board Schools. This Association professes to teach swimming, especially to the poor, and yet it refuses to let these children race for something which will be of great use to them. At a recent meeting it solemnly refused to allow these children to swim for clothes, and yet the male amateur of full age may swim for a plated cup to eat an egg out of. If one of these children shows phenomenal powers, he will be hailed as a champion, and star the country as an amateur until he finds professionalism pays him better. Under no circumstances can he swim in a race in the Serpentine on Christmas-day. Truly these swimmers strain at the gnat and swallow the camel. One almost wishes they would swallow an overdose of water from one of their own baths, and cease to trouble the world with their nonsense.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—Some time ago I expressed the opinion that the hackneyed talk, that we should have no more business before Christmas, was absurd, and the events of the past week distinctly proved that I was right. For once the "Bears" had to take a back seat, and a general improvement is marked in Home Rails, Foreigners, and South Africans. We have, in fact, had An All-Round Rally.

The most important change of front took place in Home Rails, which had been depressed by the dispute between the Heavy lines, and especially the North-Western, on the one side, and the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants on the other. With the assistance of the Board of Trade the difficulty has been adjusted, with the result of a sharp rebound in leading stocks. Inter-bourse securities were also in favour under the lead of Spanish, which benefited by the announcement of the death of the chief insurgent leader in Cuba, Maceo. South Americans, too, were firmer, and a considerable business was transacted in Industrials. The only department which did not join in the general concert was that of Americal Rails. As the chief "Bear" point turned upon the Cuban question, and as the death of the insurgent leader tends to diminish any chance of a collision between Spain and the United States, one would have thought that the Wall-street market would have gathered strength; but the Cuban party in the Senate are so exasperated at this Spanish success that they are raising a great deal of dust over the alleged assassination of Maceo, and no support is at present given by the wirepullers in the New York market. The ursine party, in fact, always contrive to get hold of a fresh handle to put stocks down with. One of these days there will doubtless come about a strong revival, but, according to present appearances, this will not happen until the year has turned. On the other hand, a smart and all-round recovery in South African shares has come about sooner than most of our financial scribes anticipated, and there seems to be a fair chance of this rise proving permanent, in view of the favourable developments which supply a sound basis for the movement. West Australians have been firm in places, but do not show so general an advance as the Kaffir Circus. A marked recovery in this department is, however, only a question of time. As we are approaching the end of the year, it is hardly likely that rates in the Money Market will further ease off. We may, on the contrary, see during the last few days of the year a temporary squeeze, after which, however, a reduction in the Bank rate is quite on the cards; and as politics are shaping themselves more favourably, and trade is still in a healthy condition, prospects have not been so hopeful for a long time. The position is certainly very different to what it was at the end of 1895, with mischief brewing in the Transvaal, and the Jameson raid imminent. It has taken the Kaffir Circus a whole year to recover from the blow struck then, but the worst is evidently over now, and a further general rise in this section would obviously have an encouraging influence upon every class of securities.

Recovery in Home Rails.

It is a matter of congratulation that the management of the North-Western have seen the error of their ways, and it is creditable to them that they did their climbing down from the untenable position which they had taken up, with a good grace. They have reinstated the men who were summarily dismissed, and the comparatively moderate claims of the men can be discussed at a period when business will not be quite so active, as it must necessarily be during the last few weeks of the year. I have taken the view all along that no strike was to be apprehended, and I hope that my readers followed my advice to stick to their holdings, in which case they will have good profits within their reach. The favourites have been Brighton "A" and Dover "A," and I have so repeatedly explained the excellent position of both lines, that I may hope that the rise in these stocks will benefit a good many readers of Truth. As the period of the dividend payments draws near, I shall look for a further improvement in both. Great Eastern are also firmer; the only exception from the general rise being Chatham Ordinary, which reacted sharply on a variety of unconfirmed rumours. In the Heavy division North Western suffered most during the labour trouble, but they have now rallied sharply to 200¾. Traffics continue on a most satisfactory scale, and the increases for the past week reached £78,800, the total increase now being for the current half-year £1,113,515. There is thus every prospect of the dividend estimates, which I mentioned a fortnight ago, being borne out by results. A sharp advance in Metropolitan Districts has also been a feature. This stock was at one time depressed to 26¾, but has now rallied to 28¼, reacting to 27¾, and the circumstances surrounding the line at present are so favourable that a further important rise can only be a question of a short time. At the fortnightly settlement rates were generally light, and considerable scarcity of Dover "A" was experienced, the rate on which went off to even. On the other hand, a stiff contango was exacted on Coras (Caledonian Deferred Ordinary), which temporarily put down the Scotch stocks generally. The great Dundee "Bear," moreover, did his best to use the labour troubles as a depressing factor; but Coras (North British Deferred) have now recovered, and I should think that, in view of the continued trade boom in Scotland, prices will go ahead again.

Suspended Animation of Yankees.

The condition of the Yankee market cannot be described better than as being in a state of suspended animation. It is the only department of the Stock Exchange in which the "Bears" are still scoring, and in which the syndicate of liars is ever ready to invent fresh rumours of calamities as soon as the last has been exploded. The sooner the "Bears," however, realise that one of these days they are certain to have to face a very sharp upward movement, the better will it be for their skins. This is how one of my Wall-street contemporaries characteristically foreshadows what will happen to the "Bears":—

> "Sam" Small, the revivalist, tells the story about an old darkey down south who was riding along a road on an old mule, and lambasting it with a big stick at every step.
> "What's the matter, Uncle?" a man asked on the road. "Is your mule lazy?"
> "No, boss," said the old darkey, "he ain't lazy. He's only got a thick hide and a short recollection."
> That's what's the matter with the "Bears"—got thick hides and short recollections.

The Cuban question is undoubtedly the chief "Bear" point in Wall-street; but as President Cleveland has taken up the firm position that he will not interfere, or grant the insurgents belligerent rights if Spain can quell the insurrection, it would appear to the unbiassed that the recent successes of the Spanish troops, and more especially the death of Maceo, cut the ground from underneath the Jingoes in Congress, who are, however, so exasperated that they will for a short time make quite a disturbance. The latest "Bear" rumour has been the alleged suspension of negotiations on the Venezuelan question with this country, but this is an absurd report. There may be more to be said about the poor railway traffics, but, as already stated, these are results really of the past, and in the near future better returns may be anticipated. The Stock Exchanges generally discount the future conditions, and prospects in the United States are such as to justify a much higher level of prices of the Railroad stocks. The very substantial advance in the price of wheat must, in my opinion, have a healthy influence upon the American Market. With the farmers receiving the best price for wheat for years—and corn is bound to follow this movement—the purchasing power in the States is increased enormously. As the farmers now have money to spend it is certain the railroads will have all the tonnage they can handle. In a newspaper interview President Abel, of the Rock Island, thus reviews the present position of the Western Railroads and their future prospects:—

> I expect to see business pick up after January 1, if not before. There has been very little improvement yet, but it takes time for business affairs to re-adjust themselves and settle down. By the first of the year that process will have been accomplished, and then marked improvement should be disclosed. I do not think it will be very great at first, nor very rapid. It will be gradual, but it will be steady. In the west general business is already showing improvement—not very much, but enough for a beginning. It is better that the beginning should be cautious and slow and sure. The railroads will, of course, come in for their share of the improvement which every one expects to see within the coming few months. The outlook for the western roads is very good, and I believe that their future reports will show considerable changes for the better.

From Wall-street an improved demand for City and Railroad bonds is reported, large amounts being absorbed by investors. This is generally the first step towards an improvement also in the share market, and I have no doubt that any one picking up Milwaukee, Louisville, Southern Prefs., and Ordinary, Atchison Prefs., Denver Prefs., and Ordinary at present quotations will, with a little patience, see considerable profits. Amongst bonds, New York and Putnam (guaranteed by the New York Central) Four per Cent. bonds are no longer obtainable under 109, while Lynn and Boston Five per Cents. have been in good demand at 103. Alabama Midland First Mortgage Five per Cent. bonds are firm at 96, and Baltimore and Ohio Five per Cent. Sterling bonds are up at 93. The more important improvement has, however, taken place in Detroit, Grand Haven, and Milwaukee Six per Cent. bonds, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway, which are not now obtainable under 86. All these bonds are still at a very moderate level, and likely to improve. Grand Trunks First Prefs. and Guaranteed have been fairly steady at 32 and 40¾ respectively; but Canadian Pacifics have been dull on a large traffic decrease, and are quoted at 57 only.

Foreigners and South Americans.

The feature in Interbourse securities has been a sharp advance in Spanish to 60¼ on the news of Spanish successes in Cuba. This upward movement has given a better tone to the Paris Bourse generally, where most other speculative favourites have been in demand, including even Turks. The lively gamble in Rio Tinto in Paris has also commenced again. In the South American department a rise of from three to five points in Brazilians has been the feature, on advices that the Brazilian Government is negotiating the sale of the State railways to a German syndicate, headed by Herr Krupp. I do not know that it is exactly a "Bull" point that the Brazilians have to sell their railways in order to restore their financial equilibrium, but I suppose that the operation will at least afford temporary relief. Argentine Government stocks are hardening gradually. In the meantime news has been received by mail of an amusing encounter in the Chambers between Dr. Romero, the Minister of Finance, and Dr. Pellegrini, the ex-President, in which the latter had to hear some home truths from his opponent with regard to the financial excesses that took place during the ex-President's term of office. This was not, perhaps, exactly to the point, but Dr. Romero is evidently determined to oppose the resumption of the full service on the debt through thick and thin. Buenos Ayres Great Southern Four per Cent. Debenture stock has declined to 119, but Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Debenture stock is firm at 108, and is comparatively very cheap. Uruguay bonds have steadied, and are up at 47. It is evident that the insurrection in Uruguay has collapsed. Mexican Sixes have not altogether maintained their highest points, the Old Loan being down to 94½. Peruvian Corporation stocks are slightly firmer, the debentures being quoted 38¼.

The Kaffir Circus Bracing Up.

At last we have a more sustained upward movement in the Kaffir Circus. It is true that the carry-over at the mid-December settlement was still done at very low prices, although not quite so low as had ruled a few weeks earlier. But there has been a considerable improvement since, and it must be admitted that there is a solid basis for this. The crushings of the Witwatersrand mines for November were much more satisfactory than could have been expected in view of the reported scarcity of water, the yield amounting to 201,113 oz., against 199,889 oz. in October, an increase of 1,224 oz. Then, again, several of the Deep-Level crushings were such as to revive the drooping spirits of the Deep-Level supporters, and, finally, it was reported that the Transvaal Government was about to conclude a loan for the purpose of dealing with the dynamite monopoly and the railways. Whether these much-desired operations will come off in the near future is still somewhat doubtful, but there have been for some time rumours current in the South African press that Mr. J. B. Robinson had promised to raise £7,000,000 sterling for the Transvaal chiefly for this object; and the quidnuncs will have it that Mr. Robinson's departure for South Africa had partly to do with this project. Some individuals who boast of being able to see through a brick wall have even discovered that Mr. B. I. Barnato's sudden departure for the Cape was due to the fact that he came on the scent of this business, and wanted to be in the race with Mr. Robinson. However this may be, there is no doubt that the Transvaal Government wishes to conciliate the mining industry as much as possible, and another speech made by President Kruger in Pretoria on the occasion of the prorogation of the Transvaal Volksraad testifies to this wish. A more peaceful utterance could certainly not be imagined, and with the mining industry now going ahead again in a very satisfactory manner, it is time indeed that the level of prices of the shares in sound Transvaal gold and land Companies should be raised materially. I give herewith a list of representative shares with the highest quotations touched in 1896, the making-up prices of the mid-December settlement, and present quotations:—

It will be seen that some quotations have already improved materially, but that others, and more especially some of the most substantial Witwatersrand mines, are still at the same low level, and should also go ahead. I again repeat that amongst the shares which appear to me to offer special prospects of an important advance are Langlaagte Estate, New Primrose, Glencairn, City and Suburban, Robinson, Wolhuter, New Crœsus, Kimberley Roodepoort, Knights, Randfontein, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment, Barnato Consols, Buffelsdoorn, Woodstock (Transvaal), Henderson's Estates, Lydenburg Estates, Oceana Consols, Mozambique, Modderfontein "B," and Waterfall Estates. Some of the crushings were distinctly encouraging, and with the more abundant water supply, which may be anticipated in the near future, I look for further record figures. The Robinson Gold Mine yielded in November 20,184 oz., against 20,018 oz. in October. The Bonanza was to the front with a total yield of 7,182 oz., and most encouraging was the output of the Witwatersrand Gold Mining Company, (Knights), which showed a total yield of 3,689 oz., against 1,970 oz. in October. It will thus be seen that the second crushing is very much better, and there is every prospect of future results showing still further improvements. This return gives an average yield of 10·41 dwts. per ton, and is fully up to expectations. I may mention that Mr. C. J. Johnston, who has been appointed Manager of this property, bears a high character as a very experienced mining engineer, who has won his spurs in California. Langlaagte Block "B," with a yield of 2,427 oz., compared with 2,570 oz. in October. The Langlaagte Estate yielded 8,127 oz., against 8,190 oz. in October. The Porges Randfontein return showed a considerable improvement, being 3,015 oz., against 1,992 oz. in October, although only 30 stamps have been working, owing to illness of the natives on account of the drought. The North Randfontein is to the front with a yield of 1,699 oz., but this does not include tailings and concentrates, these not having been treated on account of the drought, the Company's reservoirs having been completed after the last rainy season was over. Rains were expected every moment, and the Company would then be able to work up to its full power. The Langlaagte Royal production for November was 3,364 oz., against 3,201 oz. in October, and the New Primrose produced for November 7,727 oz., against 6,759 oz. in October. It will be seen from all these various returns that active work is proceeding on the mines, and that the mining position is altogether different from the state of the market. That the latter under these circumstances must sooner or later represent the improving state of the mines is undoubted, and I should think that those who buy before Christmas will have good prospects of large profits in the new year. The only uncertain factor is still the market position in Paris, but when once our French neighbours see that the long lane is turned, and that prices are tending upwards again, they will probably come to their senses, and begin to buy back what they have been throwing overboard. As it is a foregone conclusion that Monday's meeting of the East Rand Proprietary Mines will not adopt the old scheme, the particulars which are now available of the new alternative plan are of interest. It appears that £300,000 are to be lent to the East Rand Company for one year at 6 per cent., while the Angelo Company will issue £150,000 of Six per Cent. debentures for two years, convertible into Angelo shares at 3½ at any time during that period. The capital is to be increased by 50,000 shares for the purpose of this option. Another issue of £100,000 of Six per Cent. Two-year debentures will be made by the Driefontein Company on similar terms. The total amount of these issues, viz., £550,000, will be guaranteed. This is an age of curious changes, and the announcement that Mr. F. J. Dormer has proceeded to South Africa as a Director of the Langlaagte Royal, and in the interest of the Barnato group, to place the affairs of the Langlaagte Royal on a more satisfactory footing, is a peculiar contrast to the acrimonious correspondence which Mr. Dormer originated not long ago. The Paarl Central battery of 70 stamps is stated to have commenced working, which will also add to the current month's output on the Rand. The results obtained by Henderson's Transvaal Estates are satisfactory in times such as these. For the fifteen months ending June 30 the net profit amounted to £37,356, and a dividend of £26,600, or 10 per cent., is proposed to be paid. The scheme for the amalgamation of the United Rhodesia Goldfields and the Buluwayo Syndicate, which I criticised last week, has not been adopted by the shareholders, and it seems to me altogether absurd to unite the two concerns, the claims of one being in Mashonaland, while the claims of the other are mostly in Matabeleland. Another amalgamation scheme is on the board as regards the Rhodesian Mining and Finance Company, the Rights and Exploring of Rhodesia, and the Gourlay's Rhodesia Development Company, concerning which I shall have more to say. The rumour that the New Rietfontein battery has been shut down is not yet so far confirmed, but it has had practically no effect upon the market. The Directors' report of the Sheba Gold Mining Company for the year ending September 30 is a very satisfactory document. The Company has paid dividends of 15 per cent. during its fiscal year, and has paid off Debentures to the amount of £18,750. The yield of gold during that period was 95,889 oz., and the manager expects that the improvements now being made will enable the property to double its monthly crushings, and handle its lower-grade ores at a profit. The Sheba district is likely to come very prominently to the front in the near future, and one of the events to be looked forward to with great interest is the commencement of the crushing of the neighbouring Company, the Woodstock (Transvaal), which may be expected in January. These shares have now improved to 1¼, and are likely to go considerably higher. The Directors' report of the Waterfall Estate and Gold Mines, Limited, will prove an agreeable surprise to the shareholders. Notwithstanding the bad times, the profit and loss account shows a profit on the working of the sixteen months ended June 30, 1896, of £1,458, and a dividend of 5 per cent. is to be declared—absorbing £1,012. The report states that since the incorporation of the Company the Directors have urged on their agents at Johannesburg the necessity of continuing the action for ejectment against the claimholders, and, further, of securing to the Company the Homestead block, and news has just been received that the action will come on in February next. The proceedings had already been instituted when the Jameson raid interrupted them. The Directors confidently hope that they will soon be in full possession of their property. In the meantime the Company is in regular receipt of their claim licences, and from these its revenue has been derived. It is worth mentioning that the capital of the Company is only £25,000 in 100,000 shares of 5s. each, of which 5,381 are fully paid and 94,499 are 4s. paid. The property of the Company is a very important one, and consists of 1,917 acres on the northern portion of the Farm Waterfall, and adjoining that part of the Randfontein Estate on which very valuable discoveries have recently been made. It is almost a foregone conclusion that the Company will gain its action, in which case some very favourable developments may be expected. Diamond shares have also been firmer, and De Beers have improved to 29¼, New Jagersfontein to 10½.

Golden West Australia.

So far West Australian gold mines have not yet braced up in sympathy with the South African department, but should the latter maintain the more favourable tendency now shown it will not be long ere "Bears" of Westralians will take fright. In the meantime greater strength has been displayed by the London and Globe and West Australian Exploring and Finance Companies, and the Northern Territories Gold Fields issue appears also to have proved a great success, the shares being now quoted 4 to 4⅛. Advices from the goldfields are very satisfactory, and a batch of Directors' reports has also been issued, which upon the whole are distinctly encouraging. The shares in the chief issuing Company, the West Australian Joint-Stock Trust, have advanced to 2¼ premium on this success, and West Australian Loan and General stand at ⅝ premium. The Minister of Mines, the Hon. E. H. Wittenoom, before starting on a tour to the Eastern Colonies, where he proposed to further study matters bearing upon his various departments, made a very satisfactory statement to a representative of the Perth Mining Journal before he left, in the course of which he stated that when visiting the mines at Kalgoorlie, Broad Arrow, Kanowna, Bardoc, Goongarrie, Menzies, and other districts he was much pleased with what he saw, and considered that the mines in these districts will prove very good ones, and that the future of these districts is very bright indeed. He also mentioned that he had been at the White Feather Reward Mine, which was splendidly equipped with the best class of machinery, and on which a good deal of work has been done. Mr. Wittenoom stated that everything at Menzies appeared to be in a thriving condition, and he thought that Black Flag had considerable advantages over some of the other districts, for the reason that water appears to be most plentiful there. The Minister also was of opinion that the big water scheme carried through Parliament was absolutely necessary, and he found that the Government plan met with strong support wherever he went. Mr. Wittenoom concluded the interview with the remark that he was determined to grapple with the important question of labour conditions on his return from the other colonies. As my readers are aware, the stringent labour conditions have created much dissatisfaction on the part of those in control of West Australian Finance and Mining Companies, and the Minister's promise is very important. The detractors of the West Australian goldfields should note that the gold exports for November amounted to 30,837 oz., which is a fresh step in advance, and brings up the total for the first eleven months of 1896 to 251,610 oz., against 213,622 oz. for the corresponding period of 1895. In the new year I shall look for these yields to be almost doubled. During the past week the following crushings have again been reported:—

—	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings per Ton.
Lake View Consols ...	720	2,269	30 dwt.
Great Boulder Proprietary	703	2,122	—
Great Boulder Perseverance	560	1,709	—
Burbank's Birthday Gift	55	176	17 dwt.
Pilbarra United	117	170½	10 ,,
Menzies Alpha	53	380	36 ,,
Ejudina	126	156	—
Salisbury - Murchison - Agamemnon	118	84	1½ dwt.

It will be seen that the Lake View Consols and Great Boulder are keeping up their average, but the next Lake View Consols crushing will be much larger as they are now crushing with twenty additional new stamps. The small crushings of the Burbank's Birthday Gift and Menzies Alpha show very high yields, and the Great Boulder Perseverance promises to become one of the big gold-producing mines. Lake View Consols have maintained a firm front at about 7, and Great Boulder are quoted 6½. The West Australian Goldfields group is still in the dumps, but one of these days the "Bears" will no doubt rue their attempts to depress these stocks. West Australian Goldfields are quoted 5⅝, and Hampton Plains, 2 11/16. Hannan's Brownhill, on the other hand, are emancipating themselves from the "Bear" raids, and have advanced sharply to 5 17/16. In the shares which I have pointed out as very moderate in price a considerable business has been transacted, and quotations are as follows:—White Feather Reward 1¾, Great Boulder Main Reef 1¼, Mawson's Reward ⅞, Robinson ¾, East Murchison United 13/16, Mount Margaret 1 1/16, Gladiators ⅝, Burbank's North at par, and Burbank's Consols also at par. Amongst the batch of reports just issued of West Australian mines are those of the Mainland Consols, Paddington Consols, the Golden Crown, the Gladiators, the Menzies Gold Reefs Proprietary, the Menzies Crusoe, and the North White Feather Consolidated. With reference to the Mainland Consols, it may be briefly stated that the mine has crushed 1,372 tons of ore for 6,110 oz. of gold, and that the tailings assay from 5 dwt. to 18 dwt. per ton. Thirty heads of additional stamps are being erected, and the money necessary for this additional machinery has been advanced by the London and Globe Finance Corporation at 5 per cent. interest. This shows the importance of a mine belonging to a strong group. The Golden Crown has not yet reached the crushing stage, but the Directors state in their report that there are 18,000 tons of ore in sight. A battery of ten stamps has been provided, and ten more have been ordered. The Directors of the Gladiators, Limited, state that Professor Nicholas, having reported that the developments were such as to warrant the erection of a 10-head battery, the board have authorised the purchase of the plant, some of which is now on the way to the mine. The value of the ore in sight is estimated by Professor Nicholas at £40,000, which will undoubtedly be much increased before the mill is ready to start. The Menzies Crusoe has had eight crushings, and 5,524 oz. of gold have been obtained from 2,410 tons of ore, the tailings assaying from 7 to 16 dwt. to the ton, and the prospects of future crushings are hopeful. The report of the North White Feather Consolidated states that the development work carried on during the past twelve months has been of a satisfactory nature, and the general manager adds that considerable amounts of ore are ready for crushing. Four of the leases have been developed, and have turned out exceedingly well while the others have yet to be worked. With regard to a remark I recently made in answer to a correspondent in "My Letter Box," I am asked to state that the Directors of the West Boulder are of opinion that the Ivanhoe Reef has been struck in Lease No. 888 at a distance of 172 ft. from Shaft No. 3. I hear with reference to the Central Boulder that the Australian lode has been cut at the 100-ft. level, 15 ft. wide, giving 1 oz. to the ton. A circular has been issued by Mr. S. G. Shead, proposing a scheme of reconstruction of the West Australian (Gold District) Trading Corporation. The present market capitalisation of the Corporation is, roughly, £65,000, and Mr. Shead proposes, therefore, that a new Company be formed with a capital of £100,000, divisible into £65,000 Ordinary shares and £35,000 Preference shares, to provide further working capital. Half the new Ordinary shares are to be allotted to the present holders of Ordinary and the other half to the holders of Founders' shares, but whereas the former would be foregoing their right to a 10 per cent. dividend, before the founders get half the profits, he (Mr. Shead) suggests that they have the right to apply for the Preference shares in the new Company, such Preference shares to be entitled to five-sixths of the profits, and the Ordinary shareholders to have the option of paying them off within, say, three years, at a price to be fixed forthwith. Without wishing to express any definite opinion upon this scheme, I yet think that the business and assets of the Company are sufficiently valuable for the shareholders to do their best to place the Company on a sound basis again. A rival plan is, however, being put forward. That the Board will have to be reconstructed goes without saying. It is difficult to recognise under the name of the North Coolgardie Company, Limited, the old "Callao Bis, Limited," which survived twenty years without paying a single dividend. It will be remembered that this Company acquired some leases on the advice of Mr. H. Lancaster Hobbs, who subsequently reported that he had been altogether misled in recommending the purchase, and that the mine would not pay. The Directors' report now issued mentions another disappointment, that with reference to the Heidelburg Daspoort, which they had intended to acquire, but this business fell through owing to the trouble in the Transvaal. The Directors are therefore still on the warpath, looking for properties. In the meantime I would suggest to them that they ought to forego their remuneration of £450, which again figures in the balance-sheet, being at the rate of £150 per annum each. The Directors' fees have been regularly drawn for twenty years, while the shareholders have never received a penny.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

Indian gold mines have again moved somewhat irregularly, although improvements preponderated, Mysore Gold Gold, Mysore West, and Wynaard, Nine Reefs, and Champion Reefs, being all better. Kempincote are, however, easier, and Kadur Mysore have declined. Amongst Australian mines other than West Australians, Aladdin's Lamp are lower at 1¾. Bendigo, Mount Lyell, and Mount Morgan are easier, and Charters Towers mines have also been dull. Mill's Day Dawn United, Day Dawn P.C., and Mosman, gave way; but New Queen are firmer. Croydon Consols are steady at 10s. 6d., and will in a few days be quoted ex. the dividend of one shilling per share, which ought to be promptly recovered. North Croydon Consols remain at 3s. 9d., and La Reine d'Or look promising at 5s. A better tone has prevailed for New Zealand mines, Hauraki having improved to 17s. on the announcement of a dividend of 1s., and there have also been advances in New Zealand Joint-stock Trust, Waitekauri, and Waihi; but Waihi Silverton, Woodstock, Komata Reefs, Komata Queen, Royal Oak, and Tokatea are all lower. There has also been a setback in Taitapu Estates, but advices from this property continue very satisfactory. The shares in the Consolidated Goldfields of New Zealand, Limited, have come into demand at 3⅛, on the issue of a batch of reports from the Managing Director in New Zealand, Mr. David Ziman. The Company has already formed several sub-Companies, amongst which are the Humphrey Hydraulic Sluicing Company, with a capital of £150,000. The property acquired by this undertaking covers 200 acres of auriferous alluvial ground, and on either side of this property the parent Company has four claims of 100 acres, together with water-rights. The other properties which the Consolidated Goldfields of New Zealand have acquired are twenty-five building allotments in the City of Wellington; the Golden Fleece group of mines, covering 470 acres, which has been an old gold producer, the Wealth of Nations, Energy, Gladstone, and Beaconsfield group, covering 286 acres, which yielded large dividends in the past; and the Rosebery and Caledonian group; in addition to which there is another group of mines, including the Globe and Progress, covering 740 acres. According to Mr. Ziman, a line of reef traverses the last-mentioned properties, which is in parts 20 ft. thick, the ore being of rich quality, while the mines are also coal-bearing. One of the features of the various claims is that the former owners have obtained large returns from them, and that, with improved appliances, there is every prospect of obtaining similar yields from the deeper portions of the mines, in which developments are proving very satisfactory. The Managing Director's report is certainly very encouraging, and shows the various important assets of the Consolidated Goldfields of New Zealand, Limited, as likely to have a great future. In the general Foreign section business has been inactive, and losses are marked in Frontino and Bolivia, Doric, and Burma Ruby, but Richmond have improved. Grand Central are quoted at 2⅜. With reference to the remark of the Mining World and Engineering Record, in which it is suggested that my favourable reference to the "Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico" may possibly refer to some extension of or consolidation with the Goldfields of Mexico registered last June, I have to state that this is not so, and that the Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico is a new Company which has acquired some very valuable mining properties in Mexico not hitherto owned in this country, the prospectus of which will be issued shortly. A sharp recovery has taken place in Rio Tinto to 25 on Paris purchases, but the shares in the New Mountain Copper Mining Company, which has just gone to allotment, have dropped to ¼ discount.

The "Moses Moss" Toy Fund.

I am pleased to find that my appeal to my readers for contributions towards the "Truth Toy Fund" has been further responded to. There is, however, still great need of funds, and I should be glad to be favoured with contributions from the other numerous readers of my remarks. Last week I was able to announce a total of £97. 5s. 6d., and I have since received the following subscriptions:—

E. D. Oppert, £2. 2s.; "West Australia," £2. 2s.; John Waddington, £2. 2s,; W. H. Morrison, £5. 5s.; F. C. Poisson, £1. 1s.; G. H. Kearton, £1. 1s.; Wm. Stephens, £1. 1s.; Atkinson and Dresser, £1. 1s.; C.B.C., 10s. 6d.; J. C. H., 10s. 6d.; A. B. C. D., 5s.; Sir Christopher Furness, £1. 1s.; G. H. Collins, £1. 1s.; Geo. S. Gunnis, £1. 1s.; A. M. Aitkin, £1. 1s.; H. Walter, £2. 2s.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

W. B. Dick & Company, Limited.—With a capital of £250.000, this Company is formed to acquire the business of W. B. Dick, of Glasgow, London, and elsewhere, oil refiners and importers, and manufacturers of anti-fouling paint for coating ship-bottoms.

The capital asked for this concern I consider is altogether excessive. It must not be lost sight of by investors that there are many other firms dealing in the same commodities. The anti-fouling paints on the market for coating the bottoms of ships are numerous, and the competition both in this article and in oils is very keen.

Kibble's Stores, Limited.—This Company is formed to acquire the business of provision dealers, grocers, wine, spirit, and beer merchants, carried on by Messrs. Kibble & Co., Broadway, Deptford, and amalgamating therewith twenty-one other businesses of a similar nature. The capital is fixed at £175,000.

After a careful perusal of this prospectus I certainly cannot recommend any of my readers to touch it. It appears to me to be a promoters' amalgamation of good, bad, and indifferent shops, the trading results of which look very dubious. Some of the businesses, no doubt, are sound and good, while others, from their situation, cannot be worth much. Why were not the individual returns and profits of the various businesses given?

The Haycraft Gold Reduction and Mining Company, Limited.—To acquire the exclusive rights for Western Australia of Haycraft's Gold Extraction Process, together with a leasehold battery site of five acres in extent, and to acquire and develop the Victory and Hearts of Oak Gold Mines, comprising an area of about thirty-six acres, this Company has been formed with a capital of £200,000, in shares of £1 each. The present issue is of £95,000, of which £40,000 is now offered for subscription, the vendor taking £55,000 in shares and £20,000 in cash, leaving £20,000 for immediate working capital.

It is claimed for the Haycraft Gold Extracting Process, which has been acquired by this Company, that it is cheap, that salt water—which is so abundant in Western Australia—can be used with it instead of fresh; also that the quantity of water required is small, that the adjuncts are simple, that a saving in time is effected, and that no slimes or tailings are formed, with a consequent saving of any loss of gold. The prospectus states that at a trial crushing of the experimental plant, which was erected at Adelaide, 6 to 10 per cent. more gold was obtained by the Haycraft process in two hours than by the battery and cyanide treatment combined in forty-eight hours. If these important claims are borne out by actual results, the Haycraft Process would have a great future before it, especially in Western Australia.

Dominion of Canada.—Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co. are authorised to receive subscriptions for the City of Quebec of £664,480 Three and a Half per Cent. Consolidated Registered stock. The issue is made for the purpose of converting and redeeming outstanding issues of the City of Quebec Sterling debentures. The issue price is £96 per cent.

Hall's Oxford Brewery, Limited.—Subscriptions are invited for £100,000 First Mortgage Debenture stock, at £102½ per cent., of this Company. The share capital is £115,000, divided into Preference and Ordinary shares of £5 each, the whole of which has been subscribed by the Directors and their friends. Applications are to be made to Messrs. Parsons, Thompson, & Co., Bankers, of Oxford; or to their London agents, Messrs. Coutts & Co., 50, Strand, W.C.

The Mercantile Bank of London, Limited.—This Bank invites subscriptions for 10,000 shares of £10 each, at a premium of 10s. per share. The authorised capital is £250,000, divided into 25,000 shares of £10 each, of which 4,280 have been already subscribed. Ten thousand are now offered at a premium of 10s. per share, and the balance, 10,720, is to be held in reserve.

Swansea United Breweries, Limited.—This is an issue of £50,000 Four and a Half per Cent. First Mortgage debentures of £100 each, at the price of £105, secured on the Company's brewery and the freehold and leasehold property now vested in the Company, and a floating charge on the other property owned by the Company. The bonds are redeemable in 1917 at £110 on six months' notice.

This Company was formed in 1890 with a share capital of £50,000, divided into Preference and Ordinary shares of £5 each, to purchase and amalgamate two breweries at Swansea, known as the Orange Tree Brewery and the Glamorgan Brewery. I cannot gather from the prospectus that there has been any large increase in the business, neither can I recommend this as a sound debenture issue.

Richmond & Chandler, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring as a going concern the business of machine manufacturers and engineers carried on by Richmond & Chandler, at the Globe Works, Manchester. The share capital is fixed at £35,000, divided into Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and Ordinary shares of £5 each, and 500 Four and a Half per Cent. First Mortgage debentures of £50 each.

Although the Directors consider the "combined chaff cutter and sifter a specially valuable invention with a great future," it will be as well to wait and see what the future may possibly bring before investing any money in this venture.

The Birmingham Hotel and Restaurant Company, Limited.—This Company is formed, with a capital of £100,000, divided into Five and a Half per Cent. Preference shares, and Ordinary shares of £10 each, to acquire and extend and carry on under one management an hotel, two restaurants, and a wine and spirit merchant's business in Birmingham.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

A. T.—Yes, I should think that a purchase of these bonds would be opportune just now. Perplexed, Grimsby.—The rumours with reference to the insurrections are evidently greatly exaggerated. Hold. S. H., Harrow-road.—I can only advise you to hold for an improvement, as all the adverse rumours appear to be unreliable.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Enquirer, Kirkcaldy.—This is evidently a syndicate tout; have nothing whatever to do with him. Neither do I advise you to deal with the other outside broker mentioned. You should do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. Trust.—This is a matter which must be governed by the circumstances of the case, and you should consult a solicitor. M. Don.—I can only repeat that this firm continues to send out letters and circulars from the address mentioned in Paris, 11, Place de la Bourse. What is the object of your inquiry? Verdant Green.—No; not at all a safe guide, but only a puff, as you think. Mrs. B., Kensington.—As a matter of principle, I cannot recommend individual stockbrokers; you will be easily able to get the name of a reliable firm through your bankers. I should advise you to leave the British Motor Syndicate severely alone, but Bovrils are worth buying now. M. Y. L. A.—There seems to be no particular reason for buying these. Miss M. C., Dublin.—I cannot reply to your letter without having some further particulars. What kind of shares do you want to invest in, mining, industrial, American, or Home Railway stocks? Jasmine.—Thanks for the circular; it is pots calling kettles black. Associated Gold Mines of Western Australia (1) are a promising purchase, but African Coal (2) should be left alone. J. W., Durham.—You cannot obtain a return of 5 per cent. with absolute safety. You might get from 4 to 4½ per cent. in high-class American Railroad bonds, some of which I mentioned last week. T. F., Palmer's Green.—I advise you to have nothing to do with the insurance concern in question, which is not established on sound lines. I cannot reply by letter. Cold Iron.—No; outside brokers, with whom you should not deal. You ought to do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. In the case of outside brokers you will find that while you do not pay any commission, you will be charged higher prices. Corrigenda.—Of the two banks mentioned, I should prefer No. 1.

Home Rails.

Tabby.—The trouble between the Railway Companies and their employees has been adjusted, and you should not be frightened out. Peter.—While I agree with you that Vestas (Railway Investment Deferred) are worthy of notice, you must keep in view the fact that the assets of this Company consist chiefly of the stocks of the Heavy lines, which may again come under the cloud of labour troubles. The pooling arrangement is expected to benefit the Mexican Railway, together with the other lines. I do not wish to express any view with regard to the Dynamite Company.

American and Foreign Rails.

T. L. T.—Yes, your client should certainly hold Atchison Prefs. and Northern Pacific Prefs. There is every prospect of an improvement in the American market, especially in the new year. A. E. C.—Hold Northern Pacifics; they will doubtless recover. G. R.—A very speculative investment, and no particular temptation to buy. Jay.—1. Yes, a fair investment. 2. Only one-half-yearly dividend of 2 per cent. used to be paid, but now the bonds have become a fixed charge, and the interest is to be paid twice a year. Martin.—I can only advise you to make your investment from the list of American Railroad bonds repeatedly mentioned by me. You would, of course, select the best ones, which are as follows:—New York and Putnam Four per Cent. bonds at 108¼, yielding £3. 16s. 6d. per cent.; Illinois Central Four per Cent. Bonds at 105½, yielding £3. 18s. 6d. per cent.; Manhattan Consolidated Four per Cent. bonds at 98, yielding £4. 4s. 9d. per cent.; and Lynn and Boston First Mortgage Five per Cent. bonds at 103, yielding £5 per cent. Scot, Glasgow.—1. Hold Missouri Kansas Seconds for a rise. 2. There is nothing against Missouri Kansas Firsts. 3. Southern Ordinary are a good lock-up.

Mining Shares.

Nemo.—It is expected that suitable arrangements will be made under a reconstruction to place the W.A. (Gold District) Trading Company on a sound basis. You should hold and support the efforts about to be made. Boxer.—Hold all your mining shares for an improvement, which has, in fact, already commenced. Hopeful.—Hold your West Australian Mining shares, Nos. 1-5. Yes, it is a good time to average. Alpha and Omega.—The Company ought, of course, to have given you due notice, if your name and address were correctly registered, but you would also have found the notice in the newspapers, and I am afraid you have no redress. W. N.—No, you are not entitled to the Randfontein bonus, having bought too late. Pouce.—Both the Randfontein and African Estates are promising Companies, and you will do well to average. Hold Langlaagte Star and New Midas. For the investment of your £1,000 you can make your selection from the list of shares given in my letter. J. O. H.—Thanks for your contribution to the toy fund. Yes, you should average Great Boulder South. Senex.—Ramage Syndicate have fallen in sympathy with the rest of the West Australian market. Experience.—I will submit your scheme to the Directors and report again. West Park.—1. The first crushings of Hannan's Golden Group cannot come yet for some months, but it is advisable to average soon. 2 Hold. 3. There is no reason why Menzie's Crusoe should be so low, as crushings are good. Hold, and buy more to average, if you can afford to do so. F. T.—Yes, hold for a recovery, and see remarks under "Golden West Australia." R. W. R.—Yes, both are worth buying. North Wales.—The next Randfontein Estate Directors' report is not due for some time yet. 2. These shares are speculative, but you had better hold. G. L. E., Kens.—Yes, the scheme of reconstruction of the West Australian Gold District Trading Company is worth considering. See remarks under "Golden West Australia." Constant Reader, Wallingford.—Yes, you should be entitled to the Randfontein bonus. Why do you not claim it? B. H. W.—A. No, the three West Australian Gold Mines, Nos. 1, 2, and 4, are not over-capitalised, and are worth buying. B.—Yes. 2. No, the Randfontein is not interested in the deep levels. It has a large number of outcrop mines on its property. Harrogate.—You should hold your shares Nos. 1-11 for an improvement, and you might well buy more of Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7 to average. Buy also more Randfontein. W. C. M.—If you were a regular reader of Truth you would have gathered all the information from my letters concerning the position of the New Primrose and Glencairn. I cannot really repeat this. Amongst the shares Nos. 1—9 I prefer Nos. 3, 6, and 7, but if you are a holder you should hold all. Hopeful, Ebbw Vale.—1. Yes; it is understood that the New Bultfontein will go on paying dividends. 2. Yes. 3. Yes, they are a good purchase. 4. You will find what you require in my letter under "Rally in the Kaffir Circus" and "Golden West Australia." M. A. M.—The name of a smart firm of solicitors is forwarded in your envelope as requested. Puck.—Hold for a recovery. A. B. C. D.—Thanks for the contribution to the Truth Toy Fund. 1. Quite so. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. Cheap enough, but it may be advisable to wait. 5. I do not care for this concern. Thirsley.—1. Yes; the Langlaagte Royal Mine will come along again. 2. Yes; very likely. 3. Impossible to tell, they must first strike the reef. 4. Not yet. Lex.—A somewhat mixed list; I should prefer Nos. 1, 2, 5, 7, and 9. Burnwest.—No; I do not like Potchefstroom. Certainly hold Modderfontein for a rise now. Old Head.—I know nothing of this issue, and do not consider the scheme at all promising. O.—Hannan's Golden Treasure should be held for an important advance. H. P. L.—1. No; they pay no dividend. 2. Possibly, but it is a very speculative mine. 3. There is hardly any market. 4. Possibly, all depends upon the general course of the Mining market. Perplexed Trustee.—You should certainly hold the shares of a late holder, as the tendency of the Mining market is favourable, and an improvement from the recent panic prices may be anticipated. Wishtower.—The fall in these shares is entirely due to the general weakness of the Mining market. When it recovers, these shares will also go better. Parade Avenue.—You should certainly hold your Johnnies and African Estates. Before June next, when you want the money, they are sure to be much higher. This also applies to Randfontein. G. B. C.—All your shares, Johnnies Consolidated, Porges Randfontein, and Menzies Gold Estates, should be held for a rise. A much better crushing has come to hand from the Porges Randfontein, and Menzies are likely to improve. Volt.—If you are a holder in the well-known Ivanhoe Company you are doing extremely well, as the price has risen to about £11. Granite.—Hold all your shares, Nos. 1 to 8, for an advance, and buy more of Randfontein (1), and Pigg's Peak (5). Daylight.—1. As you can make a good profit on these shares, why not take it. I do not attach any value to the publication in question, and the mine is doing well. All your mining shares, Nos. 2 to 8, should be held for a rise. 9. It is quite impossible to obtain with absolute safety from 4 to 5 per cent. in commercial investments. What you had better do is to make up a little trust of American Railroad bonds and Home Brewery debentures. T. W., Hereford.—In order to be able to resist payment of calls, you ought to be able to prove misrepresentation, and these gentry generally word their prospectuses so carefully, that this is a very difficult matter. Alpha, Belfast.—Yes, Buffelsdoorn Estates are an excellent speculation at the present low price. Knutsford.—The price is very low, but too little is known of the present position of this concern. Adelphi.—I advise you to leave the Faith Gold Mine alone. I, at least, have no faith in it. India.—I still think that this mine will come right, and I strongly advise you to hold them. J. D. B., Northumberland-avenue.—I note what you say with reference to the George Goch Mine, and I quite think that you are justified in holding the shares for a better price. But you will excuse me if I prefer making up my list of mines to be recommended to my readers without exactly including them. W. C. M.—I still maintain a favourable opinion of Glencairn, and have repeatedly given my reasons. The mine is likely to do well in consequence of the amalgamation with the Glenluce. J. W. C., Dursley.—The circulars of the Great Southern Tin and Gold Fields, Limited, is returned in your envelope. I have no special information upon this concern, but I do not like the look of it. I cannot reply by letter. Revisco.—This is a promising Company, and your best policy is to hold for an improvement. I cannot reply by letter, and, as a matter of principle, I cannot recommend individual stockbrokers. Leamington.—Wealth of Nations should come right in time, when they have a full supply of water. 2. No option but to hold. 3. Hold Randfontein, and Lake View Consols should also be held. A Shareholder.—I quite agree with you that the Directors of the W.A. Gold District Trading Corporation ought to do their best to put matters right, but it would be preferable to infuse new blood into the Board. M. I. S.—Although Langlaagte Estate have declined to 4¼, they are still an excellent investment, and you should hold. 2. There seems to be no option but to hold. H. M., Gainsborough.—There must have been some confusion in the questions and replies. The mine is a promising one, and you should hold your shares in both Lake View South and Hannan's Development. W. W.—No option but to hold these shares; they should recover again. R. M. S.—There seems to be every prospect of a recovery. Aaron.—1. The dividend will doubtless be paid in cash, but I cannot tell you how much. 2. There can be no chance of a dividend yet, but the mine is doing well. E. H. F., Ken.—1. Yes; efforts are being made to reconstruct the Board of the West Australian Gold District Trading Association. 2. I have an unfavourable opinion of this concern, which I stated at the time the prospectus was issued. Weston-super-Mare.—All your shares should be held for a rise. Trading.—Hold for a recovery. Withington.—No fresh information is available with regard to the first-named mine, but it is expected to do well. Hold the West Australian Mining shares. Jean.—1. No report has yet been issued. 2. It does not matter which of the two you sell; both are bound for higher prices. Dan.—Hold all your shares for a rise. J. H. B.—Hold your mining shares, but do not buy more to average yet. C. These are worth buying. W. C. M.—I fully explained the position of the Glencairn some time ago; you should hold the shares. W. P.—Yes, there is every prospect of a recovery. J. S. L.—I do not like either of the two companies—Queensland Menzies or Queensland Sherrey. Eclipse.—I have always expressed an unfavourable view of these, and do so still. W. G. H.—Hold No. 1 for a recovery. No reason to sell Nos. 2 and 3. 4. Yes. Muskeg.—Hold. H. I. N.—I do not consider the Credo mine a promising one. Ashway.—1. Lake View Consols should be held. 2. Hold Wealth of Nations. 3. No reason to sell. 4. Certainly hold.

Notice to Connoisseurs of Fine Dry Champagne.—Périnet & Fils' Cuvée Réservée, Extra Sec, is in magnificent condition, at Hôtel Cecil, Hôtel Savoy, Midland Grand Hotel, Spiers & Pond's Hotels and Buffets, and most leading Hotels & Restaurants.

5. No option but to hold. F. W. S.—You should certainly hold your Johannesburg Cons. Investment shares. They will doubtless have a marked recovery.

INDUSTRIAL SHARES.

Beef Tea.—There is no option but to hold your shares now, although you ought not to have applied for so large a number. There is, however, every prospect of a recovery. Sydenham.—The Paquin Company is, in my opinion a promising undertaking. Seaside.—I think you had better wait, as you suggest. C. B. A.—No option but to hold for a recovery, which is more than probable. Manningtree.—1. A fair investment. 2. There has been a reaction recently, upon which they should be a good purchase. M. M. M.—1. No, I do not see why this should prove temporary. 2. Yes. J. H. E., Dowlais.—I do not make any charge for answering inquiries. The Maypole Soap Company is promising. I return five penny stamps, the other penny being used for franking the same. Grocer.—No reason for selling now. Duke.—Bovril Deferred shares are promising, I do not like the others so well. Oroman.—These cycle shares are no catch. A. C. M., Birmingham.—No particular reason to sell. Priest.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you I prefer Bovril Preferred and Deferred (4) and Gordon Hotels (6). E. S. W.—I do not by any means say that this concern is in a shaky condition. On the contrary, efforts are apparently being made to place it on a very sound footing. Ivan.—I have not a favourable opinion of this Company, but you had better await an opportunity to get out. F. A. H.—I do not recommend the investment. Expectans, Dublin.—Write to the Secretary for information. Amateur.—1. As a matter of principle I do not recommend individual stockbrokers. The charge varies with the amount and class of the investment. T. L. D.—No particular reason for selling in a hurry, but do so when you have a chance of clearing a good profit.

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

A. G. S.—You have done quite right in buying Northern Pacific Four per Cent. Prior Lien and General Lien Three per Cent. bonds, and you should hold for a rise (1). 2. Probably, but this is one of the concerns against which I warned my readers in the past. 3. Not much chance of the Oregon Short Line paying any bonded interest for the present. 4. This was for arrears of interest. 5. I suppose the general slump has prevented it, but you should hold. 6. Hold for a rise. W. W.—1. Hold Uruguay bonds and buy more to average. 2. Yes. A. H. B.—Certainly hold your Uruguay bonds, but I do not think much of the other debentures mentioned. Azof.—You had better hold Uruguay bonds now as the insurrection appears to be over; and certainly hold your mines, Nos. 1 to 4. Hamlet, Gosforth.—The Maxim-Nordenfelt Gun Company is apparently doing much better, and you should hold. There is no option but to hold the tin mines. Z. Y. X.—1. This brewery is a promising undertaking. 2. Not just yet. 3. No option but to hold; see report of the meeting held on Friday last. 4. Yes, a wealthy American office, but I prefer insuring with English companies. 5. Yes. 6. No catch. 7. Not yet. Ash.—No, I do not recommend purchase of the shares Nos. 1 to 5; you can do better in those mentioned in my letter. Geisha.—Hold all your shares Nos. 1 to 8, but get out of Nos. 2, 5, and 6 as soon as you get an opportunity. Nemo, Doncaster.—1. Yes. 2. The rumour about the uprising of natives in South Africa is absurd. Hold your shares and buy more to average if you can afford to do so. Worthing.—You should hold all your mining shares at present for a rise. Sell No. 1 when you have a good profit. T. B.—With reference to your shares Nos. 1 to 10, there is no reason to sell any of the high-class stocks unless you wish to obtain a higher yield. Nos. 6 and 7 is a local concern, about which no information is available here; but upon the whole there is no reason to sell any of your investments. Fredington.—You ought to have bought Dover "A" and Coras at once, do not delay now. I do not like La Campana. Jumbo.—No; I do not consider Nos. 1 to 3 worth buying. You can do better by making your selection from my letter under "The Kaffir Circus Bracing Up." Nestor.—Your list is a fair one of Industrial Investments, which should be held. The Mining shares A to F should certainly be held, and you ought to average the lot if you can afford to do so. A. M. C.—Hold your shares Nos. 1 to 5, and join the reconstruction of No. 5. Irish Stew.—There is nothing to be done but to hold Nos. 1 to 12 for a rise, which is sure to come if you have a little patience. Amongst the cycle shares I like Dunlops (2), but not Beestons (1). Miner.—Nos. 1 to 6 should be held for a rise, and, if you can afford it, you should average Nos. 4 and 6. No reason to sell Nos. 7 to 14. Ne Quid Nimes.—The best thing you can do is to put the money in American Railroad bonds, as mentioned in my letter last week. E. U.—Amongst the cycle companies mentioned by you I like Singer, Swift, and Humber; but not the others. Amongst the gold mines I prefer Lake View Consols, Hampton Plains, Great Boulder Main Reef, and Burbank's Birthday Gift. Perso-Meter.—1. Yes. Harrod's Stores should be suitable for you. 2. I should prefer London and Globe Finance as an investment. Scarbro'.—You should disregard the circulars of this outside concern. The shares are promising, and should be held. I do not think much of the Howe Cycle and Sewing Machine Company, and you should take an opportunity to get out. H. D., Batley.—A fair investment. The Lake View Consols will pay dividends in good time, but none are announced yet. Amongst your mines Nos. 1 to 15 there are a few good ones; but all should be held for an improvement. Bagot.—These are a good investment.

VARIOUS INVESTMENTS.

Although the Money Market gathered some temporary strength from the requirements of the Stock Exchange settlement, rates are easing off again. It is not, however, at all likely that we shall see any substantial fall in the value of money this side of the new year. On the contrary, as we are approaching the end of 1896 rates will doubtless stiffen, and a little stringency is quite on the cards until in January the dividends are released, when a reduction in the Bank rate may be looked for. Germany is drawing gold from the open market, and it is still feared that India will require a certain amount; but there is no prospect of a resumption of gold shipments to the United States. Silver is slightly firmer at 30d., and Rupee Paper has improved to 63⅛, while India Three per Cent. stock has also advanced to 109½. Consols, after declining, are up again at 112⅛ for the account. A moderate business has been transacted in Cycle shares, and prices have been pretty well maintained. Dunlop Deferred are quoted 1½, Humber Extensions and Ordinary 1 5/16, New Beestons at 3⅛. Swift Cycles have been a good market at about ⅛ premium, and there has been a considerable demand for Gladiators at ⅜ premium. Bagot Tyre shares are quoted at 3 premium, and the "Bears" are evidently in a tight place, the more so as a special settlement has been applied for. The statements made with regard to the business of the Bovril Company by Lord Playfair at Monday's formal meeting are most favourable. It appears that the profits from June 30 to November 18, which belong to the new Company, showed a greater rate of increase than indicated in the prospectus, and that from November 19 to December 9 the business has increased 68 per cent., in comparison with 1895. Amongst Brewery shares Allsopps have fluctuated, touching 182, and reacting to 180½. In the shares of the Financial Times, Limited, further dealings are reported at 2⅞ to 3, and this class of investment is becoming quite popular, Financial News Ordinary and Preference shares having also come into demand. Who are William Leonard & Co., Stock, Share, and Mining Brokers and Dealers, Bridge House, Queen Victoria-street, London, E.C.? They are sending out circulars headed, "Systematic Weekly Operations in Stocks and Shares." It is, of course, the old syndicate-touting business, although Wm. Leonard & Co. assert that "the system is one of extreme caution, the selection of steadily moving Investment stocks with those of more fluctuating tendencies; the Combination being arranged to secure small profits on the favourable daily fluctuations, the chief object in view being always the safety of the capital employed." It would be interesting to know what the results of Wm. Leonard & Co.'s previous "operations" have been to their clients. I have repeatedly expressed my views concerning the touting efforts of the Campsie Glen Whiskey Company, Limited, which is endeavouring to increase its business by promising fully-paid shares to each purchaser of one case of twelve bottles of their whiskey. Circulars are now again being scattered broadcast over the land, and the extraordinary feature is introduced that Press notices are printed on the back of these circulars, one from the Financial News and the other from TRUTH, both of which were of an uncomplimentary description. Footnotes are added, in which the attempt is made to refute these criticisms. In this, however, the Campsie Glen Whiskey Company, Limited, has been extremely unsuccessful. I maintain the view that as the Campsie Glen proprietors are presumably not philanthropists, it may be supposed that their profit on the whiskey will be sufficient for them to make the sacrifice of a share per case; and if the shares are worth anything the better plan would be for the proprietors to sell their whiskey so much cheaper.—Your affectionate Uncle,

QUEER STORY.

THE DOLL THAT SPOKE.

"HOLD me up, uncle, very high up. I can't see, and, oh, they are so beautiful! You were a darling to bring me, but what is the use of my being here if I can't see?"

Uncle Dick, who was forty, and handsome and tall, obediently lifted up Buntie, who was four and an autocrat, and very like a golden-haired doll herself in the latest thing in fur-trimmed pelisses and bewitching baby bonnets.

The Albert Hall was very crowded, and, glittering with thousands of toys, seemed a very fairy-land to Buntie, whose heart was wrung with longing for the dolls, despite the fact that a large family, very pale with much kissing, slept peacefully in her gay nursery in Berkeley-square.

"But, Buntie, these are for little girls who have no dollies."

"Doesn't Santa Claus come to them, then? I think he must be a naughty old man if he only comes to me, and I have lots and lots of things."

"Don't you see, Buntie, there are kind ladies who remember the other little girls, and they dress all these dollies and send them to Santa Claus in case his supply runs short."

"I would like to send them one of mine," said Buntie. "It must be so drefful to have none on Christmas."

Uncle Dick had no very clear notion of the utter desolation this terrible idea implied to Baby Buntie—Buntie, who woke rapturously on the most magical of all mornings, with full trust in the annual miracle that was the securest certainty of her little creed. Then not only the tiny stocking would be brimful of delights, but all the nursery turned into a novel wonder-world of joyful surprises.

But something in the sweet spontaneous pity of the child touched him, and he put his hand into his pocket with a sense of compunction that the hard fate of those forgotten by Santa Claus had never been brought home to him.

"I think I can show you the way. Take this, darling."

Buntie proudly dropped a shining coin into the chariot of a very captivating fairy queen, and gazed about her from her lofty coign of vantage with rose-flushed cheeks and eyes like stars.

They had got among the dolls in fancy dresses, and even Major Dick Marazion found, as usual, that taking Buntie out pleasuring meant amusement. The girls—and they were numerous enough—who had tried to marry Dick Marazion would not have known that impenetrable gentleman in the guise of Buntie's willing slave.

Once upon a time, before the death of Dick's godfather and the comfortable two thousand a year that had come to him after that event, he had been madly in love. For one season Sylvia Berwick, the sweet daughter of the most outrageously vulgar man that ever made and lost a fabulous fortune, had queened it over Society and Dick's heart. But old Berwick wanted a title and more for the daughter, whose beauty he rated at its full commercial value. Sylvia's tears had not availed to keep the young lover she had chosen; and she had no mother to plead for her.

Dick had been ordered to India, and very soon after old Berwick had gone under, as they say. This time in a double sense, for the crash that took his fortune took his life, and left Sylvia absolutely alone in the world. Society was naturally too busy with its own concerns to remember the comet of a day, and Dick had been at first sore and angry, then cynical, over his own passion.

The organ played Christmas hymns, the hymns that, whether we will or no, take us back, and exercise such subtle magic. Even to the most careless listener they had a touch of fresh significance among these gay memorials of good-will and kindliness, not towards men but towards the children, to whom the pitiless heritage of the sins of the fathers comes with such cruel force.

Suddenly Dick's eye was riveted by a pair of immense dolls, and his heart beat as it had not beaten for fifteen years.

"The very best of all, in my opinion," two admiring spectators near him were saying. "'A Colonel in the Days of the Duke of Marlborough' and 'A Lady of the Same Period,' dressed by—oh, give me my glasses—'Miss Sylvia Berwick, 11, Teck-terrace, West Kensington.' There is only one fault, perhaps. Did ladies carry bouquets in those days?"

Not in those days, perhaps, but certainly in the days when in all Covent Garden there seemed no lilies of the valley fresh enough for Captain Marazion to send to Miss Berwick for Lady Hurstmonceux's fancy ball—the ball where she had figured as a lady of the Court of Queen Anne, and he as one of Marlborough's colonels.

How well he remembered it! Some benevolent girl had told him what Sylvia was to wear, and he had chosen his own dress accordingly. They had been much commented upon as the successes of the night, and in the pauses of a Waldteufel waltz he had told her that he loved her, and she—ah, for the kiss hurriedly exchanged in the conservatory among the pink lamps and friendly shady palms!

So she had never married, then, after all. He thought of the bright face, of the crowd of eager partners round the pretty heiress. Not one of them all true to the woman when her hour of tribulation came. Or was it because she had not forgotten him? Impossible. The dolls stared at him as only dolls do stare. The jaunty Colonel, with everything complete; the dainty damsel, in delicate sea-blue brocade, with her lilies in her hand. He so dark, she so fair, just as they had been.

"Oh, the dear little man. Oh, let me kiss him, Uncle Dick."

Forced back to fact, and Buntie growing restless, he took a sudden resolution.

"Have you had enough, Buntie? Would you like to go where cake is?"

"Are there chocolates there, too?" queried that small person.

"Everything," said her uncle, persuasively.

"Then let's go. Good-bye, dear dollies; good-bye all. I hope the poor little girls will love you very much."

It was half-past three and a sunny December afternoon. Buntie got her chocolates—twice as many as were good for her—before she was handed back to tell her nurse of the wonders of the Albert Hall.

"I dare say I'm a fool, but I mean to do it," said Dick to himself as he came out of his sister's house and hailed a hansom.

"Eleven, Teck-terrace; and, look here, stop first at that big Bond-street florist's."

There were not many lilies, and they were dear, but he bought every one. The interminable cab drive was like a dream dominated by the two great dolls. He could not think consecutively. The old ache, the old longing, had come insistently back. The cabman lost his way twice in a desert of mean houses with empty "art" pots on the smutty ledges, and pallid yellow muslin curtains a breadth too narrow. At last he stopped at a quiet, unprepossessing row. No. 11 at least had clean steps, and a clean servant opened the door.

"Does Miss Berwick live here?"

"Yes, sir, but she is not at home."

"That is unfortunate, for I wanted to see her particularly."

"On business, sir?"

"Yes," said Dick, untruthfully.

"Then, if you please, sir, I was to ask you to wait. Miss Berwick will be in directly."

Xmas Presents.—Some extraordinary Teas now being sold by Cooper Cooper & Co., Ltd., Tooley-street, London. C. C. & Co. in all their experience have rarely met with such marvellous teas.

Mortlock's China and Glass Business, Oxford-st., has entered its 150th year, being founded by John Mortlock in 1746. It is carried on by John George Mortlock, the great-great-grandson of the founder, who solicits patronage and recommendation.

"So she is expecting some other fellow on business? What business?" thought Dick, as he followed the girl upstairs into a little room pathetically pretty with the prettiness of tasteful poverty.

His question answered itself, for there was a typewriter by the window piled with blotty manuscript.

On the mantelpiece, what? A photograph—his own. No; after all, it was not a photograph, but a portrait cut from the Graphic after that affair in the Sindra Pass that the papers had made such a fuss over.

There were footsteps on the stairs, and the door opened. It was nearly dark, but the firelight showed him that it was indeed Sylvia who came in. Not the Sylvia of other days, so radiant, so girlish, so fresh in her dainty dresses—the years are not so kind—but a sweet, serious woman in plain black, with the old masses of golden hair showing under her little bonnet.

Dick, with a sudden strange sensation of shyness that was very like fear, drew back until he was almost hidden by a screen, so that she did not see him.

But the room was full of a fragrance her heart knew in a moment. He had laid the lilies upon a table, and she took them up with a little soft exclamation of pleasure. He saw how tender was the face that bent over the flowers, a face no longer young, but with a new loveliness all its own.

Then he came forward without a word. She knew him instantly. The flush of rosy colour, the light in her eyes, the joy she could not stifle after all those hungry dragging years of loneliness, conjured back all, and more than all, the glamour of their youth.

"Dick—Captain Marazion, what has brought you here?"

He took her in his arms and answered, passionately: "My darling, I never knew until to-day that you wanted me; it was the doll that spoke."

Then there was a very complete and eloquent silence between them, till Sylvia looked up with her old smile: "Why, Dick, you can't mean that you saw the Colonel of the days of the Duke of Marlborough. What were you doing in the Albert Hall?"

"I was dragged there by force by a small tyrant—my sister's Baby Buntie—and I got the best Christmas present of all, though I didn't deserve it. Good old Santa Claus had not forgotten me when he showed me the lady in blue with the lilies in her hand."

"I dare say it was silly and sentimental of me to dress the dolls like ourselves, but sometimes, Dick, when I sat here working at them I could hear the music—that waltz, 'Souviens toi,' and see the pink lights just as they were on the happiest night of all my life. There was nothing left but my dear past. Nothing could take that from me."

"Take the future instead, now, dearest. And, Sylvia, when Buntie saw that dashing Colonel, she wanted to kiss the dear little man."

MUSIC.

THE SCHOOLS FOR OPERA.

As, unless the Carl Rosa Directors pretty speedily make up their minds, the richest city in the world is not likely to see much opera until the grand sesaon, there was a certain amount of interest in performances given last week by the students of the Royal Academy and the Royal College of Music. The Guildhall School this Christmas makes no move, and I think wisely. A change is imperative; and for this I am sure we can trust Mr. Cummings, who was present at the Lyceum on Friday, and as a sensible man could see for himself where the present system fails at the Embankment school. As to the other two performances, the Royal College immensely showed its superiority. Indeed it is not quite easy to understand what the authorities of the Royal Academy of Music were about in putting such a work as Gounod's "Mock Doctor" into study at all. This particular opera was tried a few years ago at the Globe, with a result of which Mr. Richard Temple has said much, and doubtless could say a good deal more. As the opera, which is an avowed imitation by Gounod of the 17th century musical style, is not at all likely to be put into the repertory again, the time spent upon its study by the young people, one of whom spoke broad Welsh, and another almost as broad Irish, was more or less wasted. Also, if an institution of the rank of the Royal Academy of Music cannot afford an orchestra, and is obliged to limit its accompaniments of an opera to a mere pianoforte, it was hardly wise to challenge criticism at all. The most promising student was Miss Julia Franks.

The Royal College performance of "Falstaff" at the Lyceum on the following day was immeasurably superior. Opera at South Kensington seems to be a serious study conscientiously undertaken, instead of a mere pastime. Some of the subscribers to Covent Garden were present, and they must have been greatly surprised at the charm with which Verdi's bright orchestration was invested now that the music was properly played. The performers were nearly all students, but they had enjoyed an adequate number of rehearsals, a privilege which, amid the hurry of the grand season at the Royal Italian Opera, is practically impossible. The Falstaff almost of course, was the weakest point of the representation. To blame the young fellow, a good vocalist but a poor actor, would be unfair. No one but M. Maurel has yet played this part properly upon the operatic stage, and there is small wonder that it was beyond the reach of a student. Even the voice has to be altered and "thickened" for this character, which must be neither dull nor too grotesque, and is really one of the most difficult parts in the whole baritone repertory. Somebody gave the young Royal College Falstaff a Friar Tuck wig, which looked extremely comical, and generally the "make-up" of both the ladies and men would have greatly amused a professional "dresser." This is a branch of art which used, at the Royal College, to be attended to by Mrs. Kendal or some other professional actress, but it now seems to be neglected. In Paris the "make-up" is regarded as an important branch of the art; but at Prince Consort's-road Mr. Temple and Dr. Stanford are supposed to do everything; though to expect them to induct the young damsels into the mysteries of hare's-foot and rouge, lampblack and powder-puff, is, of course, vastly absurd. As to individuals, the best-played part was the Ford of Mr. Emlyn Davies; but the Mistress Ford of Miss Eleanor Jones was likewise very good, while equally by her comedy acting and her singing Miss Muriel Foster showed herself a better Dame Quickly than even Miss Giulia Ravogli, its representative at Covent Garden. That Anne Page looked older than her mother was probably the fault of her mother, although a few hints from a competent instructress in "make up," or a wideawake "dresser" from the Gaiety, would have taken ten years off sweet Anne's face.

I cursorily alluded last week to some of the more pushing American Universities who are supposed to confer degrees in absentiâ for whatever those honours may be worth. I may have to soon take up the subject more thoroughly. Meanwhile, some of the details of this business are extremely funny. For example, there is an institution called the University of the South, Swanee, Tennessee, down by the Swanee River. This enterprise, it appears, confers the degree of Doctor of Music, and according to the official statement the hood is "Scarlet cloth, lined with Virgin Mary blue silk, edged with a white silk cord." May I in all due humility ask what in the vocabulary of the United States is "Virgin Mary Blue?"

I have been shown some letters written by Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's alleged patrons to Messrs Houseman & Co., a firm of solicitors. Mrs. Ronalds, it appears, is doubtful whether she ever gave permission for her name to be used but she has now taken steps for it to be removed. Lord Battersea has nothing whatever to do with the London Conservatoire of Music; while Mr. G. W. Russell, M.P., gave permission some years ago to use his name, but his solicitors are taking steps to withdraw it. By the way, in a letter dated as recently as December 5, in reply to an inquiry from an apparently simple patron, Mr. Lansdowne Cottell still announced his Birmingham branch at Messrs. Harrison's. He knows very well that Messrs. Harrison put an end to his tenancy some time ago, and the Messrs. Riley have since followed this excellent example. As to the other people several have disclaimed in TRUTH. Dr. Bentley (whose address was Mr. Cottell's Manchester Branch) is said to be dead. If he is alive I shall be happy to hear from him. If not, I fail to see of what use he can be as an Hon. Examiner."

There are something like six-and-twenty performances announced during this week, which, however, will practically see the last of the season of 1896. Last week the concerts numbered over forty. Among the best was the performance of "St. Paul" under Professor Bridge at the Albert Hall. Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Lloyd were both in splendid voice, and the choir (about a sixth of whom are fresh voices specially chosen this season) were in magnificent form. The Stock Exchange Orchestra at their first concert introduced a new Festival Overture in E by Mr. A. R. Walthew, a clever, if not inspired workman. The Stock Exchange band is now one of the best of our amateur orchestras, and the society likewise boasts a capital male voice choir. M. Delafosse drew one of the smallest audiences of the week to a concert devoted exclusively to the works of M. Faure. One-composer programmes are always monotonous, altogether apart from the fact that French music just now is not a very great attraction. Miss Joran, who sings better than she plays the violin, has given a concert at which she introduced her sister, Miss Elise Joran, a clever young pianist. Miss Jeanne Douste, at her concert on Saturday, sang moderately well in no fewer than four languages. Mr. Leo Stern, who came straight from Leipzig, repeated at the Crystal Palace on Saturday his clever performance of Dvorak's violoncello concerto. On Monday, at the Popular Concerts, the song-cycle "In the Persian Garden," by Mrs. Bedford, a lady once so favourably known as Miss Liza Lehmann, was performed for the first time in public. It is a collection of twenty-two songs, either solos, duets, or quartets, and, to a certain extent, Oriental in character, set to the late Edward Fitzgerald's translation of some eleventh century Persian poems, the subject practically being "Drink and be merry, for to-morrow ye die." Some of the songs are very charming, and the cycle, which shows delicate fancy and real musicianship, is one of the most successful things we have had from a lady's pen.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Incomparably the most interesting book recently published is Mr. Albert D. Vandam's "Undercurrents of the Second Empire" (1) with its two ever-opportune morals. Cowper's:—

> But war is a game which, were their subjects wise, > Kings would not play at;

and that of Otway's famous onslaught:—

> What mighty ills have not been done by woman!
> Who was't betrayed the Capitol? A woman!
> Who lost Mark Antony a world? A woman!
> Who was the cause of a long ten years' war,
> And laid at last old Troy in ashes? Woman!
> Destructive, damnable, deceitful woman!

If you had any doubt of the selfish and personal origin of each of the four wars of the Second Empire, you have but to read what Mr. Vandam calls the "undercurrents,"—a euphemism for sewers—of that passing pageant to have your doubt set at rest for ever.

> The first war of the Second Empire was undertaken, not for political, but for social purposes—namely, to give the new Empress the sponsor she lacked to introduce her to the Sovereigns of Europe. The second (1859) was waged to save the Emperor himself from assassination. The third (Mexico), perhaps in order to cover the frauds of Morny in connection with the Jecker bonds; but certainly to conciliate to a certain degree the Papacy, and also to found a French Empire beyond the seas. The fourth for the sake of securing the tottering Napoleonic dynasty to the Prince Imperial.

Mr. Vandam is even more bent upon pointing his second—cherchez la femme—moral, and to that end he cumulates story upon story, and evidence upon evidence, to the discredit of the Empress's head, heart, and character. Many of his stories are startling, some are risky, but all are interesting, and nearly all original. For the hapless Emperor, Mr. Vandam has kindly words only, but the kindness is almost contemptuous. There seems to be no doubt that Napoleon III. was one of the best-natured of men, but his goodness was of that weak and wavering kind expressed by the cynical Italian proverb—tanto buon che val niente. In speech, however, he was occasionally, and justifiably, bitter; and Mr. Vandam cites some neat and tart epigrams of his which would not have discredited Voltaire. Talking of Voltaire, when the Archbishop of Paris pressed for the removal of his and Jean-Jacques' cenotaphs from the Pantheon, on the ground that "his flock felt uncomfortable in the presence of the two atheists," the Emperor, having vainly urged that there was not a pinch of the dust of either atheist in the cenotaphs, at last cried, impatiently, "Look you here, Monseigneur, how do you think these two atheists feel in the presence of your believers?"—which settled his Grace. Let me put beside this an Archbishop's witticism. Of the Abbé Bauer, who would preach on the Virgin Mary alone, to the exclusion of the Trinity, Monseigneur Dupanloup said, "Place aux dames; according to Abbé Bauer, there is no God, and the Virgin Mary is his mother." Mr. Vandam closes his fascinating volume with an admirable moral, which I cannot resist quoting for you:—

> On leaving, after Sedan, the weaver's cottage at Donchéry, the Emperor gave Madame Fournaise five gold pieces. I believe they may be seen there to this day. Each of these five coins bore a different portrait. There was one of Napoleon I., one of Charles X., one of Louis Philippe, and one of himself. A check-taker at an ordinary theatre, seeing so many differently labelled passes, would argue from it that the patrons of the establishment at which he officiated were fickle, too fond of novelty, and, above all, too prone to worry the management. "A bon entendeur, salut."

While on the subject of witticisms, I must quote one I have just come upon in Mr. John Robert Robinson's interesting biography of the wild "Duke of Wharton" (2). The Duke by the following happy illustration distinguishes between King George I. and his Ministers. A zealous cavalier, upon the entry of his Majesty King Charles II. into Salisbury, pressed so close to the King's carriage that one of the black spaniels within it seized him by the finger, whereupon the agonised loyalist cried aloud, "God bless your Majesty, but God d—n your dogs!" I do not see how the distinction between personal and constitutional loyalty could be illustrated more happily. In reading Mr. Robinson's account of the transit of this brief and brilliant meteor across Europe, you are more than once reminded of a career as brief and brilliant, whose high promise was similarly wrecked—that of Lord Randolph Churchill.

Apropos of Charles II., the versatile and inexhaustible Miss Braddon has written an admirable historical novel, "London Pride" (3), where the Great Fire and the Great Plague, and the great moral plague of the Merry Monarch's dissolute Court all play their parts in bringing out into relief the characters of the personages. I could not help regretting that Miss Braddon has followed the fashion of the hour, not only in writing an historical novel, but in making it end inconclusively and sadly. In another respect, however, she follows only in form the current fashion, for though "London Pride" is in one volume, it is of the length at least of an ordinary three-volume story. Probably Miss Braddon's numberless admirers will but rejoice that she has given them a full measure of her old wine in this new and single bottle. Mr. Conan Doyle has taken the time of a Prince even more worthless than Charles II. for his vigorous novel, "Rodney Stone" (4)—that of the First Gentleman of England, whom, however, the first gentlemen of England scornfully repudiated as their representative "by blackballing his friends at their clubs, and by warning him off Newmarket under suspicion of having tampered with a horse." "Rodney Stone" is a singularly successful tour de force, since Mr. Conan Doyle interests you even breathlessly in what, naturally, is disgusting and despicable—prize-fighting and foppery. The absurd foppery of Beau Brummell's predecessor, Sir Charles Tregellis, like the fantastic tracery on the sheath of a Damascene blade, enhances, by contrast, your admiration of the sterling metal it encases; while the description of the prize-fights is worthy of the subject Mr. Conan Doyle meditates attacking next—Nelson's sea fights. If you cared for "Three Men in a Boat," you will most certainly enjoy the screaming farce of Mr. W. W. Jacobs' "Many Cargoes" (5). Considering that all the stories have for their subject the adventures of Thames skippers and bargemen, which can hardly be considered inexhaustible, it is really surprising what varied and immense fun Mr. Jacobs contrives to make out of it. "The Petrified Eye" (6) is the queer title of another series of entertaining stories which, though originally told to the marines in the pages of the corps journal, are distinctly worthy of a wider audience. The Globe and Laurel, for the benefit of which the book is published, may be congratulated on the possession of a contributor with such a lively imagination and abundant humour as Captain Drury exhibits in the invention and narration of these amusing tales. Let me, in conclusion, commend to your notice a prettily-illustrated volume, "In the West Country" (7), which gathers together a number of Mr. F. A. Knight's pleasant papers on rural and coast scenery and natural history in Devon, Somerset, and Cornwall.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

P.S.—If only for the sake of the many reproductions of cartoons and sketches from Punch which enliven and embellish its pages, the latest "Life" (8) of Mr. Gladstone would be sure of a hearty welcome. But while these admirable specimens of the art of political caricature give it a charm and interest all its own among biographies of the G.O.M., the literary record of his career is also very well done; and in the volume form in which the work is now appearing (it has already been issued in serial parts) it will make a handsome addition to your bookshelves.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—The masked ball on Friday night at New Niagara was a great success. Seven hundred people were present, and the decorations were very much admired. The boxes were draped with white and pale green, colours that caught the light and gave a very bright and decorative look to the scene. From the centre of the roof was suspended a brilliant light softened by rose-pink silk, and from it to the other electric lights were hung festoons of silver tinsel. Tall plants, such as palms and ferns, were placed at intervals round the gallery, adding their note of deep green to the paler tones. Round the corridor, with its vandykes of coloured lights, cascades of silver tinsel were gracefully disposed. You may imagine that this made an excellent background for the pretty dresses. The competition for the prizes was rather keen. The first, consisting of fifty pounds' worth of furs, was awarded to the wearer of a costume, which appeared to be a mixture of the Spanish style with a dash of the Polichinelle. The second prize went to a lady, whose 1830 costume was generally voted charming. The pale green satin skirt was hemmed with pink roses and round the shoulders a filmy fichu was draped. She carried a muff made entirely of roses, and wore a coal-scuttle bonnet with an immense "scoop." The third prize was secured by a feminine edition of le Sport. The hunting pink coat was hung round with foxes' brushes, horseshoes, and other emblems of the chase. The second prize for ladies was a furnished note-paper case; the third, a clock. The first prize for gentlemen was a suit case, fitted as a dressing-bag. This was secured by a capital Harlequin. Mr. Claud Hay, as Father Christmas, with a long, grey beard, snow-white wig, and a wallet full of toys, took the second, a Tantalus spirit case, I think; and an uncommonly good Pierrot was awarded the third—a triple arrangement, one section of which was a clock, another a thermometer, a mirror completing it.

There were several very pretty dresses worn by the general company, one representing a soubrette of the Louis Seize period, the details being better carried out than is usual in historic fancy dress. A grisette costume in pale green and pink, with a green velvet bodice, was sweetly pretty. A group, consisting of twin babies, a boy and a girl, was followed about by a nurse bearing a feeding bottle. The twins were dressed in regular nursery fashion with short muslin frocks and long sashes. The boy baby set up a yell directly he arrived, whereupon the nurse flew to him with the feeding-bottle, and he had a long drink of milk. No less than six Geishas were present, and, for contrast, perhaps, three nuns. There was no ghost this year, the girl baby being the character assumed by the lady whose phantom-like aspect attracted so much attention at a previous ball. There was a procession at one o'clock, and afterwards supper became the business of the hour. Dancing was kept up till past five in the morning. There will be another ball in the middle of January. A lady, garbed as a bride in white satin and orange blossoms, carried a large bouquet of orange blossoms, and was, in all sartorial respects, the conventional bride, though in one rather important particular she scarcely looked the character.

In our search after Christmas-boxes we visited Goode's in South Audley-street. We always delight in the beautiful room in which they keep the models of old Sèvres and other old English china, for the reproduction of which this firm is so renowned. It is now much improved by the introduction of the electric light. Among other treasures in this room we noticed a very fine old Worcester dessert service, consisting of thirty-three pieces in dark blue and gold; the shapes of the plates and dishes are very quaint and varied, and it is a novelty to find an old service so complete and in such an excellent state of preservation. We also noticed a very fine old Sèvres dessert service, complete for dining thirty-six people, the prevailing colour of which is yellow of a shade which looks particularly well at night. It is beautifully painted with small groups of flowers, with larger groups in medallion on dark blue ground, the whole service being richly gilt. An idea of the importance of this service will be gathered from the fact that it consists of no less than seven dozen pieces, and for so complete and interesting a set the price asked—£600—is reasonable enough. In this room are also kept the designs which Messrs. Goode submitted to the Emperor and Empress of Russia during their visit to Balmoral. In walking through the showrooms we were particularly pleased with the beautiful dessert service of green on dark blue, presented to the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough on the occasion of their marriage; also with a toilet service of the old Sèvres Rose du Barry ground, richly gilt in the Louis Seize style, with the monogram of the Duchess surmounted by a coronet painted on medallion with ivory ground.

Novelties displayed suitable for Christmas presents were in bewildering variety, and have evidently been designed with regard to the purchasing powers of all classes of the public. Among other things that especially struck us was a most useful adjunct to the teatable in the form of cake-stands made in mahogany and other woods, some fitted with brackets. This is especially convenient on account of the difficulty so often experienced in rooms in finding a place for empty teacups. As we were leaving, Messrs. Goode were packing a delightful little tea service ordered as a Christmas present by H.R.H. the Princess Frederica for the Queen of Hanover, the design being festoons of pale blue dots with appropriate gilding.

Yet another courageous woman has ventured forth upon the troubled sea of trade. Machinka is the name under which a well-known lady veils her identity at 8, Conduit-street, where white walls, white hangings, crimson carpets and Louis Quinze furniture, upholstered in willow green, make an effective background for some of the most daintily delicate chiffon that I have seen this autumn. I took some mental notes for your behoof. Here, for instance, is a tea-gown which, if I can only do it some justice in description, ought to make you extremely anxious to invest. It is in pink moiré brocade, lined with soft white satin and bordered down the fronts with a ruche of narrow white satin ribbon and a band of chinchilla, the fur being continued round the neck, where it is filled in with butter-coloured lace. The transparent sleeves are in lace with epaulettes of tucked white chiffon and yellow lace. The under dress, visible only in front, is white satin covered with tucked white chiffon and bordered with yellowy lace. There is no fastening whatever to the tea-gown beyond a white satin ribbon tying it in at the waist, which it closely defines at either side, though falling loose in front and in a flowing Watteau at the back.

Another lovely tea-gown is in poplar-green Liberty satin, much fulness being in the skirt. The Watteau pleat is right away from the waist, which is bound in with a band of white satin at the back. This band passes under, leaving the fronts free. The under dress is white chiffon, bordered with yellow lace, and it has a deep lace bib drooping from the collar. A boléro is edged with a narrow ruching of poplar-green crêpe. The high collar is filled in with a ruff of the yellowish lace. Pleated chiffon sleeves just turn the elbow and are finished at the top with pointed satin epaulettes edged with a green crêpe ruche.

A perfectly novel and extremely effective walking dress is not to be discovered every day, even in our wonderful London. Machinka's is in navy blue serge, the coat-bodice fitting closely to the figure at the back, but falling in front in a fully-pleated sacque to the waist, where it is edged with several rows of narrow black braid, the skirt being finished in the same way. When this little coat is closed in front, a wide tie of Indian silk in crimson and cream colour fastens in a large bow at the neck. A touch, however, unfastens this and allows the wearer to throw back the fronts, discovering their bright red silk lining and also a lovely little vest of pleated red moiré velours, crossed on the upper part with narrow bands of the red, edged with black and fastened with beautiful little buttons. The deep collar of chinchilla adds the crowning touch to one of the most covetable costumes I have ever beheld.

Three smart walking coats complete the little collection, whose descriptions I cherished up for you. One is in grey cloth fitting almost tightly to the figure and finished with a short rounded basque below the waist. A double full collar of grey astrachan is arranged in a new and quite inexplicable fashion. There is a waistcoat composed of rose-coloured chiffon gathered in a kind of honeycomb with creamy lace fulled up the sides and held with little steel buttons. The second coat is black velvet, the high lace collar being edged with chinchilla, completely filled in with narrow lace. The third is a sacque composed of the softest and darkest mink with large brocaded sleeves.

I think I mentioned to you some time ago the Rose Tea Rooms, started by some ladies, and a great boon to the people who attend the concerts at Queen's Hall. Dainty surroundings always appear to add to the charms of tea. Do you not think so? There are now two sets of "Roses," one downstairs at the corner of Mortimer-street, the other, on the first floor, at 302, Regent-street; and the pretty drawing-rooms at the latter can be hired for afternoon at-homes. American cakes are to be had there, and are praised by those who enjoy this class of food.

I believe I have also mentioned to you the Ladies' International Club, which, in co-operation with the Kettledrum, formed so attractive a tea-lounge for women in New Bond-street. The two have now developed into a regular club, to be called the Sandringham, and to be carried on as much like a man's first-class club as possible. A French chef has been engaged—quite a new departure for a ladies' club, I imagine. There is to be an excellent table d'hôte luncheon at eighteenpence, and dinner at three shillings. Here's another novelty in a ladies' club: the wines are to be carefully selected—and by a MAN, too. We really are coming on rapidly as a sex, and there is no reason why we should not some day be gastronomically on an equal footing with our husbands and brothers. The subscription to the Sandringham is to be three guineas, but to any member joining before January 1 a third of the sum will be remitted. The ladies of the Committee include the Lady Sybil Tollemache, Lady Trelawny, Lady Burford-Hancock, Mrs. Metcalfe-Dale, Mrs. Beaty-Pownall, Miss Whyte-Walton, and Lady Palliser. Members are to be allowed to include gentlemen among their visitors, and these may be admitted to the luncheon, dining, and tea rooms—no others. Dogs are not to be allowed to go further than the hall. Sleeping accommodation has been secured near the club for the convenience of country members.

A lady has invented a cycling-dress adjuster by the use of which the rider avoids getting her dress displaced by wind or rapid pedalling. It consists of a thin sheet of aluminium, with an attachment which has free play to slide up and down the slot, thus accommodating, by means of the disc behind the slot, the perpendicular motion of pedalling. Should the rider jump quickly from her machine the disc at once slides down to the lowest point, rendering it impossible for the adjuster to tear the material. The inventor has called it the "Eureka." She is a very hard rider, going out in all sorts of weathers, and she used to tear holes in all her skirts until she bethought her of this device.

We ran down to Brighton on Thursday in order to be present at the opening of the Sale of Irish Industries, which took place at the Clarence Rooms of the Hotel Métropole. The Duchess of Connaught was unfortunately prevented by illness from being present on the occasion, so the opening ceremony was performed by Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar. Lord Arthur Hill received the Princess on behalf of the Industries, being supported by a bevy of Duchesses, Countesses, and other grandes dames. This was not a bazaar, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but a genuine sale of genuinely useful articles. Two of the principal stalls were devoted to the sale of Irish frieze and dress materials generally; whilst others had a grand display of Irish lace, Irish linen, and every description of Irish work. I am glad to hear that, regardless of the fact that some of the more expensive articles somewhat hung fire, on the whole very good business was done; and that the experiment has been sufficiently successful to justify a repetition of it.

One great feature was that although the persistent "cadging" (excuse the word, but there is no other that is equally expressive) was agreeably conspicuous by its absence, still, the stall-holders proved themselves to be good business women, and I am perfectly sure that neither Lady Bective, Lady Arthur Hill, Viscountess Duncannon, Lady Lucan, nor Lady Tweedmouth will ever be "distressed ladies," for if with the abolition of the House of Lords their incomes were abolished too, they would each and all of them be able to earn a substantial income in the world of commerce.

The whole sale was under the direct management of Mr. J. S. Wood, who is now so well known in connection with charitable undertakings of this description, and he was most ably and effectively assisted by Mrs. and the Misses Wood.

Of course, I have not forgotten to run into Charbonell's and Walker's in Bond-street, and am once again very happy in my purchases there. They have such beautiful things. Those lovely sofa-cushion receptacles for bonbons that I described fully to you last year have this year been reproduced, but on a much larger scale, as the manageress told me they proved quite a phenomenal success. The embroidery and painting are both marvels of workmanship, and the materials used are, if anything, more gorgeous than before. Enormous sachets, work-tables, and quaint-looking boxes are also charmingly painted and embroidered in elaborate cloth of gold. Several of the designs are taken from very old pictures, the subjects of most of them being older still, as they nearly all deal with love's young dream. How much more appropriate the dress of days gone by was to reproductions of these tender passages in life. Even the most elaborately-embroidered or painted representation of a young couple in our modern attire could not be made either pretty or artistic. Fancy a man embroidered in a top hat and frock coat, or a woman in a "tailor-made." This year, instead of the hare we have the poodle on his bicycle, and his beautiful curly coat is warranted not to take the moth. The motor cars are well up to date, but they show a great deal more originality in design than the creaking, cracking, cruel-smelling, crawling realities that made that unfortunate trip to Brighton a few weeks ago.

Christmas cards of the old style still exist, but when I have said that I have said all that there is to say. Fashion has decreed that the more modern greeting card, that is to say, a tastefully got-up card, simply conveying the good wishes of the sender, shall be the fashion for the moment. Still, so long as we have children with us, and so long as we have Raphael Tuck & Son with us, the elaborate card, the artistic card, the sporting card, and the comic card will be with us too. I am going to tell you, therefore, shortly, about Messrs. Raphael Tuck's productions for this season, for as far as my experience goes theirs are the only cards that call for special comment.

Four Goupilgravure figures, after T. E. Waller, are most artistically got up, and are enclosed in a "Waller" India-proof portfolio, "Exchanging Greetings" and "His First Christmas" being particularly good. Another similar quartette is from pictures of Sir Joshua Reynolds and Sir Thomas Lawrence, and they will appeal to all lovers of children, so perfectly are these little ones portrayed. The Platino panels are new this year and are sold in separate boxes, thus greatly reducing the risk that is always attached to sending handsome cards by post. I am very much in love with the hand-painted series, as for quaintness of costume, delicacy of colouring, and beauty of face and figure, these Early English maidens are as near perfection as possible. The New Woman is mostly got up in scarlet and black, and from her bike wishes you a merry spin through the New Year. There is also a sweet little calendar in the shape of a bicycle, gorgeously decorated with flowers in lovely shades of mauve and pink. It is, by-the-bye, clear that the motor car is not by any means considered to be a reality in Christmas-card land, as there is not a single reproduction of it throughout the whole of Raphael Tuck's large assortment. I am glad of this, as the cars we have seen up to the present are certainly not things of beauty. Some very funny cats, most comically grouped, make a capital calendar, which is sure to find favour with our juveniles.

We looked in for half an hour at the winter sale of the Working Ladies' Guild, held in the beautiful oak-panelled museum of Lord Brassey's house in Park-lane. The most interesting things we saw were those in the art needlework department, which for some years has been managed by Lady Eden. The work is simply lovely, and you may safely recommend your friends to go to the Guild House, 251, Brompton-road, for Christmas presents. The embroidered covers for books, reproductions from the antique, are of great beauty. Cot-blankets, embroidered with designs calculated to please the nursery folk, are novel. But I could not hope to give you anything like a full list of the pretty things so daintily made by the Working Ladies.

It is all very well for Mr. Tom Smith to go on inventing new kinds of crackers each successive Christmas season, but, for my part, I am quite unable to keep pace with his fertile ingenuity and prolific fancy by inventing new adjectives by which, year after year, they may be fitly described. This Christmas his novelties appear to be exceptionally topical and "snappy" and up to date; and I think the time has come when "The Cracker King" may fairly assume a yet higher title, and, by general consent of his millions of loyal and delighted little subjects, be proclaimed "Emperor of Crackerland, and of all Cosaque-ia's boundless realm the ruler paramount."

Christabel writes from Paris:—

I send you a description of the very pretty toilettes worn by the actresses in "L'Evasion" at the Comédie Française. The scene is laid at the present time, and the dresses are in the fashion of to-day and a little of to-morrow.

In the first act Mlle. Reichemberg had a costume of grey glacé silk with rows of lace insertion round it. The waist-belt was very handsome, being closely set with turquoises. As headgear she had a little black tricorne hat with a plume of white feathers and steel ornaments.

Mlle. Lara had a beige cloth skirt, each side embroidered with grey chenille, a boléro of the same cloth embroidered to match, with a puffed front of white chiffon, over which fell a cravat of white lace; the long sleeves had falilng ruffles of the same at the wrist.

Mlle. Nancy Martel appeared in a skirt of hortensia cloth embroidered with velvet anemones the same shade. The bodice was hortensia velvet opening on a front of white satin covered with tulle; the revers were velvet with cream guipure, and at the back bretelles; round the neck a Médicis collar of white satin and fullings of tulle; velvet sleeves slashed with white satin on the upper part, and laced across with hortensia chenille; round the waist a white satin belt. This colour called hortensia here is the pinkish-blue shade of the flower we call hydrangea.

Mlle. Moreno had an elegant princess-shaped costume of serpent green moiré velvet; in front of the bodice was a fulling of Bruges lace with little straps of green moiré and black velvet.

The second act showed us some more pretty dresses, that of Mlle. Reichemberg being very simple. It is made of lavender cloth, the bodice covered with cross-cut folds of white and cerise velvet, with large gold buttons, a red straw hat with white wings, brown leather boots, and a red parasol. Mlle. Lara had a very charming dress of white cloth with cream-coloured guipure on the skirt. The bodice was entirely draped with the same lace, the effect of the rich lace on the dead white being exquisite. In the front was a bouffant of tulle with little frills; epaulettes of guipure with frills of tulle, white cloth sleeves, and overlaid with guipure, and some of the cloth cut away to show the arm through; the neck and waistband were of yellow satin.

In the third act all were in evening costume. Mlle. Reichemberg had a superb dress of white velvet plissé "soleil" (rather like the accordion-pleating, but widening towards the feet), and embroidered with wild roses made of lace and reworked with coral pink spangles. I cannot describe the lovely effect. On the bodice was plenty of lace and pink velvet, and in her hair a bow of three shades of pink velvet.

Mlle. Lara's gown in this act was pink Liberty satin, worked with gold. The low bodice had tulle drapery, and balloon sleeves of cream lace and pink tulle, drawn in with three bars or clasps of brilliants. On the left side of the bodice was a lace bow with a diamond buckle in the centre. The waistband was of pink satin, finished with a chou of the same.

Mlle. Nancy Martel's dress was very rich water-green satin broché, with large bouquets of marguerites, the centres of which were marked with silver spangles. The bodice seemed composed entirely of satin ribbon. Round the low neck was a fall of lace spangled with silver, epaulettes of Louis XV. knots sparkling with silver, and under them small fullings of green silk and lace to form a sleeve. Under this coquillé a knot of water-green silk was placed on the right sleeve, and on the left a tuft of Nice roses, which had a very pretty effect.

I must tell you that Mlle. Reichemberg's dresses were made at Paquin's; while Doucet has the credit of making those of the other actresses.

Mlle. Lara scored a great success, having undertaken the part of Lucienne at very short notice, owing to Mme. Bartet, for whom the part was designed, being unable to appear on account of the very recent death of her son.

Having had a present of a haunch of venison, we converted the surplus part of the loin, with the addition of a couple of damaged pheasants, into a pasty. It made an excellent luncheon dish. If it is not convenient to use pheasants, the flesh of a nice rabbit will answer:—

To make the pasty, remove the best part of the fillet of venison and the breasts of the pheasants, cut them into neat pieces, about an inch thick and four inches long, sprinkle with chopped shalot, parsley, a sprig of chopped thyme and a little salt and pepper, place them aside on a plate. Cut the remainder of the meat free from bone and sinew, pass it twice through the mincing-machine, with the flesh from the birds. Now weigh the passed meal and put it into the mortar with a third of its weight of scraped fat bacon, add a teaspoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper, and a good pinch of cayenne pepper, pound sufficiently to thoroughly mix the ingredients. Meanwhile, for the pastry, put 4 oz. of pure lard into a stewpan with a gill and half of water, stand it on the stove until dissolved, and quite hot. Pour it on to a pound of flour, add a pinch of salt, and mix it into a stiff paste, reserve a portion for the lid, and keep it warm, roll the remainder, and line a well-greased, raised pie mould, pressing the pastry well into the shape; line the pie with slices of bacon, put a layer of the prepared meat in the bottom, on which put a layer of the seasoned fillets, garnish with chopped truffle and the yolks of hard boiled eggs passed through a wire sieve. Repeat the layers of fillets and forcemeat until all the ingredients are used, put on the lid of the pie, trim neatly, and ornament the top with leaves made from the trimmings. Brush over with beaten egg and bake in a moderate oven for two hours. When the pasty is done remove the centre piece of pastry, make a small hole, and fill up with strong gravy. When partly cold remove the mould, then leave it until next day. Serve on a dish paper, garnished with sprigs of parsley.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

TOM SAWYER, DETECTIVE; and Other Stories. By MARK TWAIN. With a Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

The Daily Chronicle (in a leading article) says:—"Is there any Englishman living who does not enjoy the humour of Mark Twain? If there is, we can only repeat to him what Orlando said to the melancholy Jacques: 'We do desire we may be better strangers.' He deserves to be bored to death by what another famous humourist called 'wild curates.' Here is another volume from Mark Twain—'Tom Sawyer, Detective, and Other Stories'; not a very fat volume, but 'tis enough; 'twill serve to send the judicious into the sort of laughter that, as the French say, makes a pint of good blood. . . . We would far rather read about Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn than fetch a dear little yelp and spring right out of our shoes. And we fancy that if, like the 'deef and dumby' whom the pair so brilliantly exposed, we were to 'tote a piece of slate around, and a pencil,' we would get the great majority of Mark Twain's admirers to subscribe to our opinion. And this should make Mark feel uncommon bully, for it must be nuts for him for Tom Sawyer to be a public character thataway."

THE CHARM, and other Drawing-room Plays. By Sir WALTER BESANT and WALTER H. POLLOCK. With 50 Illustrations by Chris Hammond and A. Jule Goodman. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"There is a literary flavour about these comedies, and an interest, which admirably fit them for reading aloud at the fireside; but they are apparently intended to be acted, and as acting plays they have all the vigour of movement and all the dramatic 'go' that the most enthusiastic amateur can desire."—Daily Mail.

DR. RUMSEY'S PATIENT. By L. T. MEADE and CLIFFORD HALIFAX, M.D. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

"It is strongly written. . . . A clever authoress and a clever specialist between them have constructed a little romance that will gladden the heart of a jaded novel-reader in search of something new."—St. James's Gazette.

"The story is one of the most strenuous bits of work we have seen for a long time. . . . When Dickens was in dead earnest about a crying wrong, and on fire with sympathy for humble folk, he wrote just in this temper."—Illustrated London News.

IN THE KINGDOM OF KERRY, And Other Stories. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Diana Barrington," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The short stories of this volume . . . reveal Mrs. Croker's artistic qualities with undiminished effect. The title-story is of the most uncomplicated kind imaginable; but there is in its simplicity a perfect test of the author's capacity as a story-teller. It holds us from the very start."—Daily Chronicle.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY VIGNETTES. By AUSTIN DOBSON. In THREE SERIES, each complete in itself. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. each.

"The characteristic of Mr. Dobson appears to be a singular power of perception and appreciation. It would be difficult to name another contemporary critic with such nicety of observation, and with such a happy faculty of discovering and pointing out the peculiar merits of works well known to all, but in which Mr. Dobson is able to point out some fresh beauties or a new charm of thought or expression."—Athenæum.

MIGHT HAVE BEEN: SOME LIFE NOTES. By Dr. JOSEPH PARKER. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"The book is one that may be taken up at any odd moment and always enjoyed."—Daily Mail.

DIARY OF A CITIZEN OF PARIS DURING "THE TERROR." By EDMOND BIRÉ. Translated by JOHN DE VILLIERS. With Photogravure Frontispieces. 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth extra, 21s.

"We venture to assert that there is not an unnecessary line, not a suspicion of padding in these tomes. They give a life-like, breathing picture of the most grotesquely terrible epoch in the history of modern times. . . . M. Biré has given us a work which, in these days of shallow impressions and histories churned out while you wait, we should receive with gratitude. It is scholarly without being pedantic; it is picturesque without being inaccurate. It can be consulted as a text-book and read as a romance."—Pall Mall Gazette.

HUGH THOMSON'S NEW CHRISTMAS VOLUME.

JANE AUSTEN'S EMMA.

With Forty Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, and an Introduction by AUSTIN DOBSON

In cloth elegant, gilt edges, 5s. In plain cloth, uncut edges, 3s. 6d.

Daily Graphic.—"One of the few books to which Mr. Hugh Thomson's name appears as illustrator this year is 'Jane Austen's Emma,' in Messrs. Macmillan's series of illustrated standard novels; for the rest, he has left the field rather severely to his many imitators, but his hand has lost none of its cunning, and one has only to turn over the pages of this book to see how great is the distance still between the master and his followers. Mr. Austin Dobson gives the edition the additional gain of an excellent historical introduction from his pen."

MESSRS. METHUEN'S BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte

By S. BARING-GOULD. With over 450 Illustrations in the Text and Twelve Photogravure Plates. Large 4to, 36s.

This study of the most extraordinary life in history is written rather for the general reader than for the military student, and while following the main lines of Napoleon's career, is concerned chiefly with the development of his character and his personal qualities. Special stress is laid on his early life—the period in which his mind and character took their definite shape and direction.

The great feature of the book is its wealth of illustration. There are over 450 Illustrations, large and small, in the text, and there are also a dozen Full-page Photogravures. Every important incident of Napoleon's career has its illustration, while there are a large number of portraits of his contemporaries, reproductions of famous pictures, of contemporary caricatures, &c.

It is not too much to say that no such magnificent book on Napoleon has ever been published.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW POEMS.

The Seven Seas.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. 150 Copies on hand-made paper. Demy 8vo, 21s. net. 30 Copies on Japanese paper. Demy 8vo, 42s. net. Buckram, gilt top. Crown 8vo, 6s. Second Edition.

"The new poems of Mr. Rudyard Kipling have all the spirit and swing of their predecessors. Patriotism is the solid concrete foundation on which Mr. Kipling has built the whole of his work."—Times.

"Full of passionate patriotism and the Imperial spirit."—Yorkshire Post.

"The Empire has found a singer; it is no depreciation of the songs to say that statesmen may have, one way or other, to take account of them."—Manchester Guardian.

"'The Seven Seas' is the most remarkable book of verse that Mr. Kipling has given us. Here the human sympathy is broader and deeper, the patriotism heartier and fuller, the intellectual and spiritual insight keener."—Globe.

"Packed with inspiration, with humour, with pathos."—Daily Chronicle.

"All the pride of empire, all the intoxication of power, all the ardour, the energy, the masterful strength, and the wonderful endurance and death-scorning pluck which are the very bone and fibre and marrow of the British character, are here."—Daily Mail.

"This volume overflows with a kind of verse which stings the pulse of the reader, and provokes him to an unwonted show of emotion."—Daily Graphic.

Barrack-Room Ballads: and Other Verses.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. Tenth Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Kipling's verse is strong, vivid, full of character. . . Unmistakable genius rings in every line."—The Times.

"The Ballads teem with imagination, they palpitate with emotion. We read them with laughter and tears; the metres throb in our pulses, the cunningly ordered words tingle with life; and if this be not poetry, what is?"—Pall Mall Gazette.

Uniform with "The Seven Seas."—Q's NEW POEM.

Poems and Ballads.

By "Q." Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. 6d.

A Book of Fairy Tales.

Re-told by S. BARING-GOULD. With numerous illustrations and initial letters by Arthur J. Gaskin. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s.

"Mr. Baring-Gould has done a good deed and is deserving of gratitude in re-writing, in honest simple style, the old stories that delighted the childhood of 'our fathers and grandfathers.' As to the form of the book and the printing, which is by Messrs. Constable, it were difficult to commend overmuch."—Saturday Review.

Old English Fairy Tales.

Collected and Edited by S. BARING-GOULD. With numerous Illustrations by F. D. Bedford. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It would be difficult to find a more delightful gift-book."—Daily News.

"Nineteen stories, which will probably be new to everybody who is not an antiquarian or a bibliographer. A book in which children will revel."—Daily Telegraph.

A Book of Nursery Songs and Rhymes.

Edited by S. BARING-GOULD, and Illustrated by the Students of the Birmingham Art School. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The rhymes and jingles, familiar as they are, take on a new interest from their appearance in a collection so well made and so fully representative of the English nursery poetry. Every page of the book, with its handsome ornamental border, is a picture, while some of the pages are more fully illustrated still."—Scotsman.

A Book of Christmas Verse.

Edited by H. C. BEECHING, M.A., and Illustrated by Walter Crane. Crown 8vo, 5s.

"A charming anthology of Christmas Carols and Poems on the Nativity, including some fine old Latin hymns, and some familiar and many unfamiliar but beautiful, English poems. The anthology is illustrated by ten striking designs from the pen of Mr. Walter Crane."—Scotsman.

With full-page Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, buckram, 3s. 6d. padded paste-grain, 5s. each.

The Imitation of Christ.

By THOMAS A KEMPIS. With an Introduction by Dean Farrar. Illustrated by C. M. Gere, and printed in black and red. Second Edition.

"Amongst all the innumerable English editions of the 'Imitation' there can have been few which were prettier than this one printed in strong and handsome type by Messrs. Constable, with all the glory of red initials and the comfort of buckram binding."—Glasgow Herald.

The Christian Year.

By JOHN KEBLE. With an Introduction and Notes by W. Lock, M.A., Sub-Warden of Keble College, Ireland, Professor at Oxford. Illustrated by R. Anning Bell.

"The present edition is annotated with all the care and insight to be expected from Mr. Lock. The progress and circumstance of its composition are detailed in the Introduction. There is an interesting Appendix on the MSS. of the 'Christian Year,' and another giving the order in which the poems were written. A 'Short Analysis of the Thought' is prefixed to each, and any difficulty in the text is explained in a note."—Guardian.

"The most acceptable edition of this ever-popular work."—Globe.

(To a little girl with a story-book—"Wymps" by Evelyn Sharp.)

Here, in this Book, the wise may find
A world exactly to their mind.
From fairy kings to talking fish,
There's everything such persons wish!
Sweeter little maid than you
Never read a story through.
Through a sweeter little book
Little maid shall never look.

—William Watson, in The Academy, December 11, 1896.
"It is impossible to speak too highly of the stories. . . . The most exigent taste will be satisfied with them."—Truth.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.

THE ORIENTAL ESTATES COMPANY (LIMITED).

South Sea Chambers, 97 and 98, Bishopsgate-street Within, London, E.C., 4th December, 1896.

Dear Sir or Madam,—Referring to the Circular issued by my Directors on the 9th June last, accompanying notices convening, on 18th June last, Extraordinary General Meetings of the holders of Preferred and Ordinary Shares in the Company, and also an Extraordinary General Meeting of the Shareholders of both classes, it will be within your recollection that a Committee was subsequently appointed to consider the arrangements indicated in the Circular and Notices.

That Committee has now made its Report, and I am desired to enclose you a print. It will be submitted for adoption at the adjourned General Meeting to be held immediately before the Extraordinary General Meeting, of which notices accompany, for Thursday, the 17th December instant.

My Directors have considered the recommendations of the Committee and advise their adoption.

By order of the Board,
HENRY GREEY, Secretary.

THE ORIENTAL ESTATES COMPANY (Limited).

Notice is hereby Given, that an EXTRAORDINARY GENERAL MEETING of the Oriental Estates Company (Limited) will be held at Winchester House, Old Broad-street, in the City of London, on Thursday, the 17th day of December, 1896, at 3 p.m., to consider, and, if approved, to pass, the Resolutions set out below. The Resolutions other than No. 1 will, if passed by the required majority, be submitted for confirmation as Special Resolutions at a second meeting to be hereafter convened:—

RESOLUTIONS.

1. That all the issued Shares of the Company, being fully paid, they be and are hereby converted into Stock.

2. That the Capital of the Company be reduced from £566,700 consisting of—

Stock resulting from the conversion of
40,902 Preferred Shares of £5 each	£204,510
Stock resulting from the conversion of
228,092 Ordinary Shares of £1 each	228,092
19,098 Preferred Shares of £5 each, unissued	95,490
38,608 Ordinary Shares of £1 each, unissued	38,608
	£566,700
To Stock of the nominal amount of	£250,000 and that such reduction be effected by cancelling all unissued Shares and by writing off and cancelling, as being unrepresented by available assets, £182,602 of the Stock resulting from the conversion of Ordinary Shares, in such manner that the reduction of £182,602 shall be borne as between the several holders of the last-mentioned Stock, rateably in proportion to the amount of such Stock held by them respectively.

3. That the name of the Company be changed to "The Anglo-Ceylon and General Estates Company, Limited."

4. That the Articles of Association be varied as follows:—

(a) By adding next after Article 9 the following provisions—

9A. In case the capital of the Company be reduced to £250,000 by the cancellation of unissued shares and by the cancellation of £182,602 of the Stock resulting from the conversion of Ordinary Shares, then as from such reduction becoming effective, Article 9 shall cease to be in force, and thereafter the original capital of the Company as so reduced shall be all of one class.

(b) By adding next after Article 133 the following provisions—

133A. In case the capital of the Company be reduced to £250,000 by the cancellation of unissued Shares, and by the cancellation of £182,602 of the Stock resulting from the conversion of Ordinary Shares, then as from such reduction becoming effective, Article 133 shall cease to be in force, and thereafter the following Regulations shall take effect.

133B. The Directors shall forthwith issue to each holder of Stock resulting from the conversion of Preferred Shares, or other the person entitled to the arrears of dividend on the said Shares respectively, surplus certificates of the Company declaring the Bearer thereof to be entitled to receive out of the profits of the Company available for the purposes under the provisions hereinafter contained, a sum equal to the arrears of dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, accrued up to and including the dividend for the year ending the 31st March, 1895, upon the Preferred Shares represented by the Stock held by such Stockholder at the time of issue, and shall also pay, in cash, to the persons entitled thereto, a dividend at the full rate of 7 per cent. for the year ending the 31st of March, 1896, on the Stock represented by the said Preferred Shares.

133C. The profits of the Company for the year ending 31st March, 1897, and each subsequent year, available for dividend, shall, subject to the rights of holders of Shares, if any, hereafter issued with any preferential right as to dividend, be applied first and preferentially in payment of a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum upon the £250,000 Stock of the Company, and of the balance of such profits one half shall be applied in the purchase, at a price below par, or in the redemption by drawings, to be conducted as the Board may determine, of surplus certificates, and the other half shall be distributed among the members as further dividend in proportion to the Stock held by them, but without prejudice to the authority of the Directors to exercise the powers conferred upon them by Articles 125 and 136. Provided always that until the said certificates shall have been extinguished by payment or redemption, nothing in the said articles contained or otherwise shall be construed to authorise the Directors to create or maintain a Reserve Fund exceeding a sum of £20,000, and any additions hereafter made to such Reserve Fund shall be invested in first-class securities.

133D. The decision of the Directors as to the amount of profits to be applied in purchase or redemption of surplus certificates shall be absolutely binding upon the holders of all such certificates, and shall not be questioned, and no holder of a surplus certificate not being a Shareholder shall be entitled as such holder to any account of the Company's dealings, transactions, or profits, or to any information whatever with regard to the Company, and all surplus certificates shall be issued subject to a condition to the effect of this Article.

Notice is hereby Given, that a MEETING of the HOLDERS of PREFERRED SHARES of the Oriental Estates Company (Limited) will be held under Article 56 of the Articles of Association, at the place and day aforesaid, immediately after the conclusion of the Extraordinary General Meeting of the Company, to consider and, if approved, to confirm an Agreement dated the 2nd day of December, 1896, expressed to be made between the Company of the one part, and Stuart Cunningham Macaskie, purporting to contract on behalf of the holders of Preferred Shares, of the other part, modifying the rights and privileges of such holders so far as necessary to give effect to the Resolutions to be proposed at the Extraordinary General Meeting set out above.

Notice is hereby Given, that a MEETING of the HOLDERS of ORDINARY SHARES of the Oriental Estates Company (Limited) will be held under Article 56 of the Articles of Association at the place and day aforesaid immediately after the conclusion of the Extraordinary General Meeting of the Company and the Meeting of Preferred Shareholders, to consider and, if approved, to confirm an agreement dated the 2nd day of December, 1896, expressed to be made between the Company of the one part and Alan Francis Geary Gardner, purporting to contract on behalf of the holders of Ordinary Shares, of the other part, modifying the rights and privileges of such holders, so far as necessary to give effect to the Resolutions to be proposed at the Extraordinary General Meeting set out above.

Dated this 4th December, 1896.

PROSPECTUS.

The low rate of interest obtained on advances by the principal City Banks and the large dimensions which through amalgamation many of them have now assumed render it necessary that their business be conducted on the most rigid and exclusive lines; and the consideration is thus suggested that there would be much business open to a Bank conducted on lines approximating to those of the Country and Private Banks, and where more attention is paid to the needs of smaller customers.

To meet this want the Mercantile Bank of London, Limited, was formed in 1891, in the first instance on a small scale only, to test the working and safety of such business, and, in the event of the expectations of its founders being realised, to form the nucleus of a larger Bank.

Ordinary rates of interest are charged together with a commission on advances involving any trouble.

Although the expenses of working on so small a Capital have been relatively extremely heavy, the original expectations have been fully realised, and dividends have been paid for the last three years at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum.

The present issue is now made (in accordance with the ideas with which the Bank was started) to provide additional working Capital, in order to enable the Directors to cope with the large increase of business offered, of only a small portion of which they have hitherto been able to avail themselves.

It will be their first aim to build up an adequate Reserve Fund.

Mr. Arthur B. Russell, Chartered Accountant, has audited the books of the Bank, and his certificate is as follows:—

11, Ludgate-hill, London, E.C., November 6th, 1896.

I have audited the books of the Mercantile Bank of London, Limited, for the three years ending December 31st, 1893, 1894, and 1895 respectively.

Dividends at the rate of 8 per cent. have been declared and paid in each of these years.

The capital subscribed has been since May 1st, 1893, and is now, £42,800, of which £26,800 is paid up, and the balance represents uncalled liability.

The liabilities on June 30th last were:—

On Current, Deposit, and other Accounts, and rebate on Bills ...	£22,409 19 5

And the Assets were:—

Bills discounted and Advances to customers	£33,973 14 5
Cash	7,401 14 1
Premises, Goodwill, and other Accounts	9,162 19 7

(Signed) ARTHUR B. RUSSELL,
Chartered Accountant.

Dividends will accrue from the dates on which the several instalments are paid. Application will be immediately made for a quotation on the Stock Exchange. The premium of 10s. per share will be applied to the expenses of this issue.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Brokers, Solicitors, and Auditor, and from the Bank.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, original Balance Sheets, and Auditor's Certificate, can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitor to the Bank.

Agreements have been made for guaranteeing a portion of this issue, and there are necessarily many Contracts that have been entered into by the Bank in the conduct of its business which may technically constitute Contracts under Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Applicants for Shares shall accept the above as notice thereof, and waive any further compliance with such section with reference thereto.

If no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full, and where the amount allotted is less than that applied for, the balance will be applied towards the payment due on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant.

Subscribers should apply on the form accompanying the Prospectus, and cheques be made payable to "The Mercantile Bank of London, Limited."

December, 1896.

This Form of Application for Shares may be used.

32,800	4½	,,	,, 1st January,	1918
30,800	4½	,,	,, 1st January,	1925

The Stock will be registered and transferable in sums of One Pound and multiples thereof at the Banking House of Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., Lombard-street, London, E.C., at which Bank the Interest and Principal are also payable.

Interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum will be payable on behalf of the City of Quebec by Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co. on 1st January and 1st July in each year by dividend warrants, which will be sent by post to the registered holders, the first dividend warrant for six months' interest being payable on the 1st July, 1897. In the case of joint accounts the warrants will be sent to the first name in the account.

The Stock is redeemable by half-yearly drawings at par within 65 years from the 1st January, 1897, and the first half-yearly payment will be made on the 1st July, 1897. The drawings will take place under the direction of Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co., and the Stock will be drawn for repayment in units of £100, power being reserved to reduce this unit should the amount of the loan outstanding render such a course advisable.

To the payment of the interest and repayment of the principal of the Stock the City will apply each half year an equal sum sufficient to provide for the payment of the interest and to redeem the whole of the Stock within the period named. Issue Price £96 per cent.

Payable :— £5 per Cent. on Application.

Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co. are authorised by the City of Quebec to receive subscriptions, payable in cash or in Debentures of the said City, as hereinafter set forth, for the above described £654,480 3½ per Cent. Consolidated Registered Stock.

This Stock is issued in virtue of the Acts of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, 55 and 56 Vic., Cap. 50, Sec. 15, and 59 Vic., Cap. 47, Sec. 29, which Acts authorise the City to convert, with the consent of the holders, its outstanding debt or any portion thereof.

Holders of the following outstanding Debentures are invited to exchange their present holdings either for New Registered Stock or Cash upon the following terms :—

DEBENTURES OUTSTANDING TO BE CONVERTED OR REDEEMED.

Amount Outstanding.	Rate of Interest.	Redeemable.	Amount of New 3½ per cent. Stock which holders converting will receive in exchange for each £100 of Old Debentures. (The amounts of Stock are calculated at the issue price.)	Amount of Cash offered in exchange for each £100 of Old Debentures
£220,000	6%	1st July, 1905	£122 5 0	£116 5 0
102,739	6%	1st July, 1908	126 15 0	120 15 0
*49,750	6%	1st Jan., 1910	124 10 0	118 10 0
*45,200	5%	1st Jan., 1913	113 0 0	107 10 0
44,200	4½%	1st July, 1914	112 0 0	106 10 0
32,800	4½%	1st Jan., 1918	112 0 0	106 10 0
*30,800	4½%	1st Jan., 1925	111 10 0	106 5 0

* Not quoted in the Official List of the London Stock Exchange.

Holders of Debentures wishing to convert their Debentures into New Stock or to receive Cash for the same on the terms above stated must apply on the forms enclosed, and lodge their Debentures on or before 12 o'clock the 31st day of December, 1896, with :—

Messrs. Coates, Son & Co., 99, Gresham-street, London, E.C. ;
The Banking House of Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., Lombard-street, London, E.C. ;
The Bank of Scotland, Edinburgh and Glasgow ;
The Clydesdale Bank, Limited, Glasgow and Edinburgh ;
The Bank of Liverpool, Limited, Liverpool ;
The Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, Manchester, or
The Merchants' Bank of Canada, Montreal and Quebec.

In all cases the Coupons due 1st January, 1897, and all subsequent Coupons, must be attached to the Debentures lodged. Should the January, 1897, Coupon not be attached the Nominal Value of the same will be deducted from the amounts to be paid in Cash or Stock as set forth above.

Cheques for the amount of the redemption price of Debentures to be paid off in Cash will be made payable to the order of the applicants, and will be ready for delivery on the 15th January, 1897, in exchange for the Receipts issued on the deposit of the Debentures.

Certificates of the New Stock, together with Cheques for fractions of £1 which may be due in adjustment, will be delivered to holders Converting for New Stock as soon as practicable after lodgment of their old Debentures in exchange for the Allotment Letter and the receipt issued on the deposit of the Debentures.

It may be pointed out that the advantages to present holders of Converting their outstanding Debentures into the New Stock are many, and amongst others :—

1. The consolidation of a number of small issues (some unquoted) into a larger and more easily Marketable Security.
2. The Exchange of Bearer Debentures into a Registered Stock.
3. The convenience of holding a Security divisible and transferable into units of £1 and any multiples thereof.

Present holders of Debentures lodging their Debentures for Exchange into New Registered Stock will receive to that extent Allotment in full. They may also apply for an amount of the New Stock in excess of the amount required to convert their present holdings, and such excess applications will be treated as forming part of the applications received from the public generally.

So much of the New Stock issued as is not required for Exchange for outstanding Debentures will be allotted to the public.

A Statement of the City Treasurer, giving particulars regarding the City's financial position, and which may be seen at the office of Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co., shows :—

1. The assessment of the City is based on the rentals of Assessable Properties, the total value of such Rentals amounting to $1,295,500
2. This Rental Value Capitalised at 4 per cent. would amount to $32,387,500
3. That the City possesses property, including the Waterworks system, Realty, Bonds, Shares, &c., amounting to $4,900,000
4. That the total amount of Bonded Debt, including the issues now sought to be redeemed, but exclusive of the present issue to redeem same, is $6,458,066
5. That the Revenue of the City for the year ending 30th April, 1896, was $622,573
6. That the population of the City is about 70,000

The outstanding Debentures as they are Converted or Redeemed will be forthwith cancelled and not re-issued.

Applications, in cash, on the form issued with the prospectus, must be accompanied by a Deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount of Stock applied for and be forwarded to Messrs. Coates, Son & Co., 99, Gresham-street, London, E.C., or to any of the Banks above named.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and if a partial allotment is made the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment. In case of default in the payment of any instalment at its due date, all amounts previously paid will be liable to forfeiture. The instalment due on the 29th January, 1897, may be paid on or after allotment, under discount at the rate of £2 per cent. per annum.

Application will be made in due course for a quotation for the Stock upon the London, Glasgow and Liverpool Stock Exchanges.

Copies of the authorising Acts above referred to can be inspected at the Offices of Messrs. Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael, 1, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application, and Forms for Listing the Debentures to be lodged for Conversion or payment off in Cash, may be obtained at the Offices of Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co., 99, Gresham Street, London, E.C., at any of the above-named Banks, or of Messrs. Hanson Brothers, St. James's-street, Montreal.

99, Gresham-street, London,
8th December, 1896.

The Subscription List will be opened on TUESDAY, the 15th day of DECEMBER, 1896, and closed at 4 p.m. on THURSDAY, the 17th day of DECEMBER, 1896, for Town, and on FRIDAY, the 18th inst., at 11 a.m., for Country Applications.

Messrs. Parsons, Thomson, & Co., of Oxford, and Messrs. Coutts & Co., 59, Strand, as their London Agents, will receive subscriptions for the undermentioned Debenture Stock.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed for the following purposes:—

(A) To acquire the exclusive rights for Western Australia of Haycraft's Gold Extraction Process on the terms hereafter mentioned.

(B) To acquire and work the Special Plant for treating ore by the Haycraft process, together with a leasehold battery site of 5 acres, adjoining the Bon Accord Mine, Kalgoorlie, Western Australia.

(C) To acquire, develop, and work the Victory and Hearts of Oak Mines, comprising two leases, aggregating 36 acres or thereabouts, situated in Hannan's District, Kalgoorlie, Western Australia.

The Haycraft Gold Extraction Process (Patent No. 549, dated August 21, 1894, for Western Australia), consists of a combination of two well-known operations, viz.: Electrolytic chlorination and electro-amalgamation, carried on in one vessel at boiling temperature, after the ore has been subjected to the usual crushing.

The special features of this process are its simplicity and completeness, for the whole ore is treated in one operation as received from the mill, and during that operation practically the whole percentage of gold in the ore is extracted in two hours' time.

The special advantages of this process are as follows:—

1. Cheapness.
2. The use of salt water (which is so abundant in Western Australia) instead of fresh.
3. The smallness of the quantity required, 100 gallons per ton only (50 of which can be used again), as compared with a minimum of 240 gallons for the ordinary battery.
4. Simplicity of adjuncts, i.e., firewood, salt water, and mercury (100 lb. of mercury will absorb 200 oz. of gold, and is ready for use again after passing through the mercury retort).
5. Great saving in time occupied by treatment.
6. The non-formation of slimes and tailings and the consequent saving of any loss of gold in this direction.

A complete plant for experimental purposes was erected at Adelaide early in 1895, where it has since been running on sample parcels of ore sent from all parts of Australia. A special trial was made by Mr. Nicholson, of Adelaide, the well known expert, of the Haycraft process, as compared with battery and cyanide treatment. The results gave 6 to 10 per cent. more gold saved by the Haycraft process in two hours than by the battery and cyanide treatment combined in 48 hours.

The other results have proved most satisfactory, as can be seen from the tabulated statement accompanying the Prospectus, and the percentage of gold extracted has varied from 80 to 97½ per cent. In each case a full charge of one ton has been treated, the difference in weight between the parcel sent and the proper charge being made up by the addition of ordinary sandstone, and in one case 10 tons were treated.

Full Prospectus and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitor, and at the Offices of the Company.

The LIST is now OPEN for SUBSCRIPTIONS and will CLOSE at 4 p.m. on WEDNESDAY, December 16.

THE BIRMINGHAM HOTEL & RESTAURANT COMPANY, LIMITED.

INCORPORATED UNDER THE COMPANIES ACTS, 1862 TO 1890.

CAPITAL . . . £100,000,

The business of W. C. Grew, Wine and Spirit Merchant.

More complete descriptions of the businesses will be found in the full Prospectus.

The Restaurants are amongst the first in Birmingham, and are all successful and profitable; and, as it is intended to extend the businesses, it is anticipated that the profits will be increased.

The above properties have been valued by the well-known Valuer, Mr. Thomas S. Fallows, Birmingham, whose report is printed in the full Prospectus.

The security for the Debenture Stock will, according to his report, be represented by assets valued by Mr. T. S. Fallows at	£91,100
Add amount provided for the purchase of the stock, book debts, &c., and for working capital	24,000
	£115,100

The accounts of the businesses have been examined by Messrs. Lees and Graham, Chartered Accountants, of Manchester, and the following is a copy of their report:—

"77, King-Street, Manchester, December 9th, 1896.

"GENTLEMEN,—We have examined the books and accounts of the Old Royal Restaurant and the Colonnade Hotel for the three years ending December 31st, 1895, the books and accounts of the Waterloo Bar for three years and three months, ending 31st March, 1896, and the books and accounts of Mr. W. C. Grew for the three years ending 30th June, 1896, and we certify that the profits of the combined businesses have been as follows:—

Taking the first year of our examination in each case, the profits were	£9,121	2	5
The second year	11,521	8	10
The third year	12,299	8	8

"These profits are arrived at after making ample provision for depreciation.
Yours faithfully, LEES and GRAHAM."

The above profits distributed over the company's capital give the following results:—

The profits as certified by Messrs. Lees and Graham for the last completed 12 months amount to		£12,299	8	8
To pay interest on the Four and a Half per Cent. Debenture Stock will require	£2,700
To pay dividend of 5½ per cent. on the Preference shares will require	2,750
To pay dividend of 8 per cent. on the Ordinary shares will require	4,000
		9,450	0	0
Leaving a margin of		£2,849	8	8

for expenses of management and redemption of debentures, without taking into consideration the increased profits which may reasonably be expected from the amalgamation and the extension of the businesses.

The Contracts entered into are specified in the full prospectus.

The following form may be cut out and sent, with the amount payable on application, to the Bankers or Secretary. In applying for Shares the applicant will please efface the word "Ordinary" or "Preference," according to the class of Share applied for:—

PLAYER'S

Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking.

The Original NAVY CUT

PLAYER'S NAVY CUT TOBACCO is sold only in 1-oz. Packets, and 2, 4, and 8-oz. and 1-lb. Tins, which keep the Tobacco in Fine Smoking Condition. Ask at all Tobacco Sellers, Stores, &c., and take no other. The genuine bears the Trade Mark, "NOTTINGHAM CASTLE," on every Packet and Tin.

PLAYER'S NAVY CUT CIGARETTES are sold in Packets of 12, and Tins containing 24, 50, and 100.

Also supplied in a new size—"MAGNUMS"—packed in Pocket Tins containing 16; and in 50's and 100's.

A MASTER KEY of this SIZE

Can be made to open any number of Locks. Many Ladies and Gentlemen have the whole of their locks so arranged that a MASTER KEY, so small as to be worn in a finger-ring or locket, will open every lock they possess—from their Dressing Bags, Trunks, Jewel Cases, Despatch Boxes, &c., to the Front Door, Wine Cellar, Park Gates, &c. Just think of the Convenience! The locks are made in suites, each suite with its own key, so that the ladies' maid or valet can open the luggage, the butler the wine cellar, and so on, but the suite keys are of no use for any but their own series.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE NO. 929.—ANSWERS TO ORIGINAL CONUNDRUMS PUBLISHED ON NOVEMBER 12.

Toucan (real name and address will be published in due course) £2 2 0

SPECIAL NOTICE.
"TRUTH" TOY AND DOLL SHOW.

By the time this number of Truth is in the hands of its London readers the Seventeenth Truth Show will be open at the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington Gore. It will remain open until 10 p.m. this (Wednesday) evening, and will be also open to-morrow (Thursday) between 10.30 a.m. and 10 p.m. No charge will be made for admission, but visitors will be expected to leave an address card with the Commissionaires who will be stationed at the doors. It is hoped that the readers of Truth will make known the above announcement as widely as possible amongst their friends, as a large attendance is especially desired.

Next week a detailed account of the Dressed Dolls and Home-made Toys will be published.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the Puzzle Editor, Truth Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 926.

The Prize for the best original Topical Conundrum has been awarded to "A See-man" for the following:—

Q. If Lady Godiva lived in these days how would she ride through Coventry?
A. On a bicycle without a tyre (attire).

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 928.

Several correspondents who have written to me with regard to this competition are labouring under a complete misapprehension as to the rules which govern rhymed versification. It will be remembered that what competitors had to do was to find rhymes for the words "syringe" and "pickaxe," and the prize was awarded to "Eboracum" for the following rhymes:—

Negations, in some English words, upon the prefix ir hinge—
E.g., "an ir-religious man," an ir-receptive syringe.
Scotch reader, dinna look sae blate, 'twould need a moral pickaxe
To plant my quip within your pate—a heavy, sharp, and thick axe!

Of these rhymes I may say the first is not a perfect one, whereas the second is. "Ir hinge" (the "ir" being pronounced as "ir" in irreligious) is not a perfect rhyme owing to the presence of the "h" in the word "hinge," it being a well-known rule that "in composite rhyming the greatest care should be taken to see that each syllable after the first is identical in both of the rhymed endings that pair off together." Now, the presence of a "h" in the word "hinge," whereas there is no "h" in the second syllable of "syringe," clearly breaks the above rule, but the fracture is a comparatively slight one, and the prize was given to "Eboracum" notwithstanding, as no other competitor came nearer to perfection. But for any one to contend, as one of my correspondents does, that "her eringe" is a perfect rhyme for "syringe" shows clearly that he knows nothing of the rule I have quoted; moreover, that his ear for rhyme cannot be a very sensitive one. Any one who has read published verses in which composite rhymes occur at the ends of the lines should surely know that it is the initial of the first syllable only which alters. Thus, "dry land" is a good rhyme to "is-land," whereas "dry sand" would be no rhyme to it at all. So, too, "bye-way" is a good rhyme to "highway;" and, of course, "thick axe" to "pickaxe." I will not enlarge further upon the matter, for the rule I have quoted is one which is well known to most amateur verse writers; but I have thought it well to say thus much about it, because there are clearly some amongst Truth competitors who did not know of the existence of the rule in question.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 930.

The Prize in this competition has been presented to Avis for a description of the game known as "Living Acrostics." The following are the details:—A round game that we, in our family circle, enjoy very much, and find very little known outside, is a form of living acrostic: Two persons retire to guess; the rest of the company choose a character for the whole—say Romeo. In this case all the "lights" must be taken from Shakespeare. Five persons will each take a character beginning with one of the letters, say Rosalind, Othello, Mercutio, Emilia, and Orlando. When the guessers have returned, Rosalind will commence by giving a succinct account of herself, not disclosing too much—usually it is best to use the first person. Then Othello will follow, and so on, till we come to the sixth person, who personates Romeo. No questions are allowed, but in cases of difficulty a second round may be given. This game can be varied by characters from any well known writer, or birds or fishes, or any branch may be taken. This game has always proved a great success, and I hope, if some of your readers do not know it, they will give it a good trial this Christmas.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 934.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

The Best Answer to the Riddle "Why is the Coming New Year's Day like Mr. Arthur Balfour on the Golf Links?"

I may say that I have myself no idea what the answer to this conundrum is. I shall, in fact, possess a perfectly open mind on the matter until I receive the replies which may be sent in by those who take part in this competition. Competitors may send more than one reply; but all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, December 28, at the latest.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The name of Scrivener, winner of the Prize No. 925, was published last week as "F. Percy Noble, Esq.;" it should have been printed as T. Percy Noble, Esq.

Lizard.—Many thanks for your letter.

Eva.—I am much obliged to you for your excellent suggestion of a subject for a further competition.

Cortex.—I have read your humorous and good-tempered criticisms with much interest. The prize you refer to was won by "Analyst."

THE PUZZLE EDITOR

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 931.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.
SUGGESTIONS AS TO THE MOST SUITABLE SHAPE FOR HORSELESS CARRIAGES.

1. A gondola (waggonette) steered from the bows, machinery in the raised middle cabin. Seats all round. 2. A swan (landau steered from in or behind the neck. Works in the fore part of the half-raised wings, or in the tail. Seats for four or six, half facing, half opposite, in the body. 3. A boat, of almost any shape, the ends curved upwards. Large figure-heads for the helmsman; machinery in a half-deck cabin, placed at either end or in the middle. Seats all round. 4. A torpedo, closed carriage, skylight, if advisable. 5. A shell, the lower half as carriage, the upper half as canopy, joined by a pillar at the small ends, the hinge of the shell; this being the fore part of the carriage. The canopy fixed 5 ft. or 6 ft. above the carriage, or less. Smaller supports for the canopy at the wide ends of the shell, and at the sides if required. Steerage and machinery near the pillar. Seats on both sides of the wider part of shell; adjustable step-ladder for getting in and out. More wheels for long-shaped shell. Seats for six or eight. For short, round shells, three wheels; seats for two. Shells could also be single. 6. Noah's ark or tram-car, with spiral steps at each end; ends of car elongated and somewhat pointed and turned up. Steerage at both ends if advisable, to avoid turning round. Works under the stairs. Seats, of course, inside and outside. 7. A duck, and any swimming bird could be made, and might be charming. 8. A basket.—Shah.

The shape of motor cars should be taken from examples of carriages of which the motive power is behind; e.g., sledges propelled by a skater, like those specimens in South Kensington Museum,* and those seen in pictures of artists of the Dutch school (chiefly). The usual shapes have fronts like artistic "cow-catchers," which would minimise the effect of collisions with pedestrians; thus combining practical usefulness with beauty. The back seats should be raised above those in front to give persons sitting behind a clear view ahead.—Nordstern.

* In the corridor near the refreshment room.

The car should be constructed with three wheels only, on the lines of a tricycle; it should be built wedge-shaped in order to offer less resistance to the wind. The driver or steerer should be seated immediately above and behind the front wheel. It could be turned in a smaller compass, be more easily guided, and would possess other advantages if built on this model.—Pelican.

1. Irish jaunting-car style. 2. Char-a-banc shape, only with seat-back running down centre, body built light, and sides interlaced with cane or bamboo, good strong wheels, rubber tyre, lamps right and left and another lamp in a line with driver's feet, the whole painted olive colour.—Snibor.

The ideal shape for a motor car, to combine elegance with utility, would seem to be that of a Venetian gondola, fitted with wheels, and having the bows made to overlap the floor of the main part, and made to swing from side to side, so as to guide the main body. The advantages of this shape would be, (1) elegance; (2) greater immunity from collisions, resulting from the shape of the bows; (3) the fact that it could be used alike in fine or wet weather, and in summer and winter, as the gondola has both a covered and an uncovered portion; (4) less liability to upset; (5) greater facility in steering.—Taffy.

The difficulty with regard to motor cars as now constructed is that one misses the horse, and the driver has the appearance of driving nothing. As regards the body of the vehicle, we must come to the conclusion, if we think of it, that the carriage shape is most nearly adapted to the human form in a sitting posture. If, therefore, something could be substituted for the horse—something for the coachman to drive—I think that comfort and appearance would be combined. I should, therefore, propose that a steering-wheel, or pair of steering-wheels, should be put out well in front of the coachman, and that rods for working them should be carried up to the box seat, so as to convey a suggestion of reins. The wheel or wheels would act like the front wheel of a bicycle, and the steering-rods be attached to the ends of the handle bar.—Almaviva.

The ugliness of the motor car seems to arise from the fact that it is, as it is sometimes called, a horseless carriage; that is to say, a carriage built with the idea of its being drawn by a horse. It wants the horse, as the 'bus driver in Punch expresses it. My little girl proposes an artificial horse with the motor hidden in side and an outrider to do the steering. Seriously, I should like to suggest an auto car which could be attached to carriages as they now exist, thus rendering them, by a slight alteration, convertible for use with either horse or motor.—Pretoria.

My suggestion is: private carriages to be shaped like a swan, neck curved and head very ornamental, like the prow of a vessel in old times; the body fitted with seats, and a striped canopy for summer, a leather one for rain. For goods and luggage, to be like the Noah's arks of our youth, with a covered seat on the platform for the stoker or conductor; the narrow side to be the front.—Zobeide.

As we English people have for so long a time, in the language of Ruskin, despised art, would it be too daring a departure from our practical propensities to alter the ungainly forms of the motor cars into those resembling Venetian gondolas? Better still, think how charming our streets would look with graceful swans skimming along. Why, London would be more "cygnificant" than ever if we were thus to show that we had not quite forgotten or lost our love of the beautiful.—Beginner.

I think the boat or canoe shape is the only one for the motor carriage, unless appearance is to be entirely sacrificed. A ship is a pleasing object in the water, a bathing-machine is not; and as the bathing-machine to the ship, so is the present motor car to the ordinary horse and carriage. The inside arrangement of the various carriages might be as now, but the outside must be elongated into prow and stern. The driver's seat and compartment for the motive power apparatus must be in front; the latter, triangular in shape, to follow the plan of the carriage, with one of its concave sides running beneath the fore part of the carriage; on the other concave side is the driver's seat. The third side, parallel with the ground, is convex, and the whole appearance not unsightly. It is difficult to describe one's ideas for others to understand. I inclose a rough sketch of mine, but need hardly add I am no draughtsman! If, as an amateur, my design is unpractical, I can but add that the practical ones of to-day will prove practical failures, for the public will never take kindly to these square chests upon wheels. The pointed ends may be real or apparent only, but this is the side view appearance I advocate.—Imara.

Compensation for what the horseless "equipage" loses in appearance from diminished length must be sought in height. The high double perambulator now in vogue suggests, therefore, the type to be followed. An adaptation of the extending frame (familiar to us in childhood for the advance and retreat of toy soldiers pegged on to it), and worked in this instance by a lever with rotatory or other handle, will advance the car from within to the height desired and lower it for entering and alighting. The handles that regulate the motor and brake to be telescopic, and thereby serviceable at any height desired by the occupants of the car, who will by this plan enjoy a similar view when driving to that enjoyed on a coach. No great deviation from existing types of car will be found necessary if the height be increased proportionately to the length, on the perambulator model.—Robert Martin.

Have it shaped like an enlarged perambulator cot, with a steel feeding-bottle attached to hold the necessary motive power; motion and stoppage may be regulated by means of a spring to cork and uncork the bottle as the driver requires.—Pigtail.

The motor car should be shaped like a vis-à-vis sleigh, if I may so call it, to carry three on back, two in front, and a small seat behind for a "groom"—six in all. It should also have sleigh bells to let people know of its approach. But the car which I think the most compact and serviceable is one called "The Pennington," a sketch of which I enclose, and somewhat like what I have suggested.—Hibernian.

I suggest that the motor car should be oblong in shape and rounded at each end.—Pansy.

The motor car! The motor car!
The new gee-gee! He-he!—aha!
They say you're ugly as the sphinx;
Come, smarten, sharpen, like the lynx.
But, stay; to Windsor I will go,
And take my cue from Verrio.*
Go, then, construct your cars upon
Capacious form of graceful swan.
Stephanotis.

* In passing through the State apartments at Windsor Castle, among other things you hear this much:—"This is the Queen's audience chamber. . . . the ceiling is by Verrio, and represents the Queen as Britannia going to the Temple of Virtue in a car drawn by swans."

I don't understand much about the motor cars, but I should think that they would look very nice as "open carriages."—C. B.

Vehicles which might be driven on the motor car principle—Bath chairs.—Jeff.

ENTRE NOUS.

With this number of Truth is issued a second special Supplement dealing with the case against the Kilburn Sisters. I call special attention to it here, because after the last Supplement was published, many complaints reached me of that issue of Truth having been circulated without the Supplement, as well as of the disappearance of the Supplement from public libraries and reading-rooms. I cannot prevent the abstraction of that portion of the paper by persons who imagine that the cause of the Kilburn Sisterhood can be served by such means. But for the information of any reader who may find the Supplement missing, I may mention that it will be, as on the last occasion, reprinted separately, and will be obtainable through the usual channels.

A special feature in this week's Supplement is the reproduction of certain letters from the Kilburn Sisters which strikingly illustrate the disregard of truth that seems to characterise these ladies, as well as the unworthy tactics to which they resorted in the course of the inquiry which they invited me to undertake for them. As I have explained in the article, my reason for reproducing these letters is that I have heard it said that the authenticity of one of them has been denied at Kilburn and by friends of Kilburn. That is a convenient method of reply, which is frequently resorted to when parties whose written words convict them of dishonourable conduct are confronted with their own letters in print. In the case of the man Brooks, whose exposure made such a sensation last week, many refused to believe in the genuineness of the letters from him which were published in Truth; and it was not until he came into court to be cross-examined upon what he had written, that I was able to bring his words home to him. The Kilburn Sisters, although they have threatened me through a solicitor, and in the most unequivocal language, with their positive intention to bring an action for libel against Truth, show little desire to imitate Mr. Brooks by submitting themselves for cross-examination. As the only way, therefore, of meeting any further suggestion that these letters are not genuine, I have taken the trouble to reproduce them in facsimile, so that every reader may judge of them for himself. On these letters alone, read with the facts to which they relate, I would confidently leave any impartial reader to say whether the ladies concerned do not deserve the worst that I have said about them—and more.

In another part of this paper (p. 1672) will be found a full description of the most successful Truth Toy and Doll Show which has ever been held. The attendance of the public at the Albert Hall was enormous, completely beating the record of any previous year. So far, then, so good. But I have to add that, notwithstanding the popular success achieved, the Toy Fund still shows a debit balance. There were collecting-boxes at the Albert Hall, but the total amount dropped into them on the two days of the Show was only £37. 16s. 9d. This amount, seeing that at least fifty thousand people were present, cannot be considered wholly satisfactory. If the visitors had contributed only a penny each on an average, the amount realised would have been £208. 6s. 8d. I leave my readers, then, to calculate what the average contribution per head actually was. I should like, when I publish the usual balance-sheet in a week or two's time, to be able to announce that the Toy Fund is out of debt.

Meantime I am glad to say that the Yorkshire Terrier pups have been disposed of. I was informed by the gentleman who so kindly presented them to the Toy Fund that they ought not to be sold for less than two guineas apiece. As a matter of fact, the smaller, and therefore more valuable of the pups, has been sold for three guineas, and the other for £2. 12s. 6d., and the sum of £5. 15s. 6d. has, consequently, been carried to the TRUTH Toy Fund. Yesterday I received from a correspondent at Suva, who wishes to be known as "Viti," a contribution to the Toy Fund of two complete sets of postage-stamps in use in Fiji. The face value of each set is 7s. 9d., but I am not sufficiently up in philately to know what the value of the stamps is to collectors. I shall be very pleased to receive offers for them. A number of Welcome Club Badges have also been sent to me. They arrived too late for exhibition at the TRUTH Show, but they shall be distributed in due course. From Messrs. John James & Sons, of Redditch, I have received a large assortment of well-filled needlecases of all kinds. Amongst many letters of thanks sent to me from the hospitals and workhouses, I feel I must specially acknowledge a large illuminated address from the boys at St. Mary's Orphanage, North Hyde. The design and execution of this Brobdingnagian Christmas card reflect much credit on those who took part in its preparation.

The following are the amounts which have reached me since my last announcement:—

Some of the papers have announced that "the usual Christmas and Boxing Day festivities at Osborne are not to be curtailed." As a matter of fact, there are never any "festivities" at Osborne during Christmas week, but it has pleased some romancing journal to publish ridiculous fictions about the doings there at this season, which would convey the impression that the holidays are kept by the Queen after the Dingley Dell fashion. There have usually been some tableaux or amateur theatricals in the Indian Room at Osborne shortly after Christmas, but this year there are to be no entertainments or social functions of any sort or kind whatever.

The Queen has conferred the first class of the Royal Order of Victoria and Albert upon the Empress of Russia, and the Duchess of York has received the second class of the same decoration, while Lady Lansdowne and Lady Lytton have been given the third class; and Lady Cowell, Mrs. Mallet, and Miss Caroline Cavendish have been admitted to the fourth class.

The Queen has conferred the Order of the Bath (Honorary K.C.B., Civil Division,) upon Prince Francis Joseph of Battenberg, youngest brother of the Princes Louis and Henry. The highest class of the same Order (G.C.B., Civil Division,) has been given to Prince Charles of Denmark and to Sir Edmund Monson.

Her Majesty has made certain arrangements in respect of her new Royal Victorian Order which are likely to lead to a great deal of trouble, and I hear that the Prince of Wales has expressed his entire disapproval of the extraordinary innovations which have been directed by the Queen. There are no fewer than five classes of the Royal Victorian Order, the standing of the members ranging from Sovereign Royalties, who are Knights Grand Cross, down to Household servants, who are to be "members" of the second grade of the fifth class. It seems that the Commanders of the Order (i.e., members of the third class) have not only been granted precedence of the Companions of the Bath, the St. Michael and St. George, and the Indian Orders, but they are actually to rank above all Knights Bachelors.

The fact is that the Queen has no right to practically degrade the senior Orders in this way, especially as the new decoration appears to be principally reserved for private and domestic services, and has in many cases been given to individuals who would formerly have been rewarded with a jewel, a piece of plate, or something else of more intrinsic value than a bit of ribbon and a badge. There is an evident resolution at Court to exalt the Royal Victorian Order as much as possible, for directions were issued last season that all recipients of this decoration, who were eligible for presentation at Court, should forthwith attend a levée. At present there are only thirteen ordinary members, while there are actually thirty-eight honorary members (all foreigners) of the various classes.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, and Princess Victoria, are to leave Sandringham on Monday, January 4, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, at Trentham Hall, Staffordshire. They will stay until Saturday, the 9th, and they are then going to visit the Queen at Osborne, until Monday, the 11th, when they are to return to Sandringham, where there will be a memorial service for the Duke of Clarence on Thursday, the 14th. The Prince comes to town for the season on Monday, the 18th, and he will then make Marlborough House his headquarters until his departure for the Riviera; but the Princess will stay at Sandringham until the second week in February.

The Princess of Wales and Princess Victoria will go to Cannes for the month of March, in order to be with the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland, who are expected there in a few weeks, and they are to stay on the Riviera until the end of April, for the benefit of the health of their eldest son, Prince George of Hanover.

According to the usual custom of Irish Viceroys, Lord Cadogan will spend Christmas at the Viceregal Lodge. The usual servants' ball will be given, and a small dance after Christmas week may possibly give the "hupper" circles an opportunity of sharing the Viceregal festivities of the season. When the Christmas of snow and ice, so dear to the poets, prevails, there is excellent skating obtainable within the Viceregal grounds, on an extensive stretch of ornamental water.

Mr. G. Balfour left the Chief Secretary's Lodge last week. He and his family will not spend Christmas in Ireland, nor will they return there before the opening of Parliament in January. Lady Betty Balfour gave a musical party previous to the Chief Secretary's departure, at which a large number of guests were entertained.

Lord Justice FitzGibbon will have his usual Christmas party at his Howth villa. Lords Rathmore and Morris will be amongst the guests, but Lord Ashbourne will be absent, as he and Lady Ashbourne are leaving Howth Castle to spend Christmas in Yorkshire.

Lord Darnley was a very good landlord, and he was most popular among his servants, both in Kent and in Ireland, and took an active personal interest in the management of his estates. He will be much missed in Kent, as he has lived during the greater part of each year at Cobham Hall ever since he came of age in 1848, and he was an excellent neighbour, and most hospitable and charitable. Not one of the papers has referred to the close friendship which existed between Lord Darnley and Charles Dickens, who was his neighbour at Gad's Hill during the last thirteen years of his life, and the author of the "Pickwick Papers" was never weary of eulogising the owner of Cobham for having kindly thrown open his beautiful domains to the public, thereby showing an excellent example to other proprietors of "show places;" for in those days great parks and houses were rigorously closed as a rule. The deer park at Cobham has some of the finest woodland scenery in England, and the trees are magnificent. The stately red-brick house, which was designed by Inigo Jones, contains a valuable library and a splendid collection of pictures, but some of the best works have been sold during the last few years.

Everybody will be glad to hear that the Thatched House Club, one of the historical institutions of St. James's-street, has successfully tided over its difficulties. The plan by which this has been done is a most excellent one. All the property of the club is now vested in a company, which undertakes the sole responsibility for the finances. The shares in the company are largely held by members of the club, so that the club is virtually a members' club, although no member need incur any responsibility beyond his subscription, unless he chooses. The work of refurnishing and redecorating the premises is now all but completed, and the club seems in a fair way to renew its youth.

The "earthquake" has been a godsend to the newspapers. Some of them have been a little hurt at not having been consulted in the matter, whilst others have welcomed the disturbance, because it seemed almost unfair that we should not have our earthquakes like other countries. Dr. Johnson declined to believe in the Lisbon earthquake for six months after it occurred, and I have my doubts whether anything that could fairly be called an earthquake took place within the area of London. Fancy plays a great part in the perception of earthquakes. Let one take place in one particular locality, and people will be found to have heard rumblings, and to have distinctly observed that their beds were shaken, over a very wide area.

When the spire of St. Mary's Church, Shrewsbury, was injured by "the act of God," a local divine discovered in it a special judgment from Heaven on the proposal to erect a Darwin memorial. Hereford Cathedral has now been damaged by an earthquake, and I hear it suggested that this is a mark of the Divine displeasure with a Bishop who has dared to favour disestablishment. Nonsense! It is clearly a sign that Heaven is promoting a disestablishment movement in the earth.

A friend of mine told me a few days ago of a mode of obtaining money under false pretences, which I believe has been growing in popularity of late, and which ought to be dealt with by the police. He was driving home one evening last week in his carriage with his wife. Suddenly, when passing through a by street, a man rushed to the front of the horse and the shafts and stopped him. He then came to the window and insisted that the carriage had run over a child that had limped away. At once a crowd collected, and it was felt that my friend ought not to be allowed to proceed before some sort of indemnity had been paid for injury done to the child. The man knew that child and was prepared to take charge of the indemnity. My friend was thus left prisoner for about ten minutes, but when he suggested that a policeman should be called, and that he would give his name and address to him, after being reviled as a mean creature, the man went away to look for the child. As he never returned, the crowd allowed the carriage to move on. Of course, no child had been run over, and all this was merely an attempt to obtain a sovereign, which would speedily have been converted into liquor at the nearest public-house.

I have been asked by a gentleman connected with the Press in Lancashire to inform him in TRUTH "whether or not it is fashionable to wear jewellery at receptions, at-homes, parties, &c." Unfortunately, this searcher after truth has omitted to state whether he seeks the information for his own benefit or for that of some lady friend. This may make all the difference. All I can tell my Lancashire friend is that people who have diamonds always think it fashionable to wear them, while those who have none think otherwise.

A gentleman who has just been for a cruise to the Levant, under the auspices of Messrs. Lunn & Perowne, thinks that, because I published some complaints respecting the management of the Midnight Sun in September last, I ought "in fairness to Messrs. Lunn & Perowne" to give him an opportunity of expatiating in TRUTH upon his satisfaction with the Mediterranean cruise. I really cannot follow the argument. The complaints about the Midnight Sun were very precisely answered at the time, which seems to me to be all that "fairness" requires. If a man complains in the Press that he has had a bad joint from his butcher, and the butcher answers that he advised the man not to take that particular joint, there is an end of the matter. The Press is under no obligation to publish letters from all the rest of the butcher's customers in praise of the meat delivered to them. I can assure my correspondent that Messrs. Lunn & Perowne are quite capable of blowing their own trumpet without his assistance—or mine.

A correspondent writes :—

If the correspondent who found fault with the expression "a brother of Lord Fermoy's," which appeared in TRUTH, is still disturbed regarding its grammatical justification he can fully satisfy himself by a reference to the pages of Lindley Murray, The notes on Rule X., Syntax, will supply the information that the double genitive is allowable "in cases which suppose the existence of a plurality of subjects of the same kind. In the expressions, 'A subject of the Emperor's,' 'a sentiment of my brother's' more than one subject and one sentiment are supposed to belong to the possessor." Consultation with any Peerage of the United Kingdom will show that Lord Fermoy has more than one brother; the expression alluded to is, therefore, fully justified by a grammatical rule. The correspondent may keep Christmas with a mind untroubled by the consciousness of any lapse from grammar in the pages of TRUTH.

Some of my readers in Paris may, I fear, have been annoyed lately by finding advertisements of a very objectionable character slipped into copies of TRUTH sold at the kiosks on the Boulevards. There is in Paris a purveyor of obscenity for the British market, whose circulars I have repeatedly noticed, and who seems to have adopted this ingenious method of revenging himself upon TRUTH by converting it into an advertising medium for his own purposes. I have done my best to stop the annoyance through the medium of my Paris agents. They now tell me that, although they have no responsibility for what has been done, they have made representations to the proprietors of the kiosks on the subject. Should this not have the desired effect, I would suggest to those who buy TRUTH at the kiosks that they should follow it up by making representations on their own account.

In the annual report of the Medical Students' Association at Queen's College, Cork, attention is drawn to the constitution of the Medical Examining Board of the Royal University of Ireland. It is stated that the Medical School, Cecilia-street, Dublin, sends forward for the examination of the Royal University something like the same number of students as the Queen's College, Cork; yet the former has almost four times as many representatives as the latter on the Examining Board. The representation of the Dublin School is, in fact, equal to that of the three Queen's Colleges (Cork, Belfast, and Galway) combined. This state of things is said to militate against the interests of the Queen's Colleges, it being found that at Cork, at any rate, "no small number of students annually transfer their allegiance to the Medical School, Cecilia-street, thereby shrewdly calculating that their prospects of success are materially enhanced." However this may be, the representation of the Cecilia-street Medical School on the Board appears decidedly excessive, and the question raised in the report deserves the consideration of the Senate of the University.

The last Congregation at Cambridge was unusually interesting and exciting, for there had been a wholesale "non-placeting" of graces which had been formally recommended by the Council. Never before has there been a meeting of the Senate at which so many attempts were made to defeat official proposals; but they all failed, and the Council triumphed all along the line. At last the question, which has been pending for so many years, of the site for the Sedgwick Memorial Geological Museum has been settled, and it may be hoped that this scandalously delayed work will shortly be commenced in earnest on the Downing College ground, the purchase of which was sanctioned by the Senate six months ago. The attempt to pass a vote of censure upon the Divinity Professors (which has occasioned a perfect hailstorm of fly-sheets) failed ignominiously, as the motion respecting the Theological Tripos was defeated by 143 votes to 48.

A sum of £115,507 has already been expended on Truro Cathedral, and it does seem a flagrant and discreditable piece of fatuity to squander upwards of £71,000 more on the completion of the building. The Cathedral in its present state affords more than ample accommodation for every necessary service or function, and this enormous sum is, therefore, to be wasted in order to please a few enthusiastic hare-brained visionaries. Considering the grinding poverty of most of the working clergy in Cornwall, it seems a scandalous throwing away of money to lavish such a sum on perfectly superfluous buildings. It would be more to the purpose to raise an adequate endowment for the sub-dean and rector of Truro, who at present languishes on a stipend of £100 a year, the result being that Canon Estridge, who recently succeeded Archdeacon Bourke in this "lean and ill-fed piece of preferment," finds himself obliged to resign it, much to the regret of both the clergy and the laity of the diocese. Considering all we hear day after day about the urgent necessity of a sustentation fund for the parochial clergy, it is enough to make the sun and moon fall to find an assembly of peers, clerical dignitaries, and county notables coming to a deliberate resolution to ask the public to subscribe £71,000 for unnecessary buildings.

Archdeacon Wilkinson, the well-known Vicar of Plymouth, has been appointed Honorary Chaplain to the Queen, in the place of the Rev. John Ellison, Vicar of Windsor, who becomes Chaplain in Ordinary, in succession to the Bishop-designate of Peterborough. Archdeacon Wilkinson, who celebrated his clerical jubilee a few weeks ago, is a brother of Canon Wilkinson, who has just resigned the rectory of Birmingham, and they are both prominent members of the Evangelical Party Archdeacon Wilkinson has been Vicar of Plymouth since 1870, and in 1878 he was given a prebendal stall in Exeter Cathedral by the Archbishop-elect of Canterbury, while in 1888 Bishop Bickersteth made him Archdeacon of Totnes, in the place of Bishop Earle.

A correspondent makes a valorous but unsuccessful attempt to defend the recent job in connection with the incumbency of St. Michael-in-the-Hamlet, Liverpool. He is good enough to tell me, in the first place, that the Bishop was not responsible for the appointment. Of course he was not, but he went out of his way to excuse it in the absurd letter which I quoted last week, and so rendered himself open to criticism in the matter. Then my correspondent states that St. Michael's has no endowment, the income being derived from pew-rents and fees, and the amount depending upon the popularity of the incumbent as a preacher, while "it requires £200 a year for church expenses besides £150 for a curate." It is admitted, however, that a former incumbent whose sermons filled the church, "got one of the best incomes in Liverpool from it." This being so, I really cannot credit the suggestion of my correspondent that the patron would have had a difficulty in inducing any one but his own son to accept the incumbency. The young gentleman in question has been only three years in orders, and it is nonsense to pretend that his father gave him this appointment because he was the best qualified man for it, or because among the hundreds of more experienced clergyman in the diocese who are without a benefice none could be found willing to take it.

I have over and over again animadverted upon the fact that during seven months in the year Westminster Abbey is kept closed on Sunday evenings, whereas at St. Paul's there is a special Sunday-evening service throughout the year, which always draws a very large congregation. I am therefore pleased to hear that in future the Abbey will be open for Sunday evening services throughout the year. This salutary reform is understood to have been resented by Dean Bradley and Canon Duckworth, but it has been decided upon through the zealous efforts of the other members of the Chapter, notably Canons Gore and Wilberforce.

The sudden and early death of Bishop Knight-Bruce will be widely deplored. His health was shattered during his seven years' work in South Africa, and he had previously laboured zealously and with much success in the East of London. About eighteen months ago he was presented to the Crown living of Bovey Tracey, and had since acted as Episcopal Assistant to the Bishop of Exeter. Bishop Knight-Bruce had made himself very popular in Devonshire among both the clergy and the laity, the last being attracted by the moderation and the shrewd common sense for which he was eminently distinguished. He was an admirable preacher and platform speaker, and a brilliant organiser and administrator, and he had indeed been conspicuously successful both in the diocese and in his parish.

The vicarage of Bovey Tracey, which is now in the gift of Mr. Balfour, is worth £400 a year, with residence. Bishop Knight-Bruce's predecessor was the admirable and beloved Charles Courtenay, Canon of Windsor, who was for many years domestic Chaplain to the Queen, and who held the living for forty-six years.

I am sorry not to have had any answer to the question asked in TRUTH two or three weeks back, as to the right of an Anglican cleric at Abingdon to refuse to marry a couple one of whom has not been christened. The case out of which this question arose seems to have been a degree worse than I at first represented it, for the cleric in question, the Rev. Wentworth Watson, only notified his refusal four or five days before the date for which the ceremony was fixed. It would seem that he was occupied up to that time in an attempt to persuade the unbaptised and unregenerate bride to go through the ceremony of christening prior to that of marriage, and it was only when he finally failed in this attempt that he told the couple that he could not marry them; the result being that at the last minute they had to alter all their arrangements, and go to London for the ceremony. Where is any authority to be found for this reverend gentleman's action?

In reply to the paragraph in last week's TRUTH respecting a circular issued by the Vicar of Lemsford, the Secretary of the Church of England Waifs and Strays Society has sent me an explanation of the principles upon which the Society accepts the charge of illegitimate children. One express condition in every case is that there shall be a reasonable prospect of amendment on the part of the mother; and the desirability of this and other precautions taken by the Society I fully recognise. As to the course adopted when the conditions under which a child was received are broken, I am glad to say that the Secretary's statement is quite satisfactory. It is not, as the circular seemed to suggest, a hard-and-fast rule to return an adopted illegitimate child to its mother if the latter relapses into immorality; but each case is carefully considered and decided with a due regard to its particular circumstances. The difficulty is, of course, that, besides the welfare of the child, there is another consideration which cannot be lost sight of—the necessity of safeguarding the community against anything which would operate as an encouragement of immorality.

A lady relates that she travelled up from Eastbourne the other day with a woman, who had been sent down from London with an order for admission to the Convalescent Home at Bexhill, had found on her arrival that the Home was closed for drainage work, and had been packed off back to town with an empty purse and in the last stage of exhaustion. The woman was just recovering from an attack of typhoid. She had had no refreshment on the journey but a cup of tea given to her at the Home, and when she reached London she had to be lifted out of the train. Somebody must have blundered very culpably over this business, and one would like to know who it was. It seems strange that at least a meal and a night's rest could not have been provided for the poor creature at Bexhill before she was despatched home again.

There is an excellent little charity for the benefit of children called "The Cripples' Nursery," the present position of which gives it a special claim on the charitable. It is a medical home for little cripples under twelve years of age, and until last summer it had a seaside branch at Margate. Owing to lack of funds, however, the Margate home had to be given up this year, and the "nursery" itself, which is situated at 15, Park-place, Clarence-gate, N.W., is at present in some danger, owing to deficient subscriptions and heavy expenses in connection with the renewal of its lease. As soon as this danger is known, I feel sure that it will be averted.

Mention was made in last week's TRUTH of certain interrogatories which have been administered to the Secretary of Guy's Hospital relative to the "snowball" that has been so long rolling about on behalf of that institution. I give below the answer to the interrogatories. It will be seen that the hospital authorities accept full responsibility for the "snowball," and the discovery will surprise and disgust all those who know anything of the abuses to which this mode of raising money lends itself. Much has been heard of late of the financial difficulties of Guy's, but no degree of financial extremity justifies the managers of a great public institution like this in resorting to a method of raising the wind so mischievous and discredited. The management may congratulate themselves on the amount that they have raised in cash, but they must be very blind if they overlook the loss of credit, which means a loss of cash, too, that has to be set down on the other side of the account:—

Guy's Hospital, London, S.E.,
December 9, 1896.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter, the appeal that was issued by Miss Weston on behalf of the funds of this Hospital at the beginning of this year was perfectly genuine and authorised by us, and we are confident we shall eventually receive all the money that is forwarded to her. Up to the present time we have received over £400 as the result of Miss Weston's Snowball Collection.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

C. H. Wells,
Secretary to the Treasurer.

That the Secretary is justified in his anticipation of "eventually receiving" all the money forwarded to Miss Weston I do not doubt. But what has that to do with it? A correspondent has been at the pains to work out for me the amounts which this collection would have yielded had the chain been unbroken. By the time the thirty-fourth series of letters was complete, about £859,000,000 should have been received. Miss Weston's snowball has actually reached its fifty-third revolution, by which time, on the same conditions, the amount received would be something beyond the power of the imagination to grasp. There is a slight difference between this and the modest £400 that has actually reached the hospital through Miss Weston. Where is the rest? Miss Weston, who has also been interrogated, explains that "many people object to this system of collecting money," and "object to have anything to do with it." But can she, or the Treasurer of Guy's Hospital, offer any assurance that out of the thousands—it may be millions—of people into whose hands the ball has been passed, no one has ever thought of altering the letter and using it for his own purposes? Might not a few of the missing millions be accounted for in that way?

I am asked to call attention to the urgent needs of the Walsham How Home for the Fallen. It was founded to the memory of the late Mrs. Walsham How, the wife of the Bishop of Wakefield, and about £500 per annum is needed from subscriptions and donations. The Bishop of Stepney says, "The quiet work done for so many years, and still being done, thoroughly deserves the support of charitable persons." Subscriptions will be received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. S. Hanbury, 37, Lombard-street.

One of the rankest of recent Army jobs is the promotion of Viscount Castlerosse, son of the Earl of Kenmare, to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, and the command of the 4th Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers, of which his lordship's father is Honorary Colonel. In their indecent haste to foist this nobleman into the command of the battalion, the military authorities have promoted him at a bound from the rank of Lieutenant to that of Lieutenant-Colonel. The only service he has put in was as a Lieutenant in the 4th (Militia) Battalion of the Worcestershire Regiment, and he resigned his commission in that Battalion nearly ten years ago. Among the senior officers of his new regiment, over whose heads he jumps, are several with P.S.C. to their names. It is impossible to believe that Lord Wolseley can approve of such shameless sacrifice of the interests of the Service and those of other officers to private family interest; and if he has not sufficient backbone to make a stand against jobbery of this most flagrant type, the sooner he leaves his present position the better it will be for the Army.

A most impudent and undisguised violation of Service regulations and etiquette has lately been creating a sensation in the Militia. Two officers in that force, holding the humble rank of Major, have taken upon themselves to address a circular letter to all Commanding Officers, inviting them to answer a series of questions embodying suggestions for improving the efficiency and utility of the force. These suggestions, the two officers state, are to be laid by them before the Commander-in-Chief. The two officers in question are Lords Raglan and Selborne. They are evidently under the impression that their rank and dignity release them from all the ordinary obligations of discipline, and to all appearance this impression is well founded. It is safe to say that had any ordinary officer in any branch of the Service taken such a step, he would have been by this time in a fair way to lose his commission. But in this instance, a large number of C.O.s, obviously influenced by a spirit of servile toadyism, have obsequiously laid their views before the two Majors for transmission to the War Office; and the War Office itself has not ventured to breathe so much as a hint of disapproval.

The other day a Major of Marines—one of the smartest, most efficient, and most popular men in the Service—presumed to make certain suggestions for improving the efficiency and utility of the force to which he belonged. He did this at the personal invitation of the First Lord of the Admiralty, through the proper official channel, and in strict accordance with regulation and precedent. Subsequently he ventured to repeat the same suggestions in a discussion on professional matters at the United Service Institution. It being discovered that he had consulted with a few of his brother officers before presuming to take the latter step, he was at a moment's notice deprived of the appointment he held at Plymouth, and was banished to a foreign station, without any definite charge having been made against him, or an opportunity offered him of saying a word in his own defence. It was not a formal or officially-recorded punishment, but an underhand, vindictive, and irregular manner of getting rid of an officer who had offended "My Lords." With this case—the case of Major Brittan—compare that of the two Militia Majors above-mentioned, who coolly circularise about a hundred Commanding Officers for the avowed purpose of themselves laying before the Commander-in-Chief suggestions for the improvement of the force. This is done with impunity and without protest, while Major Brittan, who has done nothing irregular or improper, is punished with all the malignity that officialism is capable of. And what is the difference? Simply that the two Militia Majors are peers, and that one of them is the son-in-law of the Prime Minister.

Among the military grievances pilloried below, I invite special attention to the case of Private Mullens, of the Dublin Fusiliers, which throws a lurid light on court-martial justice. This is a case in which the civil authorities decline to proceed, the offence being within the cognisance of a criminal court, on the ground that there is no evidence to justify them in doing so. The military authorities are troubled by no such scruples. They promptly run Mullens in, and give him two years' imprisonment. The reasoning on which the Court proceeded appears to have been this: "The spade was thrown by somebody: nobody knows who threw it: Mullens may have had a reason to throw it: let us give Mullens two years." That the man was innocent, I do not say; but that his guilt has not been proved I assert positively, and in a criminal court the judge would have directed the jury to acquit him. Among the other matters mentioned below, I lay stress upon the 2nd Scots Guards' coal-boxes, because the season has arrived when soldiers are complaining on all sides of scarcity of fuel. My belief is that trickery and peculation are, in most cases, at the bottom of this scarcity; but, at any rate, it ought not to be difficult to make arrangements by which a supply of coal for each day's fire would be secured to every barrack-room. Probably when a week's supply is served out in one issue it is used wastefully at the beginning of the week. Why not fill the coal-box every morning?

1st Royal Dublin Fusiliers, Portsmouth. Private Mullens, of this battalion, was charged before a district court-martial with wounding Corporal Goodwin, by throwing a Wallace spade at him in the barrack-room and knocking his eye out. There had been some disturbance in the barrack-room, and Goodwin ordered Mullens and another man, named M'Kenna, to bed. Immediately afterwards the spade was thrown at Goodwin. No one saw it thrown, and Goodwin in the first instance accused, not the prisoner, but M'Kenna. The incident was reported to the civil police, apparently in the expectation that they would deal with it, but they declined to proceed, on the ground that there was no evidence on which a conviction could be obtained. Mullens was then sent for trial by court-martial. No evidence whatever directly connecting him with the throwing of the spade was given, but the other private (M'Kenna), who had originally been accused of throwing it, swore that while undressing "he saw a hand come over his shoulder, and immediately afterwards heard Goodwin cry out." He also stated that a few days earlier the prisoner had told him that "if ever he got the chance he would strike Goodwin cold." On this evidence Mullens was convicted, and he has now been sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

1st Royal Irish Rifles, Aldershot. In consequence of certain men who went on furlough to Belfast having misconducted themselves on board ship in crossing, furloughs have recently been refused to all but men of the very best character, and several have in consequence been disappointed of a trip to Ireland, one in the case of serious illness of a relative. This is the old story of punishing the innocent for the guilty, and at the same time it involves punishing a man twice over for the same offence. A man may have had some insignificant offence charged against him and have been properly punished for it at the time, and now, possibly a year or two afterwards, he is refused a furlough on account of this same crime.

2nd Scots Guards, Dublin. This is one of the battalions where the coals run short directly cold weather sets in. The measurement of one barrack-room coal-box is given as 4 ft. by 2 ft. by 2 ft., and when filled on Monday is said to be generally empty on Friday, and this is probable, for a box of the size given would hold about enough to keep a barrack-room fire going for four days. It is also stated that the Guard at the Viceregal Lodge were unable on a recent occasion to get any dinner until 4.30 p.m. through the coal not arriving until 1 o'clock.

Medical Staff Corps, Netley. Some curious facts are given as to the unnecessary amount of night duty imposed on orderlies at Netley Hospital. There have recently been six men on duty every night in attendance on a boy suffering from a fractured skull, and this long after the case had ceased to be serious. Special orderlies have also been placed on duty in various trivial cases, when there was nothing for them to do; and many of these men are on day duty till 6 p.m. and have to return to it when relieved at 7 next morning. Naturally they resent being worked to this extent in cases where the need of their services is not obvious.

Herbert Hospital, Woolwich. Complaints are made respecting the practice at this hospital of putting patients whose ailments are due to causes beyond their own control, into the same wards with men suffering from the consequences of their own indiscretion. The result is that the former class cannot be visited by their female relatives, lady visitors being excluded from such wards. When I mention that a gallant warrior suffering from a broken leg has been for this reason unable to see his own mother, I feel confident that different arrangements will be made at once.

1st Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, Lucknow. The idea has recently been started in the bungalows occupied by this battalion of having the woodwork rubbed with paraffin instead of painting it. The idea originated with the men of one company, who took to paraffining the woodwork voluntarily, and it may or may not be a desirable process. The grievance of the men, however, in connection with it is that they have themselves to provide the oil, which is charged against them under the head of "barrack damages." This, probably, explains the preference of the authorities for paraffin as against paint.

1st Bedfordshire Regiment, Umballa. A recent regimental order informs men "that compensation in lieu of helmet cover and zinc button at the rate of 15 annas for two, including marking, has been sanctioned for the year 1896. In the regimental tailor's shop of the 1st Bedfordshire, men are charged 12 annas for one of the same articles. What is the explanation of the difference? One way or the other it is pretty clear that "Tommy" is being had.

Apropos of the incessant refusals of publicans to serve soldiers in uniform, an officer remarked to me the other day that if it was possible to get a Bill through Parliament recently to prevent the wearing of the Queen's uniform by unauthorised persons, it ought to be possible to put through a short Bill, making it illegal for licensed victuallers to insult the Queen's uniform by refusing to serve those who wear it. I make a present of the suggestion to the representatives of the Army in Parliament. There are plenty of them, and the majority of them have not too much to do. If they were to unite in bringing forward a Bill for this purpose, there would be few to oppose them.

Much interest has been caused in military circles by the following announcement:—

REBBECK.—December 16, at Stafford Lodge, Bournemouth, the wife of Lieut.-Col. Rebbeck, V.D., of a son.

"What on earth is a Lieutenant-Colonel V.D.?" asks a puzzled correspondent. At first I was inclined to answer that it was probably a misprint for "D.V." (in allusion to the auspicious event under notice). On reference to military records, however, I gather that it may possibly stand for "Volunteer Decoration"—on the principle of "V.C." and "D.S.O." Another elegant addition to the available stock of handles to names.

Admiral Sir F. G. D. Bedford, K.C.B., has all the courage that we expect of our sailors. It would be difficult, I think, to surpass the boldness of the following utterance, addressed by the gallant Admiral to the Britannia cadets at their prize distribution last week:—

If they started fair, and gained the attention of their superiors by their zeal, they would find the work much easier as it advanced. That was the only interest that would help them in the Navy—the interest they made for themselves.

What a mistake some of us have been under all this time!

There is much grumbling at Devonport in consequence of an order, which was issued last week by Captain Henderson, of the Fleet Reserve, that all Christmas leave taken by warrant officers is to be reckoned as time and a half. This means that any warrant officer who now takes a fortnight's leave will ipso facto forfeit three weeks of the yearly leave which he is allowed by the regulations of the Service. There is no reason whatever why such an order should have been issued, and it may be hoped that it will be at once cancelled by the Admiralty.

Here is the latest example of the "pushfulness" of German commercial enterprise. It is a post-card received by an hotel proprietor at Eastbourne from Mr. J. C. Koch, of Hohenlimburg, Westphalia. The attached reply-card is a printed form containing blank spaces for the insertion of the information desired. What Mr. J. C. Koch may be I do not know, but I take it that he is interested either directly or indirectly in the manufacture of electric lighting and power plant in Germany, and there cannot be much doubt that he desires information for the benefit of the German trade in which he is interested. It is difficult to believe that any Englishman would oblige by assisting him, but if you only have cheek enough you may accomplish in this world many things which at first sight appear impossible:—

Sir,—I shall esteem it a great favour if you will kindly oblige by letting me know whether you use dynamos or motors either for producing electric light or for generating power, and whose make the machines are.

At the same time, I should thank you to give me, on the

Mr. John Skelton, the Vice-President and Chairman of the Local Government Board in Scotland, is to retire on March 31. Mr. Skelton ought to have gone five months ago, but he was granted an extension in order to facilitate certain arrangements which were desired by the Government. The post, which is worth £1,500 a year, was destined for a well-known Scotch Member, but this senator's seat is not safe, and it is probable that his claims will therefore be put aside. There has been some quiet wrangling as to whether Mr. Skelton's successor should be a Tory or a Liberal Unionist, and it is on the cards that this difficulty may be solved by passing over the Parliamentary candidates for the place, and letting the promotion go in the office. Mr. Skelton had been secretary for nearly a quarter of a century when he was promoted to his present post in 1892, so it would be a strong step to give the vacancy to the present secretary, who has held his place for little more than five years.

According to present arrangements the two actions which turn on the facts that make up the "Constantinople Consulate scandal" will come on for trial at Constantinople early in January. This trial, as already mentioned in Truth, is to be held before a special judge, appointed for the purpose by the Foreign Office under an Order in Council, which was published in the London Gazette a few weeks ago. If Lord Salisbury—or, perhaps I should say, the permanent officials at the Foreign Office—are in earnest in desiring to have the whole truth thrashed out, it is to be hoped that they will see the importance of securing the evidence of the Hon. M. H. Herbert, Chief Secretary of the Embassy, who has been away from Constantinople on leave of absence since the beginning of September. Mr. Herbert's evidence is, I believe, of the greatest importance in regard to certain points of the case. Presumably, knowing this, Mr. Herbert will himself be desirous of returning to Constantinople in time for the trial. But, as there are rumours that he may not come back to his post at all, it seems desirable that his official superiors should clearly understand the importance of his being at Constantinople, at any rate, on this occasion.

Those who desire to air grievances against the Post Office would save themselves and me trouble, if, before writing to Truth to complain of the operation of a rule in some particular case, they would seriously consider whether the rule is not a justifiable one. If it is, to denounce its enforcement as "red tape" is absurd. For instance, I get on an average fifty letters per annum from people who have had to pay a surcharge on post-cards in consequence of a piece of paper or card, or some such foreign body, having been attached to the post-card contrary to regulations. In the last case of this kind which I have been asked to show up, the address is on a printed slip, which has been gummed to the card—a legitimate proceeding with certain limits, but in this case the limit had been exceeded.

Now it must be obvious to any practical man that for the public to be allowed to attach any object they please to a post-card is out of the question; and it seems to me equally obvious that the Post Office cannot possibly attempt to discriminate between objects which may be attached to post-cards and objects which may not. What denunciations of red tape we should have were that attempted! There is also an obvious reason for limiting the size of the printed label which it is lawful to attach to the address side. The Department, therefore, seems to be justified in objecting generally to anything being attached to the back, and in limiting the size of what may be attached to the front. Having made such rules, it must enforce them without discrimination. It would be out of the question to give sorters or Post Office clerks a discretion to wink at some kinds of additions to post-cards and surcharge others. Wherever you make rules you create absurdities and hardships. It is absurd that if a letter weighs 1 oz. to the closest nicety, you can send it for a penny, and that if you enclosed the hind leg of a flea in that same letter, the Post Office should insist on your paying an extra halfpenny—50 per cent. more—just for the hind leg of a flea. Granted that this is absurd, it would be more absurd still if there were no line drawn between the penny and the three-halfpenny rate.

Another complaint against the Post Office, which I have been asked to ventilate, is the refusal of that Department to pass as a circular a manuscript notice of a meeting, sent on a card enclosed in an envelope to a number of different persons. The gentleman who raises this question contends by Paragraph c in the Regulations respecting Book-Post, that any written matter not being in the nature of a letter should be accepted at the halfpenny rate. He seems to overlook, however, the fact that, further on in the same section, the rules expressly define a circular. He contends that a manuscript notice sent to different people in identical terms is not "in the nature of a letter." But it seems to me that any written communication enclosed in an envelope is primâ facie "in the nature of a letter," and that in order to show that, for Post Office purposes, it is not of such a nature, you must bring it within the Post Office definition of a circular. It is clearly impossible for the Post Office to recognise every communication addressed in identical terms to several individuals as a circular. The Department cannot stop its business to sort out and compare all communications emanating from the same source, in order to ascertain whether they really are identical in terms; and, besides, unless such communications are all posted at the same time, it is absolutely impossible to compare them. The Post Office stands badly in need of criticism, but let the criticism be reasonable.

There seems to be considerable dissatisfaction in the parish of Welney, near Wisbech, with regard to the administration of a local charity, founded in 1661, which has an income of nearly a thousand pounds a year. A number of the parishioners complain that though the scheme provides for twelve resident trustees there are only six; and that though the same scheme directs that a public annual meeting shall be held "to inspect and peruse the accounts," this is never done. At the last vestry meeting a statement of the accounts was asked for but refused, and the copy of the balance-sheet, which has usually been published in the Parish Magazine, has not this year made its appearance. If what the aggrieved parishioners say as to the requirements of the scheme is correct, the action of the trustees must be distinctly illegal; but, even if that be not the case, their refusal to render a public account of their stewardship is exceedingly foolish; for it is sure to engender the idea that the information is kept back because the charity is not dispensed as it ought to be. Perhaps the Charity Commissioners will give the trustees a hint on the subject, and at the same time hurry up with their definition of the ecclesiastical and parochial parts of the charity, in accordance with the Local Government Act of 1894, which the Parish Council applied for some time ago, but which has not yet been supplied.

The pig-headed prejudice which the discharged soldier occasionally has to contend against in his search for employment was exemplified at the last meeting of the New Winchester Guardians, when a number of applications for the post of master and matron were considered. A committee had been directed to select ten candidates from among the large number who applied, and the chairman informed the Guardians that "a great many were ruled out because of a very strong feeling against old soldiers"—a remark which the Board greeted with laughter. It is evident, therefore, that, in the opinion of these patriots, the fact that a man has given up some of the best years of his life to the service of his country in the Army is in itself a sufficient reason for excluding him from a civil appointment, without regard to his merits and qualifications for the work. As a rule, I am not surprised at anything that Bumble says or does, but, seeing that this Board includes a General and four Colonels, I certainly am astonished that the chairman's flippant and discreditable statement was allowed to pass without a protest.

The Town Clerk of Coatbridge shares with the Irish orator's bird the power of being in two different places at the same time. So, at least, he endeavoured to prove at the police-court last week. The Town Clerk is also the Assessor, or legal adviser to the magistrates, and unless he or a duly appointed deputy is in attendance, the Court is not properly constituted. A solicitor raised the objection that the Assessor had not been present during the trial of a case, whereupon that official was fetched. His reply to the objection was that "he was always at hand if wanted, and therefore to all intents and purposes he was present, and the Court was properly constituted." That is to say, he sits in his own office transacting his other business, and yet at the same time he is present in the police-court in an adjoining building! It is a remarkable feat.

Although the Medway Guardians have censured their chaplain, and boycotted a local journal for calling attention to the treatment of the children in the workhouse, it is to be hoped that the question will not be allowed to drop in this way. Another reverend gentleman who visits the house has abundantly confirmed what the chaplain said as to the unsatisfactory associations and surroundings amid which the children are placed; and in the case of the adult paupers also, some of the arrangements appear to be in need of alteration. It is stated that an extension of the female receiving ward is shortly to be opened, which will make it unnecessary for little girls to be herded, as they sometimes are at present, with the most degraded of women. This, however, will by no means exhaust the opportunities for reform at the Medway Workhouse, and if the Guardians will not take in hand the other matters which have been mentioned, the Local Government Board should be asked to interfere.

With reference to my paragraph a fortnight ago concerning the West Bromwich Guardians, I have received a lengthy letter in support of the clerk's claim to the increase of salary which it was proposed to grant to him. This, however, is an aspect of the question which I do not feel called upon to discuss, as my comments were mainly directed to the objectionable procedure of the Guardians in dealing with such business in secret conclave, though I did also mention that the clerk holds a good many other offices besides the clerkship to this Union. The view which I took of the matter appears to have been appreciated by many of the ratepayers, and, in consequence of their protests, the Guardians ultimately decided to give the clerk an increase of £100 a year only, instead of the £200 a year and bonus of £200, which they first proposed. That fact is, in itself, the best answer to my correspondent's remarks.

EXIT BROOKS!

When Mr. Brooks, of Halesworth, put
This question to the jury—whether
He was a good, much-injured man
Or an impostor altogether?
With quite refreshing promptitude
They made their minds up on the matter,
And told him, in the clearest way,
That he was certainly the latter.

So Mr. Brooks now quits the stage
Where notice he'd too long commanded,
And passes from the public view,
"Impostor" on his forehead branded.
Yes, Brooks is done for, squashed and squelched,
His impudent career is finished,
But what of his too willing dupes?
Think you their number is diminished?

No, no! unchanged, they still remain
Dupes still—we know it to our sorrow;
They would be quite prepared to help
Another Brooks again to-morrow.
Let a new rogue, as gross as he,
Their spite and prejudices foster,
And they will be at once prepared
To patronise that fresh impostor.

Not out of charity—oh, no!
It is not pity that inspires them;
When they send money to a Brooks
It is their party rage that fires them.
Plain truth, in any shape, they hate—
For that disturbs their moral sleekness;
And so the Brookses take good care
To trade upon their little weakness.

Microbes, we know, don't germinate
Unless the soil should chance to suit them;
So 'tis with rogues, their numbers grow
Because the fools with funds recruit them.
And whilst the fools are thus content
The arrantest of rogues to nourish,
You may be quite assured of this,
That roguery will always flourish.

At least, though, we may fairly ask
Those dupes, by party passion blinded,
Who go to such insensate lengths
(As we but now have been reminded),
That when next time for some new rogue
Their zeal incontinently waxes,
They won't again, their cash to save,
Impose him on the public taxes.

So long as they are fools enough
Assistance of their own to render,
We cannot help it if they turn
Deaf ears to the advice we tender;
They must, if they so choose, supply
The cash they think his canting tale's worth;
But no Exchequer money, please,
To help to "run" another Halesworth!

A remarkable story of the administration of justice in India has been unfolded in some recent issues of the Madras Standard. Certain Hindus were charged before Mr. E. L. Vaughan, Joint Magistrate of Vellore, with making a raid on the school of the American Arcot Mission, and destroying a quantity of school furniture and other property, the complainant being the Christian Catechist, who was in charge of the school. Throughout the hearing of the case for the prosecution, Mr. Vaughan was browbeating and obstructing the counsel for the defence in the most extraordinary manner; and his hostility became at last so transparent that application was made for the transfer of the case to another Court on the ground that the accused could not have a fair and impartial trial before the Joint Magistrate. In support of this application, counsel made an affidavit. When called upon for an explanation, Mr. Vaughan described the statements in this affidavit as false, and it became the duty of Mr. S. H. Wynne, District Magistrate, to inquire into the matter. The result of the inquiry was to show, in Mr. Wynne's opinion, that the Joint Magistrate had been guilty of improper and irregular conduct; that in regard to two specific points his account of what occurred was "incorrect," and that the accused had reasonable cause for believing that they were not being tried in an impartial manner. Upon this report the case was transferred to the file of the Headquarters Deputy Magistrate, who found that there was no proof that the alleged offence was ever even committed, let alone that the accused took part in it, and they were accordingly discharged.

It is obvious that this affair must not be allowed to end with the acquittal of the accused. As Mr. Wynne observes, in regard to one particular incident, "the action of the magistrate (Mr. Vaughan) in court, as proved by four statements on oath, and his action in giving this incorrect account of it in reply, are serious matters." The condemnation that has been passed upon Mr. Vaughan by his official superior is, indeed, so serious that unless he can show that his action has been unjustly judged, he ought to be deprived of his magisterial powers and duties. In more than one instance during recent years the Madras Government have shielded, and even promoted, officials who have grossly abused their authority; but on this occasion the scandal is so flagrant that it is difficult to see how they can pass it over.

One of the Stranraer magistrates has addressed me at some length concerning the man Taylor, who died in Maxwelltown Gaol while undergoing fourteen days' imprisonment for keeping his dwelling in a dirty and unwholesome condition. For many years, it is claimed, every possible consideration was shown to this palsied old mendicant, and it was only on the complaint of the people living in the same building that he was at last prosecuted for the abominable nuisance and danger to health which his filthy practices occasioned. I am also informed that on the second and last prosecution the magistrates wished him to enter the poorhouse instead of going to gaol in default of paying the fine; but that, after consenting to do so, he changed his mind, and desired the police to take him to the prison. It is a pity these facts were not elicited at the inquiry at the prison upon which I commented, for they undoubtedly put a much better complexion upon the action of the Stranraer authorities. At the same time, from all my correspondent says about the man's habits, it seems to me that he might well have been dealt with as a lunatic rather than as a criminal.

In their treatment of youthful offenders the Grimsby Magistrates appear to be the most harsh and reactionary in the whole country. As readers of my Legal Pillory are aware, the victims are usually disobedient fishing apprentices who get a dose of hard labour for offences which in the full-grown fisherman are considered sufficiently punished by the exaction of a modest fine. Last week, for a wonder, no fisherboy came before the Bench, and so their severity was vented on a youngster of fourteen who had stolen a watch and other articles belonging to his brother. Anything more idiotic and indefensible than the sentence which I record below could scarcely be conceived. Nobody fit to have the slightest voice in the administration of the law would expect a lad of this age to be benefited or reformed by a month's experience of prison life, and in committing him the magistrates have written themselves down—but no, I will not libel useful and intelligent beasts by the comparison. The Barnsley Shallows are also familiar figures in this column. It will be seen that they have on this occasion visited a brutal outrage on a wife with a sentence which is, at least, a vast improvement on the customary pecuniary penalty, though it still falls a long way short of the punishment meted out in the same town for an offence against the Game Laws:—

Barnsley Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. H. Pigott, W. Jackson, J. H. Gratton, Alderman Woodcock, and Councillor Horne. John Shaw, charged with unlawfully wounding his wife. He seized her by the throat, threw her backwards, and kicked her about the body as she lay on the ground, causing profuse bleeding. A doctor who attended to her injuries said there was one wound half an inch long and half an inch deep, and the woman's clothing from the middle downwards was saturated with blood. On the doctor saying the wound was not dangerous the charge was reduced to one of assault. Twenty-one days.

Barnsley West Riding Police-court. Before Messrs. M. C. Halton and W. Brady. George Henry Haigh, charged with poaching. Two months, and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

Chelmsford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. T. Kemble, J. T. Foster, F. Chancellor, and Dr. Christy. William Clarke, charged with sleeping out. Six days.

Paisley Police-court. Before Bailie Bell. John Wilson, carter, convicted of assaulting his mother by striking her on the face with a boot, beating her with his fists, and seizing her by the throat. Fined 10s. 6d.

Stranraer Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Watson. Alexander M'Crae, charged under the Night Poaching Act with unlawfully taking two rabbits. Fined £3 or one month.

Saffron Walden Borough Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. E. B. Gibson and J. Bell. John Edward Hardwick, baker, charged with an aggravated assault on his wife. He struck her on the head and face, knocking her down, and subsequently kicked her in the back, and again struck her, rendering her unconscious. The Bench granted a separation order, and for the assault imposed a fine of 1s. and 14s. costs.

Braintree Petty Sessions. Before Mr. H. R. G. Marriott and other magistrates. Alice Collard, aged 19, and Annie Richardson, aged 14, pleaded guilty to stealing threepennyworth of swede turnips. Collard fourteen days; Richardson four years in a reformatory.

Cinque Ports Petty Sessions, Margate. Lewis Shrubsole, of Kensington Lodge, Westgate-on-Sea, who was said to have been six times Mayor of Faversham, convicted of assaulting a girl, twelve years of age, in a railway carriage. Fined 40s. and 12s. costs.

Dover County Petty Sessions. Frederick and James Beer, boys of 14 and 12 years respectively, charged with throwing stones and assaulting Victor Orange, an aged Frenchman, while at work in his garden. Complainant was pelted with stones by a number of lads. Three weeks each.

Lawford's Gate Police court. Before the Duke of Beaufort, Messrs. W. Somnerville, W. H. Butler, H. R. Thomas, and R. Brown. John Windsor, charged with being drunk and disorderly and with assaulting his wife. He went home drunk, and, without provocation, assaulted his wife, using the tongs, throwing the poker at her, and kicking her brutally. Fined 2s. 6d. and costs for the first offence, and bound over to keep the peace for three months towards his wife.

Long Sutton Police-court. George Cave, retired foundryman, charged with wilfully neglecting his four children. All the children were in a shockingly neglected and filthy state, a baby of five months having a mass of sores, caused through want of cleanliness. There was a horrible stench in the house, which was throughout in a foul and dirty condition. Prisoner had over £450 in his possession when arrested. Fined £1.

Worthing Petty Sessions. Before Lieut.-Col. Wisden, Messrs. H. Hargood, G. Wedd, C. L. M. Teesdale, and Dr. H. J. Strong. John Knight, charged with assaulting John Ford. Defendant hit complainant on the side of the head, knocking him down, and then kicked him on the hip and struck him in the ribs. The Bench said it was a serious assault. Fined 10s. and costs.

Central Criminal Court. Pedro Castro Orellana, a Chilian seaman, convicted of the manslaughter at sea of Evan Evans, by stabbing him in the breast and thigh. The jury believed he acted under provocation. Bound over to come up for sentence if called upon.

Grimsby Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Aldermen E. Palmer, W. B. Louth, and W. Jackson. Herbert Rycroft, aged fourteen, son of a dentist, charged with stealing a watch and other articles, the property of his brother. One month's hard labour, the Mayor remarking that if the prisonor came before the Bench again he would be sent to a reformatory.

Loddon Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. E. T. de Poix and C. G. Kemball. George Yallop, drover, charged with game trespass, and Emmanuel Rudrum, with aiding and abetting him. Yallop fined £2.6s.3d., or one month; Rudrum £1. 7s. 9d., or fourteen days.

Stony Stratford Police-court. Before Mr. A. Grant Thorold and Mr. W. Purslow. Alexander Gresham, charged with sleeping out. Seven days. He was further charged with begging on the previous day. One month.

St. Austell Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. A. Coode, J. E. Veale, and Lieut.-Col. Hext. Thomas Lobb and William Dungey, convicted of poaching. Lobb two months and Dungey three months.

Wingham Petty Sessions, Dover. William Tucker, charged with stealing a cotton shirt from a clothes line. Fourteen days.

Warrington County Petty Sessions. James Rowson, charged with night poaching. Three months, and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

I understand that there is at present in Oldmill Reformatory, near Aberdeen, a boy who was nineteen years old on November 30. He was originally committed to the reformatory for five years, of which period he has served all but seven months. I gather that some attempt has been made to obtain his release on the ground of his age, but the Committee refuse to release him. Can any one tell me whether his detention is legal? The question has been asked of me, but, unfortunately, Scotch law is one of the few things that I don't know anything about. In England a boy can be kept in a reformatory up to twenty-one, and I see no reason why he should not be in Scotland. But if there is any doubt on the point, let us have the boy out by all means.

All the examples of magisterial ferocity that I recollect are put into the shade by a case which occurred a few weeks ago at Rangoon. It came up in the form of an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner's Court by one Nga Tha Zan. For the theft of a lota, valued at six annas—about threepence in English money—this poor wretch had been sentenced, under Section 75 of the Indian Penal Code, to transportation for life. The Commissioner came to the conclusion that the conviction in the lower court must be upheld, but that the sentence was "unduly severe," and he therefore reduced it to seven years' rigorous imprisonment; commuted into transportation for seven years. I do not know if the Indian Penal Code gives the accused any further right of appeal, but if it does I trust he will exercise it. The se ond sentence is lenient in comparison with the first, but yet another very substantial reduction might be made without erring on the side of mercy.

The Belfast justices recently issued an order for the destruction of a dog, doing so on the complaint of a person who had been bitten. In a civil action for damages for the bite which was heard last week it came out that the dog had not been destroyed, but had been sent to England the moment it was thought the magistrates might make the order. The complainant does not seem satisfied with the mere departure of the animal from Ireland, and he asks me whether a magistrates' order in such a case can be set at nought with impunity. I suppose that when a dog is legally condemned to death the dog's owner is liable to a penalty for refusing to allow the sentence to be executed. Whether he escapes this penalty by banishing the dog to another part of the kingdom, as in this instance, after the summons is taken out but before the magistrates' order is actually made, is, however, a more difficult question. Perhaps one of my legal readers can enlighten me upon it.

This has been a bad week for the begging-letter trade Following on the downfall of George Brooks, my old friend Henry Crispe has got another twelve months' hard labour, and richly he deserves it. Another of the fraternity, trading as "David Barrie," has also been awarded three months at Marlborough-street. But I regret to say that the list is still very far from exhausted.

The Chief Constable of Hastings has also succeeded in bringing a very persistent begging-letter writer to justice. The man in question, Charles Leicester, has frequently been mentioned in these columns, and, except for two periods when he was in gaol for other offences, he has been carrying on this game for many years past, his appeals to the charitable being mainly based on his claim to relationship with a noble family. Last week he was brought up at Hastings Police-court on a charge of endeavouring to obtain money by means of a begging-letter, and after hearing an account of his career from the Chief Constable, the Bench sentenced him to a month's hard labour. I am strongly of opinion myself that the police-court (not a civil court) is the proper place for dealing with all such impostors.

Apropos of what I have said about Irish lotteries, I have been asked to ventilate the grievance of a Londoner, who says that he remitted 5s. for tickets in one at Dublin recently, but that the tickets were never sent to him, and that his complaints to the secretary have been ignored. I dare say mistakes or oversights of the same kind frequently occur in connection with these affairs, but as the whole business is entirely illegal so far as England is concerned, it is hardly worth while to enter into this fresh branch of the subject. This disappointed customer intended to sell some of the tickets, so their non-arrival really saved him from becoming (in the eye of the law) a rogue and vagabond.

Circumstances have caused me to pay (by deputy) several visits, of late, to "Cathedral House," or "Cathedral Offices," St. Andrew's Hill, E.C. It was hither that my representative went innumerable times in pursuit of "Thomas Kempe," the swindler who defrauds deaf people by advertising an infallible cure for their infirmity. To the same place I had to send in search of a turf tout, named "Prescott," who issues circulars soliciting commissions. I have been much interested by the account which my representative gives of the abode of these worthies. It seems to be a sort of human warren. The house is of ordinary size, but the upper floors are divided off into about a dozen cubicles, or "offices," by slight partitions, each "office" being about the size of a small bathing-machine. Each door, of course, has its letter-box, and, as a rule, I should imagine that the letter-box is practically the raison d'être of the "office." This information may possibly be of service to those who find themselves brought, by means of circulars or advertisements, into communication with tenants of "Cathedral Offices."

Mr. G. R. Hatton, of the Biographer, is progressing slowly but steadily with his search for biographical subjects. When I last heard of him, he had apparently got as far as the letter B in the Post Office London Directory. He is now at H. There are a good many names in the Directory between B and H, but from what I can see of them it will need a considerable exercise of skill—not to say imagination—on Mr. Hatton's part to make the biographies of interest to any one but themselves.

A friend sends me a curious correspondence which he has had with an individual giving the name of Walker, and writing from an address in Leeds. Walker wrote respecting "a fine old long case clock," which he represented as having formerly belonged to my correspondent's family, and being inscribed with their name. The clock, he further explained, had been in the possession of a deceased old lady, who many years ago was a housekeeper in the service of the family, and as it was about to be sold by auction, he suggested that he should be commissioned to buy the interesting relic. This kind offer not being accepted, he later on intimated that the sale was over, but that he could get the clock for £5. He was then told that that sum would be paid if he would send the clock to London on "appro.," and it proved a genuine old one; but this did not suit Walker, and, finding no other proposal would be entertained, he relieved his feelings in a final impertinent letter, and the matter dropped. The whole business looks suspiciously like an ingenious development of the traffic in bogus and worthless old clocks and other articles which was exposed in these columns a few weeks back, and I shall be interested to learn whether any of my readers have had similar communications or transactions with Walker, Leeds.

The well-known rubber-stamp trick is evidently being worked for all it is worth in Manchester, the daily papers there regularly publishing the advertisements of T. Smith & Co., North Kensington; F. Paynter & Co., Torquay; and M. Truscott & Co., also of Torquay, the three firms most prominently identified with this kind of business. The modus operandi by which these gentry dispose of their goods on the pretence of enabling persons who remit them a shilling or so to earn a weekly salary of from 7s. 6d. to £1 or more in their spare time is familiar to most of my readers, but it is apparently unknown to the editors of my Manchester contemporaries. This is a pity, for I cannot but think that if they were aware of the nature of the dodge they would, as respectable journalists, refuse to publish advertisements which are speciously designed to delude and ensnare necessitous people into the purchase of articles on which they would not otherwise dream of wasting their money.

Here is another example of the method of business of Messrs. Kendal & Dent, of 106, Cheapside, E.C. They first sent a watch to a colour-sergeant of an Irish regiment, informing him at the same time that their representative, an individual of whom the N.C.O. had never heard, had given them his name as "agent," and that "they would be glad if he would form a watch and jewellery club for them." This was also accompanied by a circular showing Kendal & Dent's "private terms for secretaries of clubs only." The colour-sergeant took no notice of the communication, one way or the other, and Kendal & Dent then began to pester him for payment for the watch, which they priced at 30s. On December 5 they wrote demanding an immediate settlement, and this was followed up by a "final application" printed in red ink, informing the N.C.O., that unless the money was paid by a specified date "immediate proceedings would be taken in the County Court." The only notice the colour-sergeant has taken of this is to send the documents to me and to ask me to notify Kendal & Dent that he has no intention of either returning the watch or paying the price, and that if they want the article they can send and fetch it.

It is a pity that all N.C.O.s do not take a similar line with firms like Kendal & Dent; but I am afraid there are a good many of them who accept the bribe offered, and abuse their authority over their comrades by getting them to join these so-called "clubs." It is a matter that Commanding Officers will do well to look into. The precise amount of the bribe offered by Kendal & Dent appears from their printed circular to be four shillings in the pound commission on all money paid in, "and a handsome present of any goods selected from our catalogue to the value of two guineas." Another "confidential" communication sent to a sergeant in a cavalry regiment in India by one "Henry E. Peck," offers 10 per cent. commission on his 35s. watches. It is not to be wondered at that men in the Army should be influenced by inducements on this scale.

Our old friend, Reuben May has been exceptionally active during the last few weeks. A gentleman who has had three circulars from him in the course of a month, suggested to me the other day that this activity was due to the fact that, owing to the mildness of the season, and the comparative absence of distress, charity-mongers like Reuben find the times very bad. Whether there is anything in this I cannot say, but, whatever the state of the weather, I would strongly advise the public to abstain from supporting Reuben, or any other "philanthropist" of the same type.

The mention of Reuben May naturally suggests John James Jones. John James, like Reuben and a good many others, is just now trying his best to gather a portion of the harvest of Christmas subscriptions into his own garner. Readers of TRUTH have had so many opportunities of judging of the merits of John James Jones and of the London Samaritan Society, that it can hardly be necessary to remind them again now of the many reasons why they should not encourage this particular philanthropic effort.

One day last week I perceived amongst my letters an envelope upon which was printed—"On Her Majesty's Service." Wishing to see on what matter H.M. Service was corresponding with me, I opened it at once, when I was confronted with a circular from Mr. H. Luedders, Banker, Hamburg, presenting to me the compliments of the season, and suggesting to me that I should purchase tickets in the Hamburg Lottery, of which institution he enclosed me the prospectus. The envelope was sealed up, and the seal appeared to bear a sort of Turkish superscription. It had a penny stamp attached to it, and the postmark was Godalming. Such appeals are, I believe, illegal, and my experience of them is that they are usually sent from abroad. In any case, the "On Her Majesty's Service" cannot be right and proper, and as Godalming is not a very large place, an investigation there by the authorities might result in the discovery of the sender.

Here is an interesting document recently addressed to a lady in London. What the advertisement referred to in it was I cannot state, but its nature may be easily guessed:—

51, Lothian-road, Edinburgh,
December 15, 1896.

Re "Fides."

Madam,—In reply to your note to "Fides," I beg to inform you that, having suffered for some time from relaxed throat, I have decided to pass two or three months in a warm climate, and for that purpose have decided upon Nice and Monte Carlo, where I shall be able to combine pleasure with profitable occupation. Last summer I spent six weeks at Spa, where, with £40 to start, I cleared all my expenses and made a clear profit of £150 at roulette by playing upon a method of my own. . . . As it is easier for two persons (who relieve each other every hour or two) to play it, I advertised for a gentleman to join me in the trip, and who would now and then take his turn at the tables. A lady with a cool head could do the same, but a calm temperament is essential to carry out the method successfully.

It is not money that I am advertising for, as I have sufficient of my own, and for all that is required, and the whole thing can be worked upon a capital of £50 without the slightest risk.

If you wish to join, that is, spend the winter in the Riviera, I could give you a half share, that is to say, you would receive about £5 daily by contributing £50 to the playing fund, and which £50 would always remain in your hand.

I may mention that I am not a young man, being 60 years of age.—Yours truly, C. W. Bucheren.

P.S. Reference to my bankers can be given.

The significant hint about Mr. Bucheren's age is apparently intended to allay any misgivings that a lady might feel about taking a trip to the Riviera with an absolute stranger; but I am bound to say that I have known men of sixty who are not exactly Galahads. At any rate, whatever this pledge of Mr. Bucheren's honourable intentions may be worth, I should recommend any lady to obtain from his bankers something more substantial in the way of a proof of his credit and trustworthiness before entering into partnership on the terms proposed. I have read the letter several times over, but why Mr. Bucheren, having ample funds at his disposal, should require the partner to contribute £50 merely to play the game occasionally in his absence, is a mystery beyond my penetration. Moreover, a system so far surpassing all other infallible systems hitherto offered to the public, that it will yield a profit of £10 a day (£5 is the half-share) on a capital of £50, is not quite the sort of precious secret which a man would offer to a stranger for no consideration beyond a contribution of £50 to the joint capital, and even that £50 to remain at the partner's disposal. His handwriting, equally with his name, proclaims Mr. Bucheren to be a foreigner. The address "51, Lothian-road, Edinburgh," is stamped upon his note-paper. Is he known at that address? Has any local doctor been attending to his "relaxed throat"?

Messrs. Metzler & Co. have just issued a list of the works of Gabriel Fauré, including "Persian Roses" (Les Roses d'Ispahan), and other Songs, which have both English and French words.

Sir H. Gilzean-Reid writes:—

Let me thank TRUTH for promptly contradicting the reports that the King and the Government of Belgium participate in the profits of public gambling in that country, and add a fact or two. Not only are gambling and betting to be made practically illegal, but a Bill has passed the Senate by a majority of fifty-nine to one, which subjects to eight days' or six months' imprisonment and a fine of 3,000 francs any broker who gambles in stocks or fictitious "margins;" these penalties may be increased when the offender is proved to have taken advantage of a client's weakness or ignorance. One flourishing casino has already been closed by the police.

I trust that the three estimable gentlemen who are to go on a trip to the West Indies will have a pleasant outing, and will give us so much information about those parts, that the cost of their excursion will be repaid. But if any person supposes that the inhabitants of these Isles are ready to pay extra for their sugar, in order to enable that article to be produced at a profit in the West Indies, he will find himself greatly mistaken. Within my memory, the West Indies have always been ruined. This is the normal condition of all tropical countries, except when the natives are obliged to work under some system of forced labour, and I suspect that it always will be. The reason is that where people can live in a way that pleases them without working, they prefer it. Wherever a negro can plant a few bananas round his hut, and occasionally do a bad day's work to provide him with what he deems luxury, he will not submit to the hard daily work of a plantation. I see no reason why the West Indies should cultivate sugar, if it does not pay. There are plenty of other products that might be cultivated there remuneratively, if the islands are cut out of the sugar market owing to competition. At present such products are not cultivated, because the owners of land there are persons of little energy and small capital, whilst, as I have said, the negro population prefers a loafing to a laborious existence.

What has always surprised me is, that our agriculturists do not cultivate the beetroot. Apart from bounties, in many parts of Continental Europe, beet sugar can compete with cane sugar in cost of production. Then why not in England?

It is satisfactory to find that the Cape military authorities have put an end to the alarming state of affairs at the King Williams-town Barracks, which was noted in TRUTH on September 24. The complaint was that a large quantity of arms and ammunition, including 38,000 lb. of loose gunpowder, was without a proper guard, having been for some time, indeed, actually left to the care of a couple of old watchmen. The loose gunpowder has since been advertised for sale, while for the protection of the rest of the stores a detachment of Cape Mounted Rifles has now been stationed at the barracks, and the worthy burghers of King Williamstown can therefore dismiss from their minds the horrid fears with which they were so long haunted.

When interviewed on landing in England last week, Lieutenant-Colonel Pigott, late Acting British Resident at Coomassie, alluded to a reported intention either to remove King Prempeh to another colony or to reinstate him on his throne. For every reason, I trust that the latter course will be adopted. It is said that the captive monarch is too near his old subjects, and that one of his former chiefs has been able to communicate with him in his prison. But the ostensible reason for his imprisonment was that he would not, or could not, pay the indemnity demanded of him, and I understand that he is now in gaol, like a judgment debtor committed for "contempt," pending the payment of the debt. How in the name of reason and justice is the unfortunate monarch to raise the money, unless he is allowed to communicate with his friends?

Is it, or is it not, true, as Prempeh himself states in paragraph 14 of his petition to Mr. Chamberlain (published in TRUTH of October 14) that when the British demand was made, he offered £2,670 down and the balance at the end of a week, with two hostages as security for the payment? Is it true that it was only when this offer was refused that he was arrested (apparently on suspicion of "concealing his assets") and lodged, with his court and attendants (male and female), in a cell 12 ft. square at Elmina? If this is true, or bears any approximate relation to the truth, we have no excuse for keeping him in gaol, and still less for transporting him to some other colony. It is pretty certain by this time that he did not conceal any of his assets, and if all we want from him is cash, the only chance of getting it is to release him under adequate security for his good behaviour.

Parliamentary ethics, as regards the management of private Bill legislation, were unpleasantly illustrated last Session in the following case:—The Poor-Law Officers Superannuation Bill, drawn up by a Committee, of which Mr. Rutherglen, the Vestry Clerk of Kensington, was chairman, was brought into Parliament, endorsed by four members, of whom Mr. J. Bailey moved the second reading. There was little opposition to the principle of the Bill, and it was referred to the Standing Committee on Law, and reported to the House by that body on May 1. On April 21, however, a meeting representing the matrons and nurses of London and Provincial Workhouse Infirmaries had been held, and a resolution passed that the provisions of the Bill were unsuitable to the women employed in infirmaries and in attendance on the sick. The resolution, with the amendments suggested, was sent to several Members of Parliament interested in Poor-Law questions. Mr. Boulnois, M.P. for Marylebone and a recognised authority on such matters, undertook to move the amendments before the third reading was taken. The promoters of the Bill took no steps to push it forward, until August 6, when Mr Boulnois, who had left London, received a telegram (confirming a letter of the previous day) in which Mr. Rutherglen said that, after an interview with a member of the Cabinet, he had received the promise that the Government would "star" the Bill, and it could be passed if the amendments were withdrawn; and he added that it was further arranged that these amendments would be inserted in the House of Lords, with the approval of the Government. On this stipulation, definitely stated, Mr. Boulnois telegraphed to remove his block. No progress, however, was made with the Bill until August 13, when it passed without remark, and was sent up to the House of Lords. Here, all Standing Orders having been suspended, it was passed through its various stages on August 14 in a couple of minutes, without the insertion of a single one of the amendments for which Mr. Boulnois had stipulated when he removed his block in the Commons.

Mr. Spence Watson, President, Mr. E. Evans, jun., Chairman of Committee, and others of the N.L.F., are not wanting either in common sense or political acumen. But each succeeding year the N.L.F. becomes more doddering, and it has now ceased to be more than a happy hunting ground for wirepullers and machine politicians. A factor in Liberalism it is no longer. Conservatives smile merrily, Radicals sadly, over its meetings, and no one cares a brass farthing what resolutions it passes.

At the gathering in Liverpool last week the members of the Federation wrangled over the Armenian question, and whilst cursing Lord Salisbury with bell, book, and candle, protested against all Party action against him, because, as Professor Maine said (these men of science are always mere phrasemongers in politics) he would not "substitute the one-edged weapon of Party for the two-edged weapon of the nation." Until we know what Lord Salisbury has done, and intends to do, it seems to me idle for us to do more than to inform him what Liberals insist that he should do. If he renounces all his past Eastern policy, and accepts that of Mr. Gladstone, we are prepared to welcome the repentant sinner; if he does not, we ought to be prepared to fight him. The N.L.F. appears to be afraid to enunciate the principles that have until the last two or three years been professed by the Liberal Party in respect to our foreign policy, because its members are not certain that those who adhered to them in the last Parliament may not once again be forced to denounce them.

Mr. E. J. C. Morton opined that no one present would take Lord Salisbury for his body servant. It seems to me that Mr. Morton might have waited until the Premier expressed a desire to take service as his valet, for the knowledge that under no circumstances will he be permitted to occupy this post of his body servant may make him needlessly unhappy. For my part, I do not greatly trouble myself about the politics of my servants. My kitchen-maid, my housemaid, and my other maids, may be the most sturdy of Tories for all I care, provided that they properly perform their household work. Were I in search of a valet, I do not think that I should look to politicians for one, because, whether Tory, or Liberal, or Radical, they would probably fail to satisfy me as body servants. Still humour is said to consist in bringing together two ideas in themselves incongruous, and if this definition be correct, there is a good deal of humour in Lord Salisbury being occupied in brushing Mr. Morton's coat and polishing his boots.

SCRUTATOR.

IRELAND'S NEW GRIEVANCE.

I AM by no means clear that the Irish have a case against us in regard to inequality of taxation, and I confess that I look with a certain degree of suspicion on the Unionist tigers and the Home Rule lions uniting in a joint raid on the Saxon taxpayer, instead of seeking to devour each other. The Report of the Commission on Irish Finance starts upon the principle of Ireland and Great Britain each having a separate taxable entity—a proposition which I should hardly be inclined to accept, unless they have a separate Administration. The Irish entity is then proved to be taxed proportionately higher than the British entity by a comparison of the respective amounts paid in death dues. These dues, however, are not a fair standard of taxation, for a country may spend its income or save its income, and I can perfectly conceive that a spending country may be proportionately richer than a saving country, so far as income is concerned. England contributes 52 millions to Imperial expenditure, Scotland 6½ millions, and Ireland 2 millions, because two-thirds of the 6 millions collected in Ireland are spent there on local purposes. This is admitted by the Commission. But it is urged that this excessive local expenditure is due to the Administration in Ireland being far too costly. The remedy, I should have thought, would have been to reform the Administration. For Parliament to accept the finding of the Commission, and in consequence of that finding to pay back to Ireland 2⅝ millions per annum, is to say that, because England chooses to maintain an extravagant Administration in Ireland, England must pay for the luxury.

I am a strong Home Ruler. If Ireland demands Home Rule, although the other component parts of the United Kingdom do not, it ought to be granted to Ireland. But I should like to see it granted to England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. If we had Home Rule in Ireland, then it would be possible for Ireland to contribute no more than what, after thorough investigation, would be estimated to be her fair quota towards Imperial taxation. But, without Home Rule, there cannot well be separate entities of taxation in the same country, because the taxable entity is dependent on the administrative entity. Take Germany: in that Empire there are taxes for Imperial purposes which are levied equally over the entire area. Assume that Bavaria is relatively a poorer country than Prussia; nevertheless the Imperial taxes are the same in both countries.

The relation of the taxable capacity of one part of a country to another part, has nothing to do with the relation of the taxable capacity of individuals in one part to those living in another part. The taxable capacity of Middlesex is proportionately greater than that of Sussex, but it does not follow that an individual in the former ought to pay a higher percentage on his income in taxes than an individual in the latter, or that the indirect taxes ought to be less in the one than in the other. A has £5,000 income derived from property in Middlesex, and B has £5,000 income derived from property in Sussex. If the income-tax be 5 per cent., the £250 paid by the former is not a heavier burthen to him than the same sum paid by the latter, although the total incomes of the people in Sussex may only be to total incomes of the people in Middlesex as one is to one thousand. So, too, as respects indirect taxation. A man is not treated unjustly in Sussex if he pays the same rate of impost on the tea that he drinks as a man in Middlesex, because, owing to there being fewer people to drink tea in the one county than in the other, less tea is drunk in Sussex than in Middlesex,

The argument that an Irish labourer has a lower wage than an English labourer, and, therefore, that he ought to pay lower indirect taxes on the articles that he consumes, is merely an argument against all indirect taxes, and in no sense more applicable to an Irish than to an English labourer. It has been urged a thousand times that these taxes weigh more heavily on the poor than on the rich; and this has never been denied. But are the wages, say, of men employed in Belfast ship-yards less than those employed in British ship-yards? And, even if this were so, could it be contended that this is the result of Ireland, as a taxable entity, being proportionally overtaxed, in comparison with the British taxable entity? What, then, ought Irish Home Rule Members to do? With Irish Unionist Members they ought to insist on reduction in cost of Administration in Ireland. But they ought, at the same time, to point out to the latter that the only possible way of making Ireland a taxable entity, contributing only its fair quota to Imperial expenditure, is to obtain Home Rule for her. Irish landlords and Ulster manufacturers are not absolute fools. Show them clearly that their taxes will be lessened by Home Rule, and they will soon become Home Rulers. Lessen their taxation without granting Home Rule, and they will harden their hearts against the latter.

BROOKS

I confess that I was somewhat surprised by the ignominious collapse of the Rev. George Brooks. That this man would ever persuade twelve intelligent Englishmen that the remarks I have made about him were not fully justified by the facts, I never supposed. But I certainly expected that he would have been able to make at least a show of a fight. Since attention was first called in Truth to his career, he has bragged and blustered about what he was going to do, as few men but George Brooks could brag or bluster. In the bulky pamphlet that he put forth in answer to my first article, he declared that he should look for vindication to the verdict, not merely of twelve of his countrymen, but of "twelve hundred, twelve thousand, yea, twelve millions"! He has paraded the names of all sorts of wise and eminent persons who were ready to act as vouchers for his integrity. He has issued leaflets "challenging" me to meet him in a court of law. He has talked with confidence of the punishment which he was prepared to administer to all who have questioned his integrity. Not content with bringing me into court, he issued a whole sheaf of writs against other journals which had spoken unkindly of him. And after all this he comes before a jury, only to be contemptuously kicked out of court before a particle of evidence had been given against him, except that which he kindly provided out of his own mouth in cross-examination. That he was an empty wind-bag I knew, but I was hardly prepared to see him burst like this. Nor does his collapse end here. The verdict of the twelve jurymen has been endorsed by the verdict of "twelve hundred, twelve thousand, yea, twelve millions"—only it has been a verdict in precisely the opposite sense to that which Brooks anticipated. There was hardly a newspaper in London or in England which did not on Friday last administer a parting kick to the reverend gentleman, and, regardless of party and principles, they all seem to have tried who could kick him hardest. Never before can I remember to have seen my friends and contemporaries of the Press so thoroughly unanimous.

It is not my habit to kick a man when he is down, but there are certain aspects of Brooks's case on which I am entitled to say a word or two. The man himself is a human document of far more interest than any of his books. Originally a Lancashire mill-hand, he was of far too pushful and self-assertive a disposition to remain in that obscure position, and, in the fulness of time, he became a Dissenting preacher and minister. He got on so well in this line as to become pastor of a chapel in the West End of London, with an income of £300 a year. He then quarrelled with his congregation—conscientiously, it may have been, but in all human probability from the sheer force of his bumptiousness and vanity. Next he turned his attention to literature and politics. He became a contributor to Truth, distinguishing himself chiefly by gibbeting the failings of clergy and landlords. He wrote a truculent pamphlet under the suggestive pseudonym of "Cassius" (who also, it will be remembered, was suspected of "an itching palm") denouncing Mr. Balfour's Irish administration. I should think that no man ever was called so many names in the same space as Mr. Balfour was called in this volume. Previously to this "Cassius" had been to Midlothian as an agrarian agitator, and had obtained no less than £330 for his services in that capacity from a farmer named Russell—the old gentleman whom he put into the witness-box last week, and who was certified to be insane a few months after he paid Brooks this money. During his "Cassius" period Brooks also started a Mission Hall, as a speculation of his own, in South London, but it was not a success, and his connection with it landed him in the Bankruptcy Court. His liabilities were about £600, and his assets nil—for his household furniture was protected from his creditors by a bill of sale. This was the low water mark of Brooks's career. Now mark how the tide turned.

It was suddenly "borne in" upon Brooks (to use one of his own conventional phrases), shortly after the time when he emerged from the Bankruptcy Court, that Radicalism was a mistake, and that a wise man would be better employed in defending all existing institutions, more particularly the landlords, the rights of property, the Act of Union, and the Established Church, than in attacking them. He seems, like many others, to have found Liberal-Unionism a convenient stepping-stone, but, like the others, he did not rest upon it long, and, with a hop, skip, and a bound, he was soon over on the other side. The results were most gratifying. Liberal-Unionism had only brought him £18 (the price of a pamphlet), but Toryism proved a gold mine, and I should say he has pretty well worked the mine out. He began by appealing to prominent Unionists (in the capacity of a poor minister desirous of upholding the Constitution) for money to pay off his bill of sale, and he quickly got the amount required, with about £80 to spare—£212 at the first swoop. Doubtless this coup revealed to him at once the vast possibilities within his reach. His furniture freed, his liabilities discharged by bankruptcy, and a balance of ready cash left in hand, he moved straight-away to Halesworth, and started in business as the man who had come to save Society from Socialism. In this he succeeded beyond the wildest anticipations that even he could possibly have formed when he started. He not only succeeded in saving Society, but in the course of a year or two he converted himself from a struggling bankrupt preacher, the prey of bill-of-sale money-lenders, into a well-to-do country gentleman, with his horses and carriages, his establishment of four or five servants, and an income (even after deducting the printers' bill, and the cost of stationery, and postage-stamps) well over £1,300 a year. This he did simply and solely by begging, by the skill with which he played upon the prejudices and foibles of the rich, by his mendacious misrepresentation of his own financial position, and by his magnificent glorification of the magnitude and national importance of his literary work. When it is added that he finally succeeded in obtaining from the First Lord of the Treasury a grant of £200 in recognition of his services to Society and to Literature, it must, I think, be admitted that the character and career of this Lancashire operative are unique.

One of the best comments on Brooks, out of the many that have appeared in the Press, was in the Daily Chronicle. It was to the effect that Brooks had opened out an entirely new line in the begging-letter business by substituting political for religious cant as the chief item of his stock-in-trade. True, he was not above trading in religious cant when it suited his purpose, as every one will admit who remembers the sublime letter to Mr. Hucks Gibbs, on which he was cross-examined — the letter in which he related how, while reading the Scriptures on Sunday morning and "meditating upon the exceeding goodness of God," it was "borne in upon him" that he ought to ask Mr. Gibbs for a subscription. The old school of begging-letter-writing never produced a finer literary flower than that. Still, it is true that Brooks stands out chiefly as the founder of a new school. His "leading line," to use the tradesman's expression, was political clap-trap, and he proved it to be a much more paying line than the other. Naturally. Your peer, or great landowner, your financier, or your large employer of labour, is the first to shy at the cant of religion; but he swallows with avidity a good frothy tirade against Socialism, a venomous diatribe against the "Labour Leader," a patriotic denunciation of Home Rule, or a batch of cheap sneers at Mr. Gladstone. On these lines Brooks of Halesworth approached the fat boobies whose names he collected from the pages of Debrett and Kelly. He fooled his victims to the top of their bent, and to the tune of about £1,500 a year for five years. Rarely have I made the acquaintance of an impostor for whose victims I have felt less sympathy. And an extraordinary point is that a great many of them seem to have hugged their delusion, and their Brooks, long after the first article in Truth on this worthy had given every person of average intelligence the means of taking his correct measure. Among his other efforts to counteract the effect of his first exposure, Brooks scattered broadcast letters of condolence that he had received from Lord Grimthorpe, Earl Percy, Lord Egerton of Tatton, Earl Fortescue, Sir Spencer Maryon Wilson, Sir Theodore Martin, Sir W. T. Lewis, the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. J. H. Tritton, Mr. W. E. Lecky, M.P., Mr. Harry S. Foster, M.P., and other distinguished individuals, assuring him, in terms more or less uncomplimentary to myself, that no one attached any importance to the utterances of a publication like Truth. Astonishment has been expressed on all sides that a sufficient number of wealthy fools should have been found to keep up the comfortable establishment at Halesworth for so many years. But this is a small matter for astonishment beside the fact that, after Brooks's history had been told, and copious extracts from his begging-letters had been published, men of wealth and social position should have refused to see how they had been imposed upon. The comment of Earl Percy on the Truth exposure was that no one who knows this journal believes anything said in it. Mr. J. H. Tritton, of all men, went a step further, and recommended Brooks to form at once a "sustentation fund," to which he promised to give £10 a year for two years, provided nineteen other subscriptions of the same amount could be obtained. Needless to say, Brooks lost no time in appealing for these subscriptions, though I fear that a modest £200 must have seemed but a poor sort of "sustentation" to a man who had been living for five years at the rate of £1,300 a year or more. I am not of a vindictive disposition, but I confess I should have liked to see Lord Grimthorpe, Earl Percy, Lord Egerton of Tatton, Sir Theodore Martin, Mr. Tritton, Mr. Harry S. Foster, and the rest of them in court last Thursday, when Brooks was in the hands of Sir Frank Lockwood. Somehow, none of Brooks's illustrious patrons were visible on that occasion. Whatever encouragement they may have given him in bringing his action, they all, from Mr. Balfour downwards, happened to have engagements elsewhere just at the moment when their presence and support might have afforded at least consolation to their protégé. I cannot help suspecting that some of Brooks's quondam admirers gave him some financial assistance in bringing his libel action into court; undoubtedly he solicited subscriptions for that purpose. If this is the case, may I now respectfully suggest to such gentlemen that the least they can do, in fairness to both plaintiff and defendant, is to provide Brooks with the means of meeting my little bill against him for costs?

Of all Brooks's patrons, however, the one who has most cause to feel uncomfortable over the result of the trial is Mr. Balfour. The others, at any rate, only gave away their own money. Mr. Balfour, being I suppose in matters of this kind "a mere child," gave Brooks £200 from the public purse—and money which ought to go by rights to a most needy and deserving class. No one who knows Mr. Balfour would wish to add to the remorse which he must now feel; but this is clear: that even apart from his misrepresentation of his personal necessities, Brooks was, from a literary point of view, no more than a hack Party pamphleteer, and the very last man who had a claim upon this particular fund. There is, however, one excuse for Mr. Balfour, namely, that he was misled by others, to whose judgment he had some right to trust. In Court last week, Brooks suggested that he had not personally applied for the grant, but that others had done so on his behalf. No doubt there was some truth in this, for it is certain that he must at least have been influentially recommended before he got the money. A large share, therefore, of responsibility for the grant rests upon those who commended this "poor author" to Mr. Balfour's kind consideration. I put it to these noblemen and gentlemen—most of whom were, I take it, actuated by a desire to shift the insatiable Brooks off their own shoulders on to those of the public—that the least they ought to do is to make good the amount of which the public have been defrauded by their carelessness or stupidity, or worse.

Now let us wish Brooks a Merry Christmas. That he will not be unduly depressed by the unappreciative attitude of the jury and the public, I feel confident. One of the most remarkable traits in this remarkable man is his imperturbable belief in his own gifts and virtues. He plainly indicated in the witness-box that he considered a modest £1,500 a year the very least which he had a right to expect from the wealthy individuals whose cause he had taken in hand; and it seemed to strike him with a painful surprise that anybody should take a different view of the matter—though it is to be noted that he carefully refrained from putting his claims on this basis in the appeals issued from his Halesworth villa. I believe that he looked upon the judge and jury who decided his case as men of limited intellect or vulgar prejudice, and that he left the court strong in the conviction that he is a misunderstood and a wronged man. Well, I do not grudge him that small comfort. His power of imposing upon people on any considerable scale is, I think, at an end. He will probably have to live an honest life now by force of necessity, and, in that case I have done with him. So here's a Happy New Year to you, Brooks! And now, who is the next?

HUNTING AN N.C.O.

I have received sundry communications lately with respect to some singular official proceedings at the expense of an N.C.O. in the 1st Battalion South Staffordshire Regiment. The facts seem to be these: up to April last the N.C.O. in question, whose name is Jones, was a quartermaster-sergeant and orderly-room sergeant at Lichfield; he seems to have held, until the circumstances I am about to relate, an excellent character, and has some twelve or fourteen years' service; and when Lieut.-Colonel Thomas left the battalion in February, 1895, he specially thanked this N.C.O., among others, in his farewell order for their work under him. The man's troubles date from March last, when he was arrested and brought before the Commanding Officer on the charge of stealing a stick, on which charge he was remanded for trial by district court-martial. The stick in question had been purchased by the sergeants' mess about a year previously for presentation to a man who had left the regiment. By some accident it had never been presented, and Quartermaster-Sergeant Jones seems to have had a perfectly satisfactory explanation as to the circumstances under which it had come into his possession, only a day or two before the charge was preferred. It is not necessary, however, to go into the merits of this question, for after having had the evidence before him, the General declined to order a court-martial, and the N.C.O. was released. It should be stated that before the case went before the General, the officer commanding the battalion had offered to deal with it himself, if the N.C.O. consented to revert to a lower rank; but to this Jones declined to assent, and himself demanded a trial by court-martial.

At the time when the charge was dismissed the N.C.O. seems to have been suspended from his orderly-room duties. Before any definite decision had been promulgated as to whether or not he would be allowed to resume them, he was called upon to explain another matter. This seems to have been some trumpery question about his having remarked at a public house in the town that, if he went back to the office, a certain other N.C.O. would go out. He denied having made such a remark, and succeeded in getting together ample independent testimony to prove that it had not been made, and then this matter also seems to have dropped. Finally, on April 13, when he had been suspended from his orderly-room duties for nearly two months, this man was arrested and brought before the officer in command on the charge of having altered his duplicate attestation sheet without authority. The facts in this case were that, shortly after joining in 1884, Jones had at his own request reverted from the rank of corporal, in order that he might obtain permission to go out to Egypt on active service. Years afterwards, when he took up his duties in the orderly-room, he found, on looking through the regimental records, that his reversion in 1884 was entered without any note of the fact that it had been at his own request. As this would be an entry to his prejudice, he put the matter before his then Adjutant, and obtained permission to add the words "at his own request" in the entry respecting his reversion. Consequently, this charge also failed, and Jones was once more released.

Now comes the extraordinary part of this case. After these three abortive charges, Jones, on May 3, addressed to the Adjutant a statement of his case, and a request that it might be forwarded to the War Office. He received no reply or acknowledgment, but on June 24 he was ordered to attend the orderly-room, where he was informed by his C.O. that the Commander-in-Chief had decided that he should be removed from his appointment of orderly-room-sergeant, and be reduced from the rank of quartermaster-sergeant to that of sergeant. So the matter stands. It seems to me to be one of the most extraordinary cases in all the records of Army justice. Here is a man who has been three times charged with offences to which he had a perfectly good answer. He has never been tried, although he has himself asked for a trial. There has never been any pretence of investigation of any kind into the charges against him. Nevertheless, by some procedure carried on behind his back, the Commander-in-Chief has been induced to pass upon this man a sentence almost as severe as would have been imposed by a court-martial. He loses his appointment, he is degraded in rank, and he is subjected to a stigma which will stand against him for the rest of his time, and possibly longer than that. All this after about fourteen years' service, and in spite of an irreproachable character. By what right the Commander-in-Chief deals out punishment in this slip-shod and indiscriminate fashion I do not know, but the proceeding looks as much opposed to military law as it is to common justice. I should hope that it is still possible that this case will be reconsidered when the facts are more clearly understood at head-quarters, otherwise the rights of trial secured to soldiers by the Army Act are reduced to a dead letter.

RICHARD THE THIRD.

A popular actor, a diplomatic manager, and, above all, an artist to the very tips of his clever finger-nails—and here we have Henry Irving, whose work, of the finest, most subtle, and most delicate kind, is always fascinating, attractive, and highly finished. Here is a man who claims your attention directly he steps on to the stage, but who does not trust to mere words for effect. His face is a perfect study. Watch him well as Richard Duke of Gloster. In the opening scenes the cunning expression turns the weird countenance of this "thinking man" into a very fiend's face, and, as the play proceeds, crime and cruelty so stain and scar the man's brow that, in the end, he becomes absolutely repulsive with ugliness born of wickedness. I believe it was Victor Hugo who once said that the public was divided into three distinct classes of spectators—women, thinkers, and a crowd. Women demand passion, thinkers require character, the crowd welcomes noise and action. If this be so, then at the Lyceum everybody will be satisfied. "Richard the Third" opens with a rush, a roar, and a bang! Drums to the right of them, trumpets to left of them; then, as the roll call grows fainter and fainter in the distance, on comes Richard Irving to complete the picture; and before he utters a word the whole nature of the man stands revealed in his face, his deportment, and his uncanny terrible expression; in fact, he seems to say, "And now am I, if a man should speak truly, little better than one of the wicked." The very soul of this demon steeped in devilry is laid bare in this one moment. The hideous workings of his contorted mind are made manifest. I must candidly confess I did not expect to be very much impressed with Shakespeare's play. "Richard the Third" can never be called one of the poet's best works, but I own up like a man. I went to scoff, and remained to applaud, thanks to the unrivalled skill and genius of Henry Irving. Of course, "Richard the Third" is what you may call a "star" play: all the other characters are very minor indeed; they come on in little bursts, and fizzle out just when they are beginning to get interesting. Take, for instance, the delightful Prince of Wales, acted with such delicate grace by Miss Lena Ashwell. I wanted to see this pretty, bright boy in every act. What a pity he got smothered so soon, or was not allowed the run of the stage before! Genevieve Ward as the widowed Queen Margaret is very emphatic and severe. Her curses make your blood curdle, and the cruel, relentless look of her glassy eyes is enough to freeze the very marrow in your bones. I can't tell you how dreadfully disappointed I was with Julia Arthur; I know she can do so much better than that. What on earth was the matter with her? Was she a bit conscience-struck at "carrying on" so with Richard before her better half's remains had been tucked up comfortably in the family vault? Whatever the cause, she was certainly overpowered by it. Miss Maud Milton wept gracefully, and was wheedled and coaxed as the vacillating Elizabeth to a nicety. Gordon Craig astonished me with a very clever little sketch of King Edward IV.; it was just in the right vein, and not a bit over done. Mary Rorke's Duchess of York was as tearfully pathetic as one could possibly wish, and the two murderers of Norman Forbes and William Farren were as deep-dyed villains as any in that line. I did not like Clarence's dream at all; but If you want to entirely Furnish your House or select any article of Furniture or Carpet, &c., send for Hewetsons' Illustrated Priced Catalogue,—Hewetsons, Tottenham Court-road, London.

Frank Cooper's Earl of Richmond was a very breezy, genial fellow. Less satisfactory, to my thinking, was Macklin's Buckingham; it was a painstaking, earnest performance, but never very convincing; it carried no weight with it. Buckingham should be a crafty, oily man, with an assumed power of will and determination, almost as cringing and subtle a villain as the wicked Duke himself, and, unless this is shown, it is impossible to understand why a man of Richard's temperament should lean and rely so much on him for judgment and support. Gloster calls him in one of his speeches, "My other self, my counsel's consistory, my oracle, my prophet!" All this loses its meaning with a weak and misunderstood Buckingham. It is no use attempting to describe the exquisite scenery of Hawes Craven and J. Harker. Every one knows that our "monarch of the stage" revels in everything that is beautiful as regards colour, design, and costume; so that when I tell you Irving has surpassed all he ever did before in "Richard the Third," you may imagine what a feast of delight and beauty awaits you at the Lyceum. I can remember no more magnificent mise en scène. In harmony and tone it is simply perfect.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

STAG-HUNTING IN FRANCE.

LET us hope that the shocking fatality at La Halatte will make stag-hunting unfashionable, for what plea can there be to justify such barbarism? To say it exhilarates is but one argument the more against it. I never saw the honours of the chase accorded to the foremost huntress in at the death without disgust. She receives over here the freshly-amputated stag's hoof from the huntsman who butchers the hunted creature. Bull-fighting seems to me noble sport compared to the stag-hunt. The Comtesse de Paris shocked French taste by beating the heads of wounded birds against the butt of her fowling-piece. She gave these coups de grâce to put an end to their sufferings. Still, as she was ready to shoot afresh, people only saw in what she did a proof of insensibility. Yet her sin was venial compared to the levity and wantonness in cruelty that running down a stag calls forth. Of course I speak of French stag-hunting, and its horrid termination of amputated hoof or curée froide or curée chaude. The curée chaude is the devouring of the living stag in cold blood by a pack of hounds; the curée froide, of a dead stag. In either case the victim is tied to a stake in the courtyard of some château. Forest rangers stand near the carcass torch in hand. Fine ladies and gentlemen look on from the balcony or from the hall-door steps. The curée, as a torchlight scene, follows a sumptuous dinner. The wonder is that it does not precede the repast. The sensation might be a good appetiser.

Stag-hunting in France takes place in forests. To hunt in the open would entail endless litigation on the master of the hounds. The forest is intersected by avenues, the sides of which are clipped up to a certain height as straight as walls. On a map they appear like stars connected with each other. At points of intersection there are round openings. Clearings are few and of narrow area. The hunters keep in the grassy avenues. Stag and dogs get into the underwood. It is dangerous to ride after them by a path. An eye might be torn out in an instant, or a forehead collide with a bough. It is hard to say exactly how Baroness Léonino met her death. The bleeding at the ears and other symptoms show the base of the brain to have been injured. At an early stage of the hunt she crossed her sister, Baroness Lambert, and was crying "Tally Ho!" From that time until M. Albert Menier found her on a path senseless nobody saw her.

I am convinced that great happiness is like the lightning-rod in drawing down bolts from the blue. Whenever I see the cup of happiness brimful, I expect a disaster will soon overtake its holder. Four years ago, in writing to you on this subject, I had in my head Baroness Emmanuel Léonino, then a bride. She was married to a clever and agreeable young Italian, the son of Baron Léonino, the Milanese banker. Ability for financial work was part of his heritage. It was believed that he and Baron Lambert of Brussels were to be hereafter the joint heads of the Rue Lafitte Bank. No son of the actual chiefs takes any interest in counting-house work. Baroness Léonino, née De Rothschild, had all that gold, love, and great social standing could give. She was brought up at the present town house of her father, Baron Gustave de Rothschild. It is known as the second edition of the Elysée, revised, enlarged, and improved, and faces the palace, of which it is a copy, on the Avenue Marigny side. The De Rothschild palace is only inferior, to the Presidential in the comparatively cramped-up grounds, which are walled in on south and west sides by the blind or windowless sides of six-story houses. Baroness Léonino was given on her marriage a less palatial, though a grand, residence in the Rue de Presbourg. This street surrounds the south side of the Place de l'Etoile, and has the briskest air and most animated view that Paris affords. It was furnished with extraordinary richness and yet perfect taste. Baron Léonino has Italian feeling for what is noble and magnificent in decorative art. Two infant daughters added to the many interests of Mme. Léonino's life. She had a disposition that made society and domestic life enjoyable There was much that was kindly in her nature, and she had the good sense to be unaffected. She was not, as the Spaniards say, Rothschild-y-Rothschild. Baroness Gustave de Rothschild is Alsatian, and née Anspach. You may recollect her patriotic tiff at the table of M. Thiers at Versailles, with Comte d'Arnim, the German Ambassador. Real sympathy is felt for Baron Léonino and for the afflicted father and mother of the late Baroness. The children are too young to feel their bereavement. Baroness Léonino died at M. Albert Menier's château near Senlis, whither she and the Lamberts went to join a grand party. The inducement offered was shooting and hunting. The Senlis district of the Oise is sylvan, and dotted over with the châteaux of arch-millionaires. The Duc d'Aumale is king of the company, though there are a good many Bonapartists in the neighbourhood. Baroness Léonino was found senseless early in the afternoon. She died at nine the same evening. Her body was coffined next day to be taken to the Rue de Presbourg. That formality was gone through in the presence of Comte de Valon, the Mayor of Halatte, with whose hounds the Menier house-party hunted. All her own immediate family were present. Her father and mother were summoned to M. Menier's from Paris. The summons came as they were sitting down to dinner. A special train and three princes of science awaited them at the terminus. All were in dinner dress, for all were simultaneously telegraphed to. They found a house filled with fine company, and in a festive though sympathising mood. Those who had met to hunt and shoot could not imagine Death would be so impertinent as to put a sudden end to their enjoyment.

The Paris De Rothschilds bear their enormous wealth with quiet dignity. The Alphonse branch and other members really try to make a good use of it. Baroness James de Rothschild spends her summers at the Rothschild Hospital for sick children at Berck-sur-Mer—the ugliest of French coasts, unless to those having an artist's eye, to which nothing is ugly.

The Empress of Austria and the Orleans family are greatly responsible for all the stag-hunting we hear of. This sport went out after the war, to be revived at Chantilly and at Rambouillet. The Prince de Joinville had a pack of hounds at St. Firmin, which the Comtesse de Paris, the Duchesse de Chartres d'Alençon, and occasionally the ex-Queen of Naples and the Empress of Austria, followed. The Duchesse de Chartres had a lithe figure, and sat well in the saddle. The Duchesse d'Uzès rented the right to hunt in her own forest at Rouelle, and in the State forest of Rambouillet. It sometimes sickened me to hear those illustrious ladies echoing in their thin voices the huntsman's tally ho! At a Chantilly hunt the highest lady was allowed to take the lead. Thus the honours of the hunt were done to the Comtesse de Paris. She took precedence after the Comte de Chambord's death of every other lady, French or foreign. The theory was that she was Queen of France.

The Duc de Lorges is delighted with the new Duchesse d'Orléans. She has life, spirits, a firm will, purpose, and pleasant manners. He thinks she resembles her grandmother, the Princess Clémentine, and will turn out a maitresse femme. In short, she is just the wife her husband needs. He is, you know, so like the Montpensier side of the family.

If I wanted to praise any angel of charity I should now be at a loss for fresh adjectives. All the adjectives I can think of have been exhausted in lauding Mme. Furtado Heine as a Lady Bountiful. M. Meyer, of the Gaulois, led the chorus of laudation, and M. Strauss took up the strain at a meeting of the Town Council of Paris. Mme. Heine left the five-hundredth part of her fortune to the poor, though free to do what she liked with the half. She was certainly liberal in her alms after she quarrelled seriously with her adopted daughter, with whom she was for some time at law. But she was too fond of letting her left hand know what her right hand did. She over-valued official recognition of her bounteous deeds, which was grudgingly given. The praises of the Press did not always delight. One read between the lines that those who eulogised might pillory if they so pleased. Blackmailers attacked her after the mysterious death of her adopted and good-for-nothing son-in-law, Colonel Ney, Duc d'Elchingen. But she was not a woman to quail before them, and breasted the storm they raised. The personalty comes to £7,000,000. What the real property is valued at I have not heard. The Rocquencourt estate, where Mme. Heine died, more than doubled in value since the Outer Circle railway was made. It is on the road from Marly to Versailles. The château was built by a great courtier of Louis XVI. M. Blanc of Monaco has a stud establishment hard by. Mme. Heine had estates scattered over France and a wine-château in the Gironde. Half her wealth goes by law to her adopted daughter, now Duchesse de Rivoli. The circumstances of the adoption were in some respects whimsical. Foulds, Furtados, and Heines were angry about it, and said it was done to vex relations. The other half goes by will to the youngest of Duchesse Ney's five children, Cécile, now Princesse Joachim Murat. She was called after Mme. Heine, who became, since her sight failed, greatly dependent on her care.

Mme. Heine was liberal in supplying money to Bonapartist Committees so long as she thought they might succeed. Her burning ambition was to wear the red ribbon, and when she got it to be promoted to the rosette of officer of the Legion of Honour. She perseveringly struggled for the Cross of Knights, basing her first claim on having founded an asylum for the blind. A Minister of War, who was applied to for the rosette, remarked that giving money was not enough. A donation from her of £10,000 was not as much as a pound from a fairly well-off person. What was the villa at Nice, with its income of 60,000 fr., compared to the sacrifices made by such martyrs to duty as firemen, rescue parties in collieries, life-boat crews, or Sisters of Charity? In fighting for the rosette she gave to free gifts the character of a sale. He contrasted the "discreet" way of doing good that certain ladies of the Rothschild family follow. But Mme. Heine was not to be baulked. She died an officer of the Legion of Honour.

Ministers whom she was likely to tackle in the character of a Lady Bountiful who paid for glory, dreaded what they knew was going to happen when they read of some big charitable donation. In her innermost circle she was kind, and under all circumstances she was unaffected. There was nothing small or pinched about her. She had a massive head, and was strong in mind and body until her health broke down. Her energy seemed inexhaustible after she had reached the age of seventy. In some respects it was misused. Little consideration was shown for humble neighbours when she wished to bring the tenements they rented within her domain wall. As she disliked to have poor people near her place, she was always taking means to become their landlady, and get rid of them. Rocquencourt, in former times, was a nice place to stroll through. It had a picturesque old inn, and was a busy place in a small way. The wayfarer was charmed with sylvan views. The dreadful domain wall now screens them, and Rocquencourt is a deserted village.

The great theatrical critics of the evening papers have neglected to speak of last week's apotheosis in their Monday feuilletons. The halfpenny morning papers think the subject not yet worn out, and continue laudative. I hear, and can believe it, that Sarah Bernhardt lent herself to the festival out of good nature to the journalists, who had been complaining of hard times. It would be a wonder if, charging 40 fr. for admission, they did not clear three or four hundred pounds. The spectacle at the Renaissance was provided by the Manageress and Company. The two masters of pictorial art who illustrated the menu worked for love. The déjeuner, which was supposed to have cost 40 fr., was no better than the ordinary 8 fr. dinner at the Grand Hotel. Wine was the one expensive feature, and it was furnished at cost price, because the Press got up the apotheosis. The real cost, experienced caterers think, would have been covered by 20 fr. a head.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

DEAR LADY BETTY,—The authorities at the War Office propose to add one battalion to the Coldstream Guards and one to the Scots Guards. It is not altogether surprising that many officers of these regiments object strongly to the alteration. They object:—1st, Because they believe that the change will necessitate the employment of men recruited from a different class to that from which the rank and file of these regiments have generally been selected; 2nd, because it would probably become necessary to lower the present standard of height; and 3rd, because many of the men, as well as many of the officers, are averse from being stationed three years at Gibraltar. It should be borne in mind that, so far as the officers are concerned, the Guards mainly attract men who are rich and are not obliged to take up a profession. Upon every occasion that the country engages in a war, the military authorities are overwhelmed with applications from Guardsmen to be permitted to join the expedition. It is not, therefore, that they object to active service, but that, being rich and in the enjoyment of much consideration, they are anxious, with reason, when there is peace, not to be exiled from England. It is, indeed, to avoid the latter contingency that many join the Guards in preference to other regiments; and if that privilege were not attached to the brigade, they would probably not enter the army. On the other hand, these officers should take into consideration that promotion in the brigade is at present especially slow. One officer has been waiting fourteen years for promotion. If the proposal of the authorities comes into force, the officers from the existing battalions will be placed in command of the two which are to be formed. There will then be an immediate bound in promotion, as there was when a new battalion was added to the Rifle Brigade. Still, the proposal has excited much indignation amongst the Guards. These regiments are magnificently efficient, and they fight splendidly; therefore it is undesirable to interfere unreasonably with conditions which, until now, have given general satisfaction, and have borne excellent results.

It is suggested as an alternative that two battalions might be added to the Royal Marines, as many more candidates apply to be employed in this branch of the Service than there is room for.

A report is current that when the Queen celebrates the completion of the longest reign on record in the history of Great Britain, her Majesty will create many new Peerages; will advance many old Peerages in titular rank; and will confer minor honours freely. The report further asserts that, as the reign of the Queen will be mainly associated with the discoveries of science, the improvements in mechanical appliances, the development of commerce, and an exceptional increase of activity in trade, her Majesty contemplates raising to the Peerage, upon that occasion, many of those who have attained great prominence in these branches of research and industry. It is said that the Press will be especially honoured. The Victorian Peerage does not deal with descent, chivalrous actions, or the support of the Monarchy. As it is representative especially of success in brewing, banking, brokerage, and other kindred occupations, there can be no legitimate objection to ennobling the chiefs of great commercial houses, whose silks and satins, soaps, or patent specifics are sold in the four quarters of the globe. When the new Peerages have been created, it might be opportune to quote the following lines from "The Hunting of the Snark," by Lewis Carroll:—

"The crew was complete: It included a Boots,
A maker of Bonnets and Hoods,
A Barrister—brought to arrange their disputes—
And a Broker, to value their goods.

Our generation values money above all other considerations. The following paragraph from the Morning Post of December 10 shows this somewhat amusingly:—

> An opportunity occurs by which a gentleman, under 30, of good education and means, may be ADOPTED by a childless Duke, the title descending by letters patent to the adopted son.

Jean Fouquet, the eminent French painter who flourished in the fifteenth century, illustrated a "Livre d'Heures" for Chevallier, who was Minister to Charles VII. and to Louis XI. The book contained fifty exquisitely-finished miniatures. Many years ago this "Livre d'Heures" fell into the hands of one who cut out the fifty pictures, sold forty of them to a Frankfort dealer for £200, and burnt the book. The Duc d'Aumale has now bought these forty miniatures for his collection at Chantilly, and has paid £10,000 for them! Of the ten illustrations that remain scattered about, it appears that only one can be traced. This is at the British Museum. Examples of the work of Jean Fouquet are very scarce. There is a portrait of Charles VII., by Fouquet, at the Louvre, but there is no painting of his in the National Gallery in Trafalgar-square. Those who are interested in such matters will be pleased to hear that a folio volume has just been published in Paris, giving reproductions by heliograph of the forty miniatures by Jean Fouquet which the Duc d'Aumale has bought.

We are so familiar with the name of "Olympia" at West Kensington that no critic appears to have noticed that the name is a curious misnomer. "Olympia" was the Countess of Holland in "Orlando Furioso." She had many misadventures, amongst others that of being bound to a rock without the clothes which custom considers it advisable to wear. The spot where Jupiter is supposed to have held his court was "Olympus." It is very curious that the well-known institution at West Kensington has been wrongly named, and that out of the millions who have heard of Olympia no one has yet detected the obvious mistake.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

SOME very remarkable figures have been published concerning the achievements of the high-priced yearlings of last season, all of which when sold were the subject of the florid eulogies of certain sporting writers. It seems that during 1895 twenty-two yearlings were sold for 46,200 gs., and in the course of last season these quondam marvels only succeeded in winning three stakes, worth about £1,000 altogether. Nineteen of these animals have won nothing, and not one of them is spoken of as ever likely to distinguish itself on the Turf. These figures are at once melancholy, ludicrous, and instructive, and if they do not chill the ardour of people who are such infatuated simpletons as to suppose that purchasing fashionably bred yearlings at outrageously extravagant prices is the sure and certain road to success on the Turf, it is impossible to conjecture what would cure this form of insanity. It is not only that the purchased yearlings of 1895 have proved direful failures, but so also have those of the four previous seasons, and, as a matter of fact, Turf records will show that out of every twenty high-priced yearlings about one proves a profitable investment, and, indeed, this is a high estimate. The ridiculous thing is that there is not one of these failures which was not praised in the most glowing terms at the time of its sale. That these figures are calculated to produce a "slump" in the yearling market next season is certain, and it may be hoped that, instead of placing exorbitant reserves on their animals, breeders will at last empty their heads of the false notions and extravagant fancies which have filled them so long, and in which they are encouraged by designing individuals who have a direct interest in keeping up the prices of stock and misleading both vendors and buyers. Season after season yearlings of the highest breeding are regularly sent up to Newmarket and Doncaster, always heralded by the frantic puffs of reporters who combine the business of buying and selling horses on commission and general puddling about in the market with their journalistic avocations. As regularly do nineteen out of twenty of these animals, which are sold to auriferous gulls for 2,000 gs. or 3,000 gs., and even higher prices, either collapse in training, or get miserably beaten in their trials and in their races. Speculators in such stock will do well to study the dismal records of sales and performances, and, having done so, they cannot fail to apprehend the fact that buying yearlings (however promising and well bred) is as pure a lottery as breeding them. Nor, indeed, is it a more profitable business to pay high prices for horses in training, however good may be their private reputation. The regular and lamentable failure of the so-called "cracks" of each season's sales is another proof (if any such were needed) of the humbug and nonsense of all the scientific breeding foolery, concerning which some self-advertising quacks have been so earnest of late. Nearly all these creatures are bred upon the highest lines of the so-called science, and yet they turn out to be utter rubbish. How can the "scientific breeding" theory be reconciled with the ignominious failure of so many privately bred animals in whose pedigrees not a flaw can be found?

Signorina has proved a complete failure at the stud, and it is stated that her owner has decided to put her in training again. This mare, who is by St. Simon out of Star of Portici, was foaled in 1887, and as a two-year-old she was a real flyer, and won all the races for which she started, nine in number, including the Middle Park Plate, and her gains amounted to about £12,000. After she had cantered away with the Middle Park Plate some hare-brained enthusiast offered £20,000 for her, and her owner was so infatuated as to refuse it, a blunder which he must have unceasingly regretted ever since. Signorina has been sent five seasons in succession to very expensive sires with no satisfactory result, and it is evident that she will never be a success as a broodmare. It will be interesting to see whether she retains any of her capacity for racing.

It has been found that Galeazzo cannot be trained again, so his turf career is at an end, and he is going to France, and will stand next season at Baron Rothschild's Meantry stud in Normandy. Galeazzo is another victim to the prevalent craze for over-racing young horses. He ought not to have been trained as a two-year-old, and if he had been allowed time to develop he would very likely have grown into a second Common. He was, however, raced as a two-year-old on hard ground, when backward, and the shakes and jars which his big frame then received were probably the origin of the weakness which terminated his turf career after his victory in the Newmarket Stakes last May. If Galeazzo's début on the turf had been postponed until the last Ascot meeting he could afterwards have taken St. Frusquin's place in the Eclipse Stakes' field, and the whole course of the autumn racing would have been changed—vastly to the advantage of Mr. L. de Rothschild.

The value of the Goodwood Cup has been increased from £300 to £800, and the entries will close on January 5, which is a much more sensible arrangement than keeping the race open until the Tuesday after the Derby, by which time the form of the season has been pretty well disclosed. The Cup is to be a subscription race, and it would have been much better to have made an entrance of £15, the only liability if forfeit is declared by the Tuesday after the Epsom Summer Meeting, with a sweepstakes of £30 each if left in after that date. With the present conditions, an owner who leaves his horse in after the second forfeit of £10 is declared will be simply taking £650 to £25 about his chance, which is scarcely good enough. It is absolutely idiotic to impose a penalty of 21 lb. for winning such a trumpery event as the Jockey Club Cup, while winners of the Derby, Oaks, St. Leger, or of any of the £10,000 stakes escape with 12 lb. of extra weight. Surely Lord March cannot approve of such anilities.

I have received an interesting letter from Mr. R. C. Lehmann, who has been coaching the Harvard University men in rowing. The trial eights were organised and rowed on December 5. The work was by no means bad, and, taking into account the comparatively short time the men had had to acquire the new style, the performance was most satisfactory. The writer says it was a capital race, and on the whole it was a display of good honest rowing in the right style. Of course, there were defects. This was only to be expected, having regard to the fact that Mr. Lehmann only left England on November 4. On his arrival the race had to be arranged and the crews got together. Some of the men are very promising, indeed. They are all strong, vigorous, and healthy, and as keen as possible. Their anxiety and willingness to learn made the task of coaching a positive pleasure. Already one can see the Grand Challenge Cup sailing across the Atlantic. But, sorry as we at home should be to see this come to pass, it is fortunately impossible not to feel that the visit of Yale last year and the services that Mr. Lehmann has been rendering to Harvard must have a happy influence on the better class of young Americans. The University men of both countries must be drawn closer together by such a tie of common interest as the oar.

While on this subject I must recall the extraordinary canard that appeared in the New York Herald. The statement, in effect, was that Mr. Lehmann was the best man of a class peculiar to England. He was a so-called amateur, who, after taking his degree, made his living by coaching College and University crews! This tale, which I severely commented on at the time, appeared in the Herald of November 4, the day that Mr. Lehmann sailed from England. On his arrival he communicated with the Editor, who, on November 28, in an editorial, expressed his great regret for the misstatement that had appeared, and not only made a complete retractation of every word that had been written, but added as well some extremely kind and appreciative remarks about Mr. Lehmann himself. Harper's Weekly and the New York Sun have also published full refutations of the Herald fable. Surely one could not wish for any visit to produce better fruits. There, at all events, in black and white, was a gross and irritating misconception of English rowing men and their system. It has been cleared up, once and for all, and the fact that the Editor of the Herald apologised in such a frank and handsome manner must produce a most excellent impression over here. Everybody knows what a disagreeable thing it is for one of our leading papers to have to "climb down." The operation is not any more enjoyable when it is performed in New York. The unpleasantness of the original mistake has been more than atoned for by the subsequent honourable withdrawal, and more good has probably been done than if no error had been made. Apart from that little incident, everybody whom Mr. Lehmann has met, and the Press as well, have been hospitable and courteous to a degree. He has been overwhelmed with kindness in every way, and he desires through these columns to express something of what he feels with regard to the way he has been treated in America. To express that "something" adequately would tax even the fluent writers on the New York Press. That "something" is better imagined than described. Let it be sufficient to say that he feels that "something," that all English rowing men are delighted with the happy result of this visit, and that Yale and Harvard will be more welcome than ever to English waters when they come again.

Very successful was the dinner and presentation to Mr. C. E. Green in recognition of his success in making Essex a first-class county. No man more deserved the honour that was rendered him. His speech was excellent. He had a good word for everybody, and spoke highly of the pros. in the team, all of whom were present. He mentioned how often he had been told that his efforts would be but a wild-goose chase; but he had persevered, and generous friends had helped the club out of financial straits. During the evening over £300 was promised to help wipe off the mortgage on the club's property. The M.C.C. has assented to the proposition of the Counties that seven out and home matches shall suffice for a first-class county. Leicester could only arrange that number, and if that county had not been included, there would have only been five counties eligible for the championship. All cricketers will regret the death of H. Stephenson, the famous Uppingham cricket coach. It has been said that he and the late Headmaster, the late Dr. Thring, made the school.

The Council of the Football Association has made its control of amateur interests more impossible, and itself more ridiculous, than ever. At its recent meeting the question of Mr. Jackson's conduct in not getting leave to take scratch teams to play the Universities was debated. There was a long discussion, and then the chairman, Mr. Clegg, produced a written indictment of Mr. Jackson, which concluded with a request that the delinquent would resign his position of vice-president, on the ground that he had been disloyal to the Council in not obeying a resolution of the Council, that permission to play scratch teams must be first obtained from the Council. This document was presented to the Press to be published in extenso. It contained statements which were grossly misleading, and arguments which were utterly untenable. It stated that the resolution of the Council had been come to on April 18, because certain persons were said to have made profits out of these teams. It pointed out that Mr. Jackson had objected to the resolution, but had not attempted to set it aside either at the general meeting, or at subsequent summer meetings of the Council, and it further pointed out that in October Mr. Jackson had only argued against the legality, and not the expediency of the rule. This farrago of nonsense concluded in an impotent way by requesting Mr. Jackson to resign his vice-presidency. No doubt Mr. Clegg is extremely proud of his manifesto. But if it is examined for a moment it will be seen that it has not an atom of substance in it. In the first place there is no rule of the Association dealing with scratch teams, a very common and pleasant form of amateur recreation. Neither is there any rule giving a resolution of the Council the force of law. And yet this resolution has been given the force of law by the Council and penalties have been inflicted in respect of it. The resolution is, therefore, clearly illegal. These facts are not stated in the indictment. The resolution was passed on April 18, and as all notices for the general meeting had to be given by March 31, Mr. Jackson could not interfere in the matter. This fact is not stated. In these respects Mr. Clegg's paper is grossly misleading, and it is, to say the least, remarkable that he should have made the mistake, to call it nothing else, of suggesting that notice could have been given at the general meeting. Moreover, Mr. Clegg and his supporters have another little matter to explain. It will take a good deal to make any one, with the slightest knowledge of football matters, believe that the alleged circumstances calling for this resolution were suddenly sprung upon the Council on April 18. It is absurd to suppose that the need for a new rule was not present to the minds of Mr. Clegg and others prior to March 31. Why then was not notice of a new rule to be put before the general meeting given in due course? The Council, at the meeting on April 18, could have resolved to support such a rule. But instead of acting in a straightforward way, Mr. Clegg and his supporters in a grossly unconstitutional manner endeavour to assume the functions of the Association, and invest their resolutions with the force of law. The suggestions that Mr. Jackson could have dealt with this matter at other meetings of the Council, from which he was absent, may be a reflection on his not duly performing his duties as Vice-President, but they cannot affect the legality or illegality of the Council's action. The rottenness of Mr. Clegg's argument is further shown by the statement that Mr. Jackson only argued on the legality and not the expediency of the resolution. Assuming the cases alleged to exist, some legislation was necessary. But the question is how far can this Council take upon itself to make new laws, as and when it pleases? The majority of the Council is composed of men whose interests are bound up in every way with professionalism. They show a contempt for amateur interest and amateur play whenever the opportunity affords. The amateur association footballer is a long-suffering person. But this attempt of the Council to interfere with the legitimate freedom of the game has gone too far. The matter at present is looked upon simply as a contest between Mr. Jackson and the majority of the Council. The sooner amateurs realise that it is nothing of the sort the better it will be for them. It is a gross infringement of the liberties of football, and would only be persisted in by men who send an ex parte statement to the Press at once illogical and misleading, and who further omit to state that it was prepared before the meeting was held, and produced and read by the Chairman, Mr. Clegg.

At the same meeting a proposal was rejected that there should be two sections of the Association—one to deal with amateurs and the other with professionals. Something will have to be done unless the Council comes to its senses and draws up and submits to a general meeting a reasonable set of rules dealing with scratch teams. Surely such a reasonable course is not impossible.

It is with regret that one reads of the dispute between the R.I.E.C. Cooper's Hill and the R.M.C. Sandhurst. The Rugby team of the latter college scratched its game with the former because there was no other day on which to decide the Company Challenge Cup, the final earlier in the week having resulted in a draw. This proceeding was certainly high-handed and unsportsmanlike. No one ever heard of a school or college competition interfering with a match on the card. At the same time it is a great pity that the correspondence has been published. It has only made the feud worse. Cooper's Hill have scratched all their matches with Sandhurst. Surely a little tact and forbearance might have been used. It is not pleasant to find squabbles like this one in clubs of the highest standing. I hope the authorities of both colleges will try to smooth matters over instead of being at daggers drawn as they are at present. There should be no difficulty amongst gentlemen in patching up the breach. An honourable apology should be offered and at once accepted.

In London, the hard ground stopped several Rugby matches. The Blackheath forwards woke up and played a grand game against Cardiff, but their outsides were miserably weak. The Old Merchant Taylors are quite off their game, and had to put up with defeat at the hands of Rosslyn Park, for whom Warner was very clever. Croydon, of course, walked over Middlesex Hospital, who were two short. Turner, at back, was in very good form for the losers. He made one fine run, and if he had been backed up the Hospital would have scored. Judging by their play in Wales and against Dublin, Cambridge would have done much better at Queen's Club if they had arranged their heavy fixtures before instead of after the University match. They wanted the experience these matches would have given.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—The feature of the week came at its fag-end, and consisted of a violent outburst of screeching of the American Eagle, which sent a shiver through Wall-street, and caused a sharp break in Americans. In other respects the tone has been very steady, and although the hardening rates in the Money Market caused a sagging movement in gilt-edged stocks and a few other securities, a notable circumstance was the comparative steadiness of the Mining Markets.

The American Eagle Screeching.

A much calmer view was taken in Europe of the now famous Cameron resolution. Senator Cameron may boast that by the resolution bearing his name, which was adopted by the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Relations at Washington, he knocked the Wall-street market to pieces for one day at least, and brought about declines of from four to five dollars in leading securities. The resolution acknowledges the independence of the "Republic of Cuba," although there is no such organisation yet in existence. It may possibly be carried in the Senate, and, perhaps, in the House of Representatives, not, however, until after the holidays, if then, but even in that case President Cleveland will veto it, and there are indications that his successor, Mr. McKinley will do the same thing, while there is every prospect of the resolution being delayed and obstructed in Congress until the excitement over Cuba has cooled down. This was the view very sensibly taken on this side, and quotations of American Rails here remained from 1½ to 2 points over parity on Saturday. When it is considered that the famous Venezuelan fulmination in which President Cleveland indulged at precisely the same time last year has altogether fizzled out since, and that the last Congressional outburst regarding Cuba has similarly come to naught, it is not surprising that the London Stock Exchange should refuse to believe in the reality of the American Eagle's screeches, and operators utilised the situation for laying in some cheap stock. It seems a pity that we should now have, for the second time, an unpleasant surprise from Yankeeland just before Christmas, but in the present case the view is taken that the cry of "Wolf" has been raised too often. Spanish were already somewhat weaker before the news from Washington arrived, and they have only given way a point, while the general foreign market has remained steady. Home Rails have been influenced chiefly by the hardening condition of the Money Market, and by the Cassandra-like prophecies of the Times and other dailies of a money squeeze at the end of this year. As early in the new year large sums will, however, be released in dividends, dear money could last but for a very short time now, and any one parting with the stocks of Home Railways, which are earning such splendid revenues, merely on the fear of higher rates, will be acting very foolishly. The South African department continues to show a good deal of strength, and there is no longer any disposition to make too much of every little adverse point. A good many "Bull" points, moreover, are cropping up, and it is generally anticipated that an important upward movement will occur early in the new year. Indian mines have enjoyed quite a lively time, and a general improvement has taken place. There is thus good grounds for hope that the Mining Market altogether will receive increased attention in the near future, and, from certain information which has reached me, I make bold to say that the revival will also spread to the West Australian section, some exceedingly favourable developments being assured in connection with some of the powerful groups. Industrial investments continue in favour, and there is every prospect that in the coming year investors will again devote special attention to this department, while I quite look for a strong revival in Cycle shares. And now, my dear Ben, let me wish you and yours, and all the friends and readers of my letter to you a Merry Christmas and every prosperity. The past year has been one fraught with many unpleasant incidents, and the effects of the luckless Jameson raid more particularly have brought great trouble and loss upon holders of mining shares; yet there have not been wanting important recoveries, more especially in the Home Railway, American, and South American markets, and as no second Jameson raid may be anticipated, I think we are quite justified in looking for brighter times when once this Christmas is turned.

Home Rails.

The chief influence in the Home Railway department has been the strength of rates in the Money Market, and the fear that the purse-strings will be drawn very tight by our banking institutions towards the end of the year. Realisations on a moderate scale have consequently taken place, and prices are a shade easier, but it should not be forgotten that the speculative account must thereby have also been considerably reduced. Rates at the mid-December settlement were by no means heavy, so that the next settlement should also be comfortably got over. As usual, Brighton "A" have proved the most sensitive, yet with a dividend of from 7 to 7½ per cent. to come off next month, they do not look dear at the present price. Dover "A" have eased off slightly, but they have not been a bad market, and it must be remembered that the rate went off to even at the last carry-over. Chathams have received a distinct set back, the Ordinary being knocked down to 17⅛ (recovering, however, to 18¼) on the circulation of rumours, the very number and diversity of which characterised them as efforts of the "Bear" party. There was substance in one only of the reports, which referred to the relations of this Company and the South Eastern with Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son concerning tourist tickets, but it seems to be doubtful whether any but a very small amount will be lost to the Chatham Company by the new arrangement. An attempt has been made to boom East London. First the rumour was spread that this line was to be used for coal traffic instead of the Chatham at Holborn Viaduct and Blackfriars, which was an absurdity. Then it was said that the Great Eastern was going to put coal traffic on the East London, but all the efforts of the "Bulls," who are of the bucket-shop order, have not succeeded in putting the quotation higher than 7¼. In the Heavy division prices have been pretty well maintained, North Western notably being firm at 201. Midlands have reacted to 167, on the publication of the text of the Midland Railway Company's Bill for splitting the Ordinary stock, which provides for the duplication being made compulsory. Objections have also been raised to the proposal to make the dividends on the Preferred Ordinary stock contingent on the profits of each separate half year. This, of course, is against the Preferred stock, but very much in favour of the Deferred. Metropolitan Districts have been a firm market at about 28, and it is fully expected that when in the new year Home Rails generally brace up Districts will be found well to the front, as the line will be benefited by a number of favourable circumstances, which will give it increased traffic, and stimulate the revenue. The stocks of the Scotch section have been fairly steady, yet both Caledonian Deferred and North British Deferred are still at a very low level, compared with the great progress which they have made during the past year. For the first twenty weeks of the fiscal half year the Caledonian has an increase of £37,830, and the North British one of £39,007, and still they continue to pile up increases, which is not surprising, considering the excellence of trade in Scotland. The various Scotch industrial establishments will commence the new year with a large amount of work left over. The Clyde shipbuilders appear to have booked 300,000 tons of new shipping during the quarter, and as the chief employés are bound down to certain wages for six months, no trouble is anticipated in this direction. In fact, the labour troubles, which have been so largely utilised for putting down quotations of the Scotch stocks, are almost forgotten, and the extraordinary thing is that prices, especially of Coras, should not respond to the excellent prospects. A price of 65 for these, and of 55 for North British Deferred, would be more justified than the present low quotations.

The Break in the Yankee Market.

The proverbial fickleness of the Yankee Market has been strikingly illustrated by the break which occurred on Saturday, owing to the adoption of a resolution by the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Relations, acknowledging the independence of Cuba. I have already explained that those best able to judge anticipate that this resolution will never be given effect to, and the latest pronouncement of Mr. Olney, Secretary of State, is clearly to the effect that the United States Government considers that the power to recognise the so-called Republic of Cuba as an independent State rests exclusively with the Executive. The recognition of Cuba by the President would be tantamount to a declaration of war, and it is pretty well certain that nothing of the kind will happen, for one good reason that the United States have no fleet able to cope with such a situation. The disposition shown in Europe to look upon the whole matter as an outbreak of rampant Jingoism, which will fizzle out again in due time, seems, therefore, fully justified. It would, indeed, be a thousand pities if the United States, now on the eve of a general revival, after protracted depression, should embark in a difficult and profitless undertaking, which would retard that revival indefinitely. Already a distinct improvement was shown in recent traffic returns, and there is every prospect, if peace be not disturbed, that commerce and trade will flourish exceedingly in the new year. Money is becoming very abundant in Wall-street, and the financial position of the country is distinctly improving. The balance of trade continues in favour of the United States, and the figures of the country's foreign trade for November show the amount of exports of merchandise to have been 107,840,000 dols., against imports valued at 50,038,000 dols. The heaviest relapse has taken place in those stocks which are generally the most active, viz., Milwaukee and Louisville, and in these, too, the most important recovery may be looked for. At their present level they are certainly an excellent purchase, and so are Atchison Prefs., Erie, Denver Prefs. and Ordinary, Southern Ordinary, Norfolk Prefs., and Northern Pacific Prefs. As was to be expected, Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks have moved down with the Yankee market, although not suffering so severely: but even that moderate setback will doubtless be recovered again whenever American Rails brace up.

Foreigners and South Americans.

Interbourse securities showed a favourable tendency, in sympathy with the Paris Bourse, where the mid-monthly settlement had been got over remarkably well, until Spanish executed a downward movement on the Cuban trouble, and thus temporarily spoilt the tone of some of the other stocks. Italians, on the other hand, have remained firm, and a good deal of strength has been shown by Turks, apparently on the hope that Russia will throw her weight in the scale as regards reforms in Turkey. In the South American department a disagreeable impression was created by the report that the Uruguayan Government had not sent the usual remittance of the proportion of the Customs receipts applicable to the service of the foreign debt, but was keeping the money in Monte Video owing to some dispute with the London and River Plate Bank as to the rate of exchange at which the remittances were made. Uruguay bonds, promptly declined, but recovered to 45¾ on the statement that the remittance had been despatched. It was undoubtedly very foolish on the part of the Uruguayan Government to allow a dispute of this kind to interfere with the regularity of the remittances. This, however, was only an error of policy, and Uruguay declares herself determined to fulfil all her engagements. Argentine Government stocks have been steady, and the gold premium in Buenos Ayres has again declined, the present quotation being 178. I have it on good authority that nothing will come of the Pelligrini proposals, or of the much-talked-of unification of the debt, but that a resumption of the full service of the debt will take place in accordance with the Romero-Rothschild agreement, in 1899. That would undoubtedly be the best solution of the problem. Amongst Argentine Railway debentures Buenos Ayres Great Southern Four per Cents. are firm at 119½, and Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. First Debenture stock is receiving a good deal of attention at 108 to 109 as a gilt-edged security, yielding a comparatively high return. The most popular Argentine Railway security at the present moment is, however, Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income Debenture stock, which has advanced to 60. Years ago I predicted that Cordoba Central (C.N.S.) Debenture stock had a great future, and recommended its purchase at about 40. It has since been split into Four per Cent. Debenture stock now standing at 94, and into Income Debenture stock now at 60; and again I say that a rise of five points in the latter would be fully justified. Traffics of the line are excellent, and since January 1 have amounted to 3,713,710 dols., against 3,497,290 dols. in the previous year. The decline in the gold premium, of course, means a considerable increase in the amount available on this side. The Government guarantee of the Central Northern Section amounts to £78,600, whereas only £73,300 is required to pay 4 per cent., so that the net revenue earned would pay nearly 4¾ per cent., less the £5,300 difference in the guarantee, and required for the 4 per cent. A dividend of 4½ per cent. at least on the Income bonds is thus anticipated. The Board have yet to arrange with the Government as regards their commutation, but they will probably declare an interim dividend in January, and the balance in April or May. I need hardly point out that, on a 4½ per cent. basis, at 60 the yield would be about 7½ per cent. per annum, with every prospect of a further increase in the following year. Brazilians have been fairly steady, a more favourable view being taken of the outlook in Rio de Janeiro. Mexican Sixes are also firm, but no progress has been made with reference to the settlement of the Columbian debt. Costa Rica "A" and "B" bonds have risen 1, although, so far, nothing has transpired as regards an early settlement of the claims of the foreign bondholders.

The Kaffir Circus.

A good deal of nervousness still prevails in the South African market, and there has been no further important upward movement. Yet the continuous slump has come to an end, and reactions one day are generally followed by recoveries the next. There is hardly time for any important upward movement before Christmas, but the view has generally gained ground that prices will go ahead early in the new year, and this is all the more likely as crushings during December are expected to show good results. We may also assume that Messrs. J. B. Robinson and B. I. Barnato will not be idle now that they are in South Africa, and that they will exercise a favourable influence upon their respective groups, and naturally also upon the mining industry in general. President Kruger has again given utterance to a very conciliatory speech, and it is safe, at all events, to assume that there will be no more political trouble in the Transvaal for the present. Even Dingaan's Day has passed off peacefully, and the session of the Volksraad was closed by Oom Paul with the characteristic remark that he wishes to settle all matters pending between the Boers and the British Government "in peace and love." A little scare was produced by the report that important changes in the firm of Messrs. L. Hirsch & Co. would have an unfavourable effect upon the market, the senior partner wishing to retire, with the result that large sums of money would be withdrawn from the market. I am informed that the change in question is by no means imminent, and would only be temporary, and that no money would be withdrawn either from the firm or from the market, and this is not, therefore, a "Bear" point. I continue to receive inquiries from correspondents as to which mines they should invest in, but I would like to point out to them that I gave such a list last week. For the benefit, however, of those who might not have noticed it, I herewith repeat the list:—Langlaagte Estate, New Primrose, Glencairn, City and Suburban, Robinson, Wolhuter, New Crœsus, Kimberley Roodepoort, Knights, Randfontein, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment, Barnato Consols, Buffelsdoorn, Woodstock (Transvaal), Henderson's Estates, Lydenburg Estates, Oceana Consols, Mozambique, Modderfontein "B," and Waterfall Estates. Another question I am asked is whether it would be advisable to buy before Christmas or not. To those who are able to pay for their shares it will not matter whether they pay for them before Christmas or after, and only to these I give my advice. In my opinion they ought to buy at once, as the whole rank-and-file will want to buy directly the new year has commenced, so that they would then only be able to get in at higher prices. The present level of quotations is, moreover, low enough in all conscience. East Rand Proprietary have again fluctuated on the somewhat divergent reports of Monday's meeting of shareholders, being now quoted $3\frac{5}{8}$. Nothing is known yet as to what will come of the new scheme for providing additional capital, and possibly the French shareholders will continue their obstructionist tactics in connection with this latest proposal. Consolidated Goldfields have not altogether maintained the best price recently touched, and are quoted $8\frac{5}{8}$, while Rand Mines have been steady at $23\frac{3}{4}$, but Chartered shares have received some inside support, being quoted $2\frac{9}{16}$. The Spes Bona is on the warpath with a proposed issue of 85,000 shares of £1 each at par to the shareholders. If the latter do not respond sufficiently, a loan will have to be raised for the balance. The hopeful feature about this concern is that the battery of forty stamps is expected to commence crushing in January. M. Jacques Lebaudy seems to have carried his point in effecting a sale of the United Langlaagte Company's property for £70,000 to the United Proprietary Company. It is a kind of "rob Peter to pay Paul" arrangement, as M. Lebaudy is interested in both concerns, and the question is, What next? Dividends are announced of 25 per cent. by the Wemmer, 15 per cent. by the Roodepoort United, and 10 per cent. by the New Heriot, and it will be interesting to see what the other Witwatersrand mines will pay. The sale of the new Golden Kopje Company's property of forty-eight claims for £725 against a purchase price of £80,000, paid by the Company on its formation in July last, shows a disastrous failure which reflects discredit upon promoters and Directors, especially if, as is now rumoured, no work has ever been done on the property. The Tati Concessions Company's report shows that in a period of great disasters a net profit of £56,319 has been obtained from the sale of mining claims and machinery, which is by no means unsatisfactory considering all things. Woodstock Transvaal shares have been in some demand at $1\frac{1}{4}$, and, in anticipation of the commencement of crushing next month, these are an excellent lock-up. In view of the excellent results achieved by Knights during November the price, now $4\frac{7}{8}$, ought to have risen much higher already, but the advance is merely put off, especially as sixty more stamps will be crushing shortly. A very satisfactory position was shown to exist in connection with Henderson's Transvaal Estates at last Tuesday's meeting of shareholders. Mr. Henderson, who presided, went through the list of the properties owned by the Company, and showed how, although a dividend of 10 per cent. is declared and large assets in shares and cash had been accumulated, only a small portion of the properties had been disposed of. Mr. G. H. Kearton went into a calculation of the present value of the assets and gave figures which went to prove that the shares should be worth at least from £4 to £5 at present instead of only £2. Diamond shares have been steady, and De Beers are quoted at about 29, New Jagersfontein at about $10\frac{3}{8}$.

Golden West Australia.

Everybody in the West Australian market is looking forward to a beneficial change, which is expected to come about in the new year, and there is good reason for this hope, as a number of new mines will fall into line with crushings, and thus will supply conclusive proof of the value of West Australian goldfields, and the only proof which nowadays will go down with investors in West Australians. Some important events have, moreover, to come off, which will tend to enliven this market. I refer in the first instance to the group of the West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance Corporations. I have it on excellent authority that on the suggestion of numerous shareholders the Directors have decided to capitalise a large portion of the profits, and that this will result in the recommendation of a dividend exceeding 200 per cent., and on a basis which makes the value of the Ordinary shares £6 per share, against the present price of 4. At an early period of next year, moreover, nearly all the mines brought out by these Companies will be crushing, with the exception, perhaps, of Hannan's Golden Group and Golden Treasure, which, however, are also well on the way to the point at which they will become producers. Lake View Consols have been steady at about 7, but there is every prospect of an improvement in the near future. The other substantial mining shares in this department have also been well maintained, viz., Ivanhoe at $10\frac{1}{4}$, and Great Boulder at $6\frac{3}{8}$. Only a small number of crushings have to be reported this time, which, according to my recent custom, I herewith give:—

—	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Ounces of Gold.	Assay of Tailings per Ton.
Coolgardie Mint and Iron King	135	350	15 dwt.
Imperial Western Australian Corporation—
Western Shaw ...	60	242	—
,, ,, ...	40	160	—
Great Boulder	712	2,147	—

A considerable batch of crushings may be expected to be announced next week. A strong "Bear" attack has been made upon Northern Territories Goldfields, which are, however, recovering now, and are quoted about $2\frac{3}{4}$. West Australian Goldfields are quiet at $5\frac{5}{8}$, and Hampton Plains have hardened to $2\frac{5}{8}$. The shares in both these Companies may be expected to go ahead very sharply in the new year. Hannan's Brownhill have also maintained a firm tone at 5¼. A fair amount of dealings has taken place in some of the cheap shares, to which I have repeatedly referred as attractive for investors who do not mind locking them up for a while—viz., White Feather Reward, 1⅝; Great Boulder Main Reef, 1¼; Mawson's Reward, ⅞; Robinson, ¾; East Murchison United, 13/16; Mount Margaret, 1; Gladiators, ⅝; Burbank's North at par; and Burbank's Consols, also at par. West Australian Joint-Stock Trust shares have eased off to 1⅞ premium, but there is every prospect of a recovery in the shares of this Company as soon as the year is turned, as it is well known that it has continued to make good profits. From the 90-Mile Consolidated a cablegram has been received that crushing is now proceeding; it will be interesting to watch what the return will be. A cablegram from the Yalgoo Proprietary states that a good body of ore at the 60-ft. level has been discovered, showing visible gold. No fresh news has transpired with reference to the West Australian (Gold District) Trading Corporation and the proposed reconstruction, but it is understood that an investigation is now going on. Armadale have improved to 1 on the favourable developments at the mine. Kalgurli have advanced sharply on the announcements by cable of a rich strike. Some demand has been experienced for Hannan's Proprietary and Oroya, but Lady Loch are dull at 1¼. There has also been a reaction in Hit or Miss, fresh news from the mine being awaited. Lady Shenton, however, remained firm at 2. Rumours are current that the Central Wealth of Nations has cut the Wealth of Nations reef, whereupon the shares have come into demand again. It is evident that the mismanagement in the past was chiefly responsible for the non-success of the mine. Unfavourable advices have been received from the St. Denis Mine, and if the report is correct that the property is not gold-bearing, it is to be hoped that the promoters will give the Company a new property free of charge. This step was taken by the vendors of the Londonderry Extended, and should generally be adopted by respectable promoters.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

An important advance has taken place in Indian gold mining shares. Not only is it being recognised that these mines are doing remarkably well, but duplication of the shares is now also in sight; that is to say, the issuing of two shares for one, in order to make the heavy shares more marketable. The shares which are to be manipulated in this way are, in the first instance, Mysore and Champion Reefs, which are now quoted 8⅜ and 8½ respectively. Most other shares in this section have improved similarly. Australian mines, other than West Australians, have upon the whole been dull. Aladdin's Lamp have been quiet at 1¾, but there has been an improvement in Mount Morgan and Mount Lyell. On the other hand, Charters Towers mines have been dull, and there has been a decline in Mill's Day Dawn United, Bonnie Dundee, and Mosman. Croydon mines have been firm, especially Croydon Consols, which are quoted at 10s. 6d., with a dividend of 1s. per share still to come off next pay-day. New Zealand Gold Mining shares have moved within narrow limits. There has been a rise in Preece's Point, Woodstock, and Komata Queens, but New Zealand Joint Stock, Taitapu, and Waihi are easier. In Consolidated Goldfields of New Zealand, to which I referred last week, a good deal of business has been transacted. The price at one time gave way, but has since recovered to 3, at which they look promising. In the general foreign section there have been improvements in Pestarena, Frontino and Bolivia, and Victory, but De Lamar have reacted. In copper shares a rise in Rio Tinto has not been altogether maintained. Grand Central have improved to 2¼. It will be remembered that this mine is situated in the State of Sonora, Mexico, and that it has paid a 10 per cent. dividend within a few months of the introduction of the shares in this market. The Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico, Limited, has now been formed to acquire three fully-equipped and developed mines, viz.—the Santa Elena, Santa Elena East Extension, and Phœnix, together with about 17,000 acres of land, which are situated in the same State of Sonora and on the same range of mountains as the Grand Central. The mines are taken over as going concerns, plant and machinery, including a battery of sixty stamps, having been acquired. The principal reef occurring in these mines is described as being one of the largest gold and silver bearing quartz veins in the world, and according to numerous experts' reports, which have been quite recently confirmed by Mr. Frank Nicholson, a well-known mining engineer, the value of the property has been thoroughly tested, the grade of ore varying from 12 dwts. to 2·68 oz. of gold per ton. Subscribers for the £100,000 of Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture stock, which are being offered to the public, redeemable at the option of the Company after 1900 at six months' notice, at the price of £110 per cent., have the option of converting into Ordinary shares of the Company at par. This gives the investor an opportunity of having a lien over the whole property, and yet benefiting by any favourable developments in the mines, there being every prospect of the shares rising to a very considerable premium. Who is behind the London General Assets Corporation, Limited? This concern is sending out touting letters concerning the "Victoria and General Mining and Finance Corporation, Limited," in which a commission of 20 per cent. (half in cash and half in shares) is offered as procuration fee in addition to 10 per cent. for underwriting. There must be a big promoter's profit in the proposed capital of £150,000 of the Victoria Corporation now in incubation to admit of commissions of 30 per cent.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the equipped and developed mines known as the Santa Elena, Santa Elena East Extension, and Phœnix, together with about 17,000 acres of land, 1,000 of which is tillable, and the remainder timber land, situate in the Arizpe District, State of Sonora, Mexico. The capital is £300,000, in shares of £1 each.

The mines acquired by this Company are in an advanced state of development. It is stated that the plant and machinery, amongst which there is a sixty-stamp battery, cost upwards of £100,000. The mines have been reported upon by three leading mining experts, and their reports have been confirmed by Mr. Frank Nicholson, a mining engineer of high standing. The Santa Elena vein, which traverses the properties, has been traced for over a mile, and ore at the 250-ft. level gave a value of 2·68 oz. of gold per ton. Mr. Nicholson reports that he considers the prospective value of these mines immense, and that it is a true fissure vein of great size. With a property containing upwards of twenty-five square miles in one of the most promising parts of the auriferous State of Sonora, this Company proposes to establish sub-Companies, and is likely to prove a most important Mexican mining pioneer Company. Investors have an opportunity of subscribing to the Six per Cent. Debentures (which are convertible into Ordinary shares), and thus obtain a lien upon the whole of the property, while yet being able to benefit by favourable developments on the mines.

The Star Cycle Company, Limited.—For the purpose of taking over and extending the business of the Star Cycle Company (Sharratt & Lisle), Limited, of Wolverhampton, cycle manufacturers, in accordance with a reconstruction scheme adopted by the shareholders, this Company has been formed with a capital of £120,000, divided into 50,000 Preference and 70,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each.

I cannot say that this issue looks favourable. There are plenty of other Cycle Companies that would prove a better investment.

The Old Wolverhampton Brewery Company, Limited.—A Company has been formed to acquire as going concerns the freehold Breweries known as the Hall Park, Bilston, the Wolverhampton Brewery, and the Wine and Spirit business of Messrs. Howard, Fletcher, & Sons, of Walsall and Birmingham. The capital is £170,000, divided into Preference and Ordinary shares, and £110,000 Four and a Half per Cent. Mortgage Debenture stock, issued at £102 per cent.

The capital asked for these Breweries is excessive, and a Debenture stock of £110,000 is far too large in proportion to the assets to be considered a safe investment.

The "Moses Moss" Toy Fund.

I am pleased to find that my appeal to my readers for contributions towards the Truth Toy Fund has been further responded to. There is, however, still great need of funds, and I should be glad to be favoured with contributions from the other numerous readers of my remarks. Last week I was able to announce a total of £120. 12s. 6d., and I have since received the following subscriptions:—

Woolf Joel, £25; Whitaker Wright, £20; W. Mendel, £5; J. L. L., £1. 1s.; W. F. Orriss, £2. 2s.; Old Ebor, £1.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

F. O.—Although no settlement has yet been arrived at with regard to the future treatment of the National Debt, prospects are very favourable. N. T., Bath.—Yes, I consider Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income bonds as very promising. See remarks under "Foreigners and South Americans."

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

T. T.—I do not exactly see what risk you would run in endeavouring to obtain the return suggested, as long as you do not promise these people any very large profit, and make sure they do not stick to the money. H. A. M.—No reason to sell, at present, the Eastern Bank shares in question, but you must of course understand that they are a speculative security. Paris.—I gave full particulars of the dealings of Cunliffe, Russell, & Co., 10, Place de la Bourse, Paris, in the issue of Truth dated October 22. You had better find out what they will give you for these bonds now, and if they do not place you on proper terms, I should be pleased to give you the name of a respectable firm of foreign bankers who will do so. Ipswich.—I quite agree with you that steps should be taken by the Postmaster-General to prevent the posting of touting circulars for German lotteries in England. Curious, Belfast.—I must refer you to my letter, which gives full information on such subjects. Dunlop Deferred certainly look promising, and so do Bovril Deferred. The last dividend paid on Johnnies was 15 per cent., and no further dividend is due yet. Xmas.—I advise you to have nothing to do with this outside concern, the system of which I do not like. C. C. B.—I should think that the paper, the name of which I send you in your envelope, should suit you. It costs only 1d. weekly, is published on Saturday, and gives full information on financial matters. P. J. B.—1. A fair South African banking institution, the shares should recover again. 2. If matters in Brazil should improve, this bank should be all right. 3. I prefer No. 1. S. O. X.—You should have nothing to do with the Insurances Corporation, which I have already criticised unfavourably. I am referring again to this concern under "Various Investments.

Home Rails.

F. Cleve.—Your selection of North British Three per Cent. Preferred is a good one, and this dividend is quite safe for the present. Felix.—Yes, I think that North-Western Ordinary stock is promising in view of the excellent traffics; but, from the point of view of the yield, Brighton "A" and Caledonian Deferred (Coras) are the best.

American and Foreign Rails.

J. G. C.—A well-secured bond; but it might be advisable to now await the arrangements at present being made for the reconstruction of the road before buying. Saddlewood.—I advise you to hold your American Railroad bonds; they are likely to improve considerably. Jumbo.—The City Editor of the daily paper in question always looks at matters in the darkest light; you should take no notice of this. The Baltimore and Ohio will, no doubt, be reconstructed on a sound basis. J. B. L.—I see no particular reason for selling Cordoba Central Seven per Cent. Preference shares; but if you were to change them for Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income bonds you would probably see a quicker profit, and these are also a safe investment with immediate dividends. See remarks under "Foreigners and South Americans."

Mining Shares.

Yorks.—A fair mining risk, but it would be preferable to await further development. Amicus.—Fair mining risks, but at present neglected. Ebor.—1. It is quite correct that the Directors of the Hawk's View ought to give the fullest information as regards the mine. 2. I have all along taken an unfavourable view of the Golden Plum. What you say about the reconstruction is correct. 3. I do not think much of this, but I should think it would be advisable to hold all mining shares, as better prices are expected in the new year. The Hannan's Golden Group and Golden Treasure are in the rich Hannan's district, in which the Lake View Consols, Ivanhoe, and Great Boulder are also situated. Corrigenda.—Your shares Nos. 1-3 are likely to come into notice again in the new year, and should be held. Crusoe, Galway.—Hold for an improvement. Watchman.—Yes, Hannan's Proprietary should be held for a recovery. Dabbles.—Take a quick profit whenever you can. Benare.—1. Yes, Heidelburg Estates are a promising purchase. 2. This is also a fair mining risk. 3. No. 4. I should think so, but I do not like this system of forward delivery. J. Pye.—Yes, the West Australian shares a, b, and c are worth locking up. Gold.—The dividends are generally paid at the end of July and December. Robinsons are a good purchase. A. E. F.—I cannot reply by letter. 1 and 2. Yes, but wait until a suitable plan is worked out. Amongst the shares mentioned by you, Lady Shenton (3), White Feather Reward (8), Burbanks Birthday (9), Cue No. 1 (10), Great Boulder Main Reef (12), and Mainland Consols (13) are the most promising, but all should be held for a recovery. A. L., Sutton Courtney.—Hold La Reine d'Or, and buy more to average. The mine has now entered a promising stage. Also hold the other mines. Accuracy.—Yes; I still advise purchase of La Reine d'Or. These are preferable to the others. White Hussar.—Yes; hold for a recovery. Smubs.—Hold all your mining shares Nos. 1-9, and average Nos. 1-3, if you can take them up. A. M. S.—I should prefer holding African Estates. J. B. A.—When Hit or Miss rose to 1½-¾ I recommended all my readers to clear their profits. At present I say hold. Mack.—Yes; I think it is a good opportunity to buy gold mining shares before Christmas, and you can find all the necessary advice in to-day's letter. Randfonteins.—No; you are not entitled to the Porges Randfontein bonus which was declared much earlier. Poker Flat.—They never reached that price buyers. Chien de Montargis.—There is no doubt that this property will eventually prove very valuable and before the slump is over, the shares will recover. H. S. B.—I have repeatedly stated that the Directors of the Abercorn Reefs are behaving very badly to the shareholders, who ought to combine to turn them out. Colonel, Clitheroe.—I have repeatedly expressed a very unfavourable view of Major Buttle's Great Work Mining and Development Syndicate. Have nothing to do with it. G. H.—More money was wanted for development and additional machinery. Earles.—No option but to hold for a recovery. John G.—1. Yes. 2. Possibly. 3. There ought to be in view of the general improvement in the Indian Mining market. 4. Hold Thames Hauraki. 5. Yes. Fum Fum.—Hold your Mining shares Nos. 1 to 3 for a recovery. Rosebud.—You must be aware how general has been the slump in the Mining market. There is no option but to hold for a recovery. Old Jersey.—1. Hold for a recovery. No option but to hold No. 2. Hold all the rest for a rise. I gave particulars of the position of No. 5 a fortnight ago. D. McC.—There is a fair prospect for the mine, and matters should improve in the new year. Justice.—If you do not consider the terms fair, why do you not combine with other shareholders to resist them? Jona.—1. Yes, probably. 2. Yes, Croydon Consols are still an excellent purchase. 3. No particular reason to sell Paddington Consols. 4. No, Mysore Gold are improving on the duplicating movement. 5. Yes. Snips.—Yes, Croydon Consols are an excellent purchase, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment ditto. J. L. L.—Thanks for the contribution to the Toy Fund. I am glad you are doing so well in Croydon Consols on my advice. Bolton.—I do not advise buying more. Wait. Snipe.—1. Hold Hannan's Proprietary. 2. The same applies to the others, and certainly keep Taitapu for a rise. Investor, Accrington.—Yes, the Mining shares Nos. 1-3 are promising. A. F., Huddersfield.—I do not like St. John del Rey and Deccans. My All.—Yes, Johnnies should be held for a rise. W. C. M.—You must have read all about the Glencairn and Glenlnce, if you are a regular reader of my letter. A. X.—I think you will find this South African Company come into favour again with the new year. G. W., Manchester.—1. The mine will resume crushing next year. 2. I do not like this concern at all. 3. I am not aware of this. 4. You should hold London and Globe for an important rise. H. A. B.—The Company naturally shares in the general depression of the West Australian market. Bradford.—Respectable and straightforward. I should prefer Croydon Consols. Hold the others. Whink.—The first two are fair mining risks. I do not like the third. Delta.—Hold for a recovery. Studlands.—No option but to hold No. 1, they should recover again. The same applies

Mortlock's (Oxford-st.), Estd. A.D. 1746.—The collection of China and Glass now on view in their Galleries fully maintains the high reputation and pre-eminence enjoyed by "Mortlock's" for the last century and a half, and well repays a visit of inspection.

China and Glass. — Messrs. Goode, Artists and Designers, solicit an inspection of their collection in their recently-extended South Audley-street premises, now by far the largest and most important in Europe. Messrs. Goode guarantee the excellence of all their productions, and invite a comparison of their prices with those of any co-operative stores.

to Nos. 2 and 3. Altenburg.—A fair lock-up. J. R. N.—My information does not agree with yours. But I certainly think that the shareholders should insist upon this mine being put in order.

Industrial Shares.

Imperial.—I have not a favourable view of Showell's Stockport Brewery Ordinary shares. R. H. W.—Yes, I consider new Bovril Ordinary and Swift Cycles a fair purchase. I do not think so much of the other cycle shares. S. D., Dulwich.—You should hold your Bovril shares for a rise. They are already better, and when the "Stags" have cleared out, a sharp advance is probable. I do not think much of the other industrial Companies mentioned by you. Q. O. C.—1. I do not like Beeston Pneumatic Tyre shares. 2. Bovrils are likely to improve. Fearful.—Why did you apply for British Motor Syndicate shares after my severe criticisms. As you have not followed my advice how can I help you? Bed.—No; I do not advise purchase of City of London Electric Lighting shares. F. O.—1. Yes, Bovril shares are likely to recover; hold. 2. There is no special market yet for Paquin, Limited, but the Company is stated to be doing well, and you should hold. 3. I do not like Starley Brothers & Westwood. 4. Swift Cycles should certainly be held for a rise, the Company is doing exceedingly well. Have nothing to do with the Cycling Industries Corporation. H. D., Battle.—I cannot possibly tell you what the profits of the London Canning Company will be in the future, but the invention is evidently a most valuable one, and the Company ought to do well. Oro.—Both are promising Australian investments, but you must distinctly understand that they are to some extent speculative. W. W. B.—I have an unfavourable opinion of Concentric Tubes, and do not advise their purchase. H. H., Derby.—Yes, I think favourably of the Acatène Cycle Company, and said so when the prospectus was issued. Avalon.—1. Shares are very often quoted ex dividend before the dividend is actually paid; but you need but claim the same from your broker. 2. I do not think much of this brewery. Didsbury.—I have a favourable opinion of Paquin, Limited, and expressed this when the Company was issued. With reference to the dividend on Dunlops, you simply have to claim the same. Ajax.—Yes, I still have a favourable opinion of Bovril Ordinary and Deferred, and recent statements made by Lord Playfair are very much in favour of the Company. You will realise a profit before the time mentioned by you. Sydenham.—These shares are quoted about par, and you should certainly hold them, as prospects are satisfactory. W. J.—1. No; I do not advise purchase of Simpson's Lever Chains; this concern is not at all promising. 2. The capital is too large. 3. The Dunlop Company is doing remarkably well, and an improvement is probable. C. O. W.—You must be aware that I hold a very unfavourable opinion of the British Motor Syndicate. If you had cancelled your application at once you might have recovered your money. As you did not do so, I cannot help you.

Mixed Investments.

Ironsides.—I advise you to hold all your West Australian shares Nos. 1 to 4 for a rise; also Nos. 5 and 6. No reason to sell Nos. 6 and 7, and No. 8 is one of the best Australian banks. Doubt.—There is no reason for selling your Dunlop Deferred (1) or Gladiators (2); both are likely to improve, as the Companies are doing well, and the "Bears" will probably fare badly. Taitapu Estates (3) should also be held for a rise. Business.—You should not sell the mining shares at all now, and certainly hold your French Dunlops and Gladiators. Whist.—You should hold all your mining shares Nos. 1 to 6 for a rise. Although some of your Cycle shares Nos. 7 to 11 are not at all well selected, I should think that even in their case an improvement in the new year is quite on the cards. Urquhart.—Hold your American Railroad bonds, Nos. 1, 4, and 6, which are sure to appreciate; and there is no reason to sell Nos 2 and 3 now. If you want to buy more American Railroad bonds you should make your selection from the list given in Truth on December 10. Prodigious.—No reason to sell your Coras or North British Deferred (Nos. 1 and 2); the position of these lines is so favourable that you should hold for a rise. No option but to hold your mining shares until next year, when much better prices may be anticipated. E. L.—Hold Langlaagte Block B and the other mining share for an improvement. No reason to sell the Brewery Debenture stock. F. C., Ramsgate.—I see no objection to your proposed investments Nos. 1 to 5. The Northern Pacific Prior Lien bonds will eventually be quoted in the official list of the London Stock Exchange, but do not appear there yet as the reconstruction is of recent date. The question as to the money to be left to you is one for a solicitor to answer. North British Deferred and Districts are a capital speculation, also Caledonian Deferred. I regret that as a matter of principle I cannot give you the name of a stockbroker. J. W., Blackpool.—You should certainly keep Paquins (2) and Croydon Consols (3). Neither is there any reason for selling West Australian Joint Stock Trust (4) or Northern Territories Goldfields (5). No option but to hold No. 1.

Various Investments.

A great deal of attention has of late been given to the money outlook and to its probable influence upon the Stock markets. Quite a money squeeze is anticipated in some quarters, but The Times and other daily contemporaries have been so persistent in their warnings that I should think that those connected with the Stock markets would have taken every precaution to secure the necessary funds for the end of December settlement, after which the release of the dividends will probably bring renewed ease. The demand for gold for Germany has subsided to some extent, and it would also appear as if gold shipments to India have been averted for the present through the passing of the Bill increasing the note circulation. A new Indian loan of one million and a-half to two millions, through the issue of Bills is, however, looked for. While the improvement of trade must necessitate an increasing demand upon the surplus funds, there is at present no indication that there will be any undue pressure after the turn of the year, although we cannot expect a return to the low rates current some time ago. Silver has fallen to 29⅞d., and Rupee Paper has also eased off to 62½. India stock, however, has hardly moved, and Colonial Bonds have displayed a steady tone. Consols, on the other hand, have experienced a sharp decline to 110⅞ for the account, chiefly on the advance in the Money Market. A fair business has been transacted in Cycle shares, although no upward movement is expected before next year. Dunlop Deferred remain at 1½, Humber Ordinary and Extension at 1¼; but New Beeston have dropped to 2¾. Swift Cycles have been dealt in to some extent at ⅛ premium, while Gladiators have eased off slightly to $\frac{5}{16}$ premium. Bagot Tyre shares remain at 2⅝ premium, and a special settlement has been granted for January 6. The shares in Bovril, Limited, have improved on the very favourable statements made by Lord Playfair, the Deferred and Preferred being quoted at par to ⅛ premium, and the Ordinary still stand at ⅛ discount to par. Turner Pneumatic Tyre shares have come into some demand at 1⅝. This Company's capital is only £60,000, while, in addition to the valuable lever patents for Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States, they have a very broad licence under the Dunlop-Welch patents. The fact that the Directors recently refused an offer for the Company, equal to £3 per share, opens up a hopeful prospect. When the Insurance Corporation, Limited, was placed before the public I expressed an adverse view of it. I see that the Contract Agency, of 63 and 64, New Broad-street (whoever that may be), is offering, by circular dated the 15th inst., "a few thousand of the original Ordinary shares of £10 each at £1 per share premium, instead of the proposed £2 per share premium payable by others." On December 8 an issue of Insurances Corporation shares was advertised at £2 premium, and the list closed on December 11; while on the 16th inst. the Secretary of the Insurances Corporation wrote to the Financial Times stating that the Directors wholly condemned the procedure of the promoters. It must be admitted that the whole of these proceedings are calculated to bring the concern into discredit, and my readers will do well to follow my original advice to leave the shares alone. Amongst the coming new industrial undertakings to be placed before the public is an amalgamation of four leading firms of carriage manufacturers, also the conversion of another decorating and furnishing firm. Vimbos and the Wicks Type Founding Machinery Company (a rival of the Linotype) have been put off to the new year. A prospectus of Westphalite, Limited, is being circulated for the purpose of obtaining underwriting, but one would say that there are already enough nitrate of ammonia explosives being worked. — Your affectionate Uncle,

QUEER STORY.

UNDER THE MISTLETOE.

"PISH! You insensate image. You're no judge. I don't suppose that you ever kissed a pretty girl under the mistletoe in your life."

"Yes I did——once."

"You did?"

"I did."

"I say, you fellows, here's bachelor Bruff, the misogynist, calmly confessing that he has positively kissed a pretty girl under the mistletoe——once!"

"By Jove! What's that? Bruff kiss a girl! I can't believe it."

"Nor I. When was it?"

"Where was it?"

"Who was she?"

And all the occupants of the smoking-room turned to chaff the insensate image, who, with rich, not to say foul, pipe in mouth, and hands folded comfortably over waistcoat, was lazily digesting the large and excellent dinner which lay inside.

"I don't wonder at your being surprised," said this placid gentleman, noways discomposed by their banter, "I was surprised myself."

"Tell us who she was now? A flame of yours, Bruff?"

"No. A flame of some one's else. And I kissed her under his nose."

"By George! And didn't he knock you down for your impudence?"

"Oh, no. He was quite friendly. Actually wanted to compare notes. The funniest thing in the world, though deuced embarrassing, I vowed never to place myself in such a position again."

"And you never have?"

"Never."

"How long ago did this episode occur, Bruff?"

"Twelve years to-morrow."

"It was on a Christmas day, then?"

"Yes."

"Hang you, Bruff! Don't be so jolly monosyllabic. Be more confidential—more communicative, you miser of words. You know we're bursting to hear all about it. Gratify our curiosity."

"If you wish," said Bruff, complacently. "It is a long yarn, though. I shall have to begin at the beginning, and the kiss comes right at the end. I dare say I shall take twenty minutes getting to it."

"We don't mind if you take an hour—so long as you do get to it? Eh, gentlemen?"

"Not we."

"Rather not."

"It's early yet."

"Fire ahead."

"Very well," said Bruff, settling himself into a still more digestive attitude, and blinking lazily at the fire. "If you are really prepared to listen, I don't mind spinning the yarn. So here goes:

"It happened, as I have told you, twelve years ago to-morrow. I was living in London at the time, but I was accustomed, then, to spend my Christmases with an uncle in Hertfordshire. The old gentleman used to be very fond of me, and his house was a sort of second home to my unworthy self. I am sorry to say that he is fond of me no longer, and that I am now a stranger to that hospitable roof. The fact is, he was bent on my marrying my cousin, his daughter and heiress, and I offended him by crying off. There were one or two little reasons for this both on the lady's part and on mine. I didn't want to marry at all; and I didn't want to marry her. Also, she didn't want to marry me, and she did want to marry some one else. It seemed to me that this was a sufficient barrier to the scheme. My uncle was of the contrary opinion. He damned my cousin—a poor, timid girl—into consenting; then he tried to damn me. I wasn't to be damned. We parted, and have not since spoken. However, this is by the way.

"In those days we had not yet quarrelled, and I had made all my arrangements to spend Christmas at my uncle's as usual. You may imagine my annoyance, therefore, when I received a wire from the old boy on Christmas Eve—only an hour before I was due to start—saying that scarlet fever had broken out among his servants, and that he and all the family were in quarantine.

"Of course, it was then too late to make other arrangements. There was nothing for it but to stop in town. I summoned my landlady and told her what had happened. This worthy woman pulled a face as long as your arm.

"'Goodness gracious me!' she exclaimed, throwing up her hands, 'and there's Sool and me and Tommy fixed to spend Christmas with Sool's mother, and to send Sarah Jane for 'er 'oliday, and leave the key with Mrs. Giles next door.'

"'Well, my dear Mrs. Sewell,' I told her, 'there is no reason why either you or Sarah Jane should be done out of your holiday. I am an old campaigner. I can fend for myself. Just let me have the run of the coal-cellar and the larder, and I'll manage splendidly.'

"'Goodness gracious me, Mr. Bruff, I couldn't never think of such a thing.'

"'I'll be careful of the coals, Mrs. Sewell, and I won't be too rough on the larder.'

"'Lor, sir, now you're larfin' at me. I didn't mean that. I meant I never couldn't let a gentleman like you do for hisself. But I tell you what, sir. If you could do without much waiting upon, there's Mrs. Giles next door, now. I know she'd oblige by just coming in and making your bed and cooking you a bit of dinner, sir. I'll run in and arst her this minute.'

"It ended, therefore, in my being left to the mercies of Mrs. Giles next door. And I am bound to say that Mrs. Giles did me very well. She cooked me a goose and a plum-pudding for my Christmas dinner, which, owing to the exigencies of Mrs. Giles's family arrangements, had to be served at early mid-day. She then withdrew to the company of Giles and the little G.'s, promising to look in again about tea-time; while I sat me down to my solitary feed. I had never dined alone on Christmas-day before. It made me feel awfully dull and mopish. The goose was tender and succulent; Mrs. Giles had cooked it to a turn; the plum-pudding was of orthodox blackness and solidity; the Stilton of exactly a right degree of rottenness. I washed these viands down with '74 Bollinger. But I was bored, melancholy, wretched.

"I rose from the table and went to the window. The prospect did not serve to enliven me. It was the prospect of a damp, deserted, foggy, sloppy street. There was not a soul abroad. It was like a street in a city of the dead; one of those 'mouldy' scenes in Tartarus that Homer, or Virgil, or some johnny mentions somewhere. I lit a cigar and began to ruminate upon gloomy subjects, appropriate to my feelings; graveyards and funerals, and harrowing scenes of pain and parting and death. In the midst of these sombre, though congenial, meditations, I was disturbed by a profane sound of whistling. Some insensible wretch—some tough, impervious, unimpressionable pachyderm—was whistling a jaunty, jovial tune in the damp, deserted, foggy, sloppy street.

"I looked carefully. Through the gloom I dimly descried a man, seated on a doorstep opposite. He was a gaunt, tattered, skin-and-bones sort of creature, palpably a loafer and a vagrant. What on earth such a miserable outcast should find to whistle about I could not conceive. But whistle he did right lustily, with trills and chirps and impromptu variations, as though the simple tune afforded too little scope for his exuberance of spirit. It seemed to me that a man who could bubble over with buoyancy under such conditions could be no ordinary character. I acted on a sudden impulse. I went out into the street and accosted him.

Xmas Presents.—Some extraordinary Teas now being sold by Cooper Cooper & Co., Ltd., Tooley-street, London. C. C. & Co. in all their experience have rarely met with such marvellous teas.

"'Pray don't think me inquisitive,' I said, 'but what makes you whistle like that?'

"The vagrant eyed me rather askance. He mistook the purport of my question, evidently supposing that I wished to find fault.

"''Cos I choose,' he answered, with some defiance. 'A bloke may toon up, if he likes, I suppose? I ain't a blooming barrel-organ. You can't move me on!'

"'My good man, I don't wish to move you on. I am making no complaint. I merely asked for the sake of information. It was a civil question, surely? What does make you whistle?'

"'Ah well, if that's all—'cos I feels chirpy, like the little dickies.'

"'And may I ask—merely for information again—what makes you feel chirpy in all this confounded fog and slop? Do you think it in accordance with the fitness of things to feel chirpy amid such surroundings?'

"'Well, if you must know,' replied the loafer, 'I feels chirpy 'cos it only wants twenty minutes to my dinner; and I'm going to have a good one. That's why!'

"'I wonder,' I inquired, 'what is your idea of a good dinner, my friend?'

"'Aha!' he said, with a rich, long-drawn chuckle. 'Aha!' (rubbing his hands). 'I was round at the cook-shop yesterday. I saw their bill of fare for Christmas Day, and I spotted what I'd have. Sausage-meat fried in onions—large plate—much as you can eat—four d.; smashed pertaters, big help, two d.; chunk of bread, one d.; pot of ale, from public round the corner, four d.; screw of terbacker, one d. What d'ye mike of that, guv'nor? Aha!' (again rubbing his hands). 'A blow out for an alderman. And orl for one robert!'

"'Tell me now, my friend,' I asked him, 'how you would like roast goose, with apple sauce, plum pudding, Stilton cheese full of jumpers, half a bottle of wine, and a glass of spirits and a good cigar to top up with—eh?'

"He regarded me with a puzzled, doubtful stare.

"'You're tiking a bloke on,' he said.

"'No, I'm not. You can have it, if you like, at this very minute. The roast goose, with apple sauce, the plum pudding, the Stilton cheese full of jumpers, the wine, the spirits, the cigar. What do you say to it?'

"He still regarded me dubiously.

"'A robert won't run to orl that,' he muttered.

"'I mean that I will stand treat. Are you on?'

"'Show us a charnce,' said this loafer, smacking his blue lips.

"'I will. Come in there, with me, now. The goose, the plum-pudding, the cheese, the wine, the spirits are still on the table; and there's a box of weeds on the mantelpiece. Come along.'

"He rose from his seat on the doorstep and followed me across the street. When we reached the doorway of my diggings, he laid a grimy, blue-red hand upon my sleeve and stopped me.

"'Guv'nor,' he remarked, eyeing me very keenly. 'This is all fair and square, eh? This ain't no trap to get hold of a bloke and worry him, eh? You ain't no bloomin' guardian of the poor, or lay-reader, or teetotal cove, are yer?'

"'Certainly not, my good man. Do I look that sort?'

"'Well, ter do yer justice, no. But appearances is orful deceptive. The only teetotaller I ever knowed, personally, had the drunkenest looking nose in London.'

"'Make your mind quite easy about me. I have a bottle of good stuff under my belt now.'

"This statement seemed to satisfy him of my bona fides; and we passed together into my outer room.

"I bade him be seated at table—a command which he obeyed with alacrity. Then I helped him to the goose and apple sauce. Some of you young fellows here play a famous knife and fork after a run to hounds, but you are mere dilettante diners compared with that loafer. I have never seen such a no-nonsense-about-him-feeder before or since. His methods were simple, energetic, straightforward; free from all silly affectation of trifling, from anything in the shape of polite dalliance. He went for the goose fair and square; and the goose came very badly out of the encounter. When he attacked it, it had one wing, a breast, and two legs. All that survived was the skeleton and a single drumstick. To be sure, the bird had left its marks upon the victor, who bore upon his person many honourable stains. If I had not been an eye-witness, I should have conceived it impossible for any man to anoint himself so copiously with gravy. His cheeks, his chin, his fingers, were a miracle of greasiness. They glistened and shone as though they had been tallowed.

"Not till the goose was finished down to that one drumstick, did he speak a word. Then he lay back in his chair, rubbed his hands, smacked his unctuous lips, and said, with heavy emphasis on the verb:

"'Well, this is O.K.'

"'Now try some of this,' I said, carving a huge wedge from the plum-pudding.

"'Thank'ee, guv'nor.'

"He made short work of that helping, and came twice again. He was also distinctly severe on the Stilton. I dare say his consumption of jumpers ran well into four figures. Then I mixed him a tumbler of brandy and water, and gave him a cigar. I liked the way in which he sucked in the spirits, nursing the flavour about his palate with lips and tongue. It was so delightfully free from artifice; so full of natural enjoyment. But his power of verbal expression was more or less paralysed by the intensity of his feelings, and the only words he could find to describe them were a repetition of his former phrase, with even heavier emphasis on the verb:

"'Well, this IS O.K.!'

"'My friend,' I said to him, as we sat and smoked, 'you spoke, a short while back, of spending the sum of one robert upon your Christmas dinner. Forgive me if such an inquiry may seem unduly personal, but does that humble coin represent the sum total of your financial effects?'

"'Lord love yer, guv'nor! How yer do caterchise a bloke! But if yer must know—yes.'

"'And I take it,' I observed, 'that, very often, to put your assets even at one robert would be to overstate them.'

"'Well, you are one to turn a cove inside out. But I'll not tell yer no lies.'

"I suppose I was rather mad, or had drunk too much Bollinger. Anyway I did a fatuous thing. I happened to have five sovereigns about me. I produced them and placed them in a little pile on the table.

"'There's five pounds, my friend,' I said. 'You may take the lot—on one condition. You must tell me how you're going to spend it.'

"'Eh?' he exclaimed; 'tike the lot! Me pouch them five thick 'uns! Well, guv'nor, there's only one word to describe yer. Yer a dook.'

"'But how shall you spend them?'

"I thought he would be overcome at the prospect of laying out such vast wealth; that it would take him long and laborious thought to decide. It did not, in the least.

"'Oh, I know how I'll spend 'em,' he said, without hesitation, rubbing his hands, delightedly. "I'll buy two new barrels of noo toons for my Jemima's orgin—that's how I'll spend 'em.'

"'Is Jemima your young woman?'

"'That's just wot she is, guv'nor. And she runs an orgin. But the toons is old and the tikings small. This 'll pretty well treble 'em. We shall be able to get tied up on this.'

"He puffed at his cigar and lay back in his chair, jingling the five thick 'uns in his breeches pocket the while. I have never seen a man look quite so radiant with pleasure. It oozed from every pore in his face, and added its shine to that of the grease and gravy. For the third time, he repeated his formula of encomium, now with superlative emphasis on the verb.

"'Well—this IS O.K.!'

"Then he suddenly sprang up from his seat.

"'Look here, guv'nor,' he said, eagerly. 'Yer don't know wot you've done for me this day. But if yer wos to see Jemima, yer might understand better And yer shall see 'er, for I'm agoin' to fetch 'er.'

"'Pray,' I expostulated, rather aghast at that. 'Pray do not think of taking this trouble. I'm quite satisfied, my friend, with——'

"'Trouble!' he interrupted. 'Tain't no trouble, not where Jemima's concerned. Not much, eh! (winking). And I tell yer wot it is guv'nor; yer've behaved ter me like such a bloomin' dook, that dam if I don't mike Jemima bring her orgin along, and play you a toon or two out of downright compliment.'

"'Oh, really! I beg! I could not think——'

"But he was already out of the room, and a second or two later I saw his lank, long-legged figure travelling down the street at a sprawling double.

"I felt confoundedly 'taken to,' as my old nurse used to say in the days of my nipperhood. I didn't at all relish the prospect of a call from Jemima, and if there is one thing that I hate more than another, it is a barrel organ; especially when the tunes are stale. However, the fellow was gone, and I could not stop him. I therefore had to await the return of him, his Jemima, and the organ, with what equanimity I could muster.

"In about half an hour an organ suddenly struck up in the street below. I looked out of the window. There was my loafer and Jemima. Jemima was turning the handle; her lover held his right arm round her waist. On catching sight of me at the window, the latter greeted me with a proud and beaming smile. He then said a word to Jemima, and Jemima smiled up most graciously, and kissed her disengaged hand to me. I was thankful that the street was deserted. I was more than thankful that the respectable Mrs. Giles was not due until tea-time. Jemima was a stumpy little girl, with a big hat, a tumbled outfit that hung about her like a sack, and boots grievously trodden over. She had bright eyes, a dirty, pretty face, and matted black hair that might have been slept in since last Christmas. Altogether, as touzled a little drab of a Venus as you could wish to find.

"They played me several tunes on the organ, for which I bowed my thanks. Then the loafer linked his arm in Jemima's, and led her towards my street door. My heart sank. I guessed what was coming. I was to make Jemima's acquaintance. I heard them stumbling up the stairs, and a minute later I was receiving them in my room.

"'Look'ee, guv'nor,' said my friend, 'Jemima's been so fetched by your doocal behaviour that nothing 'll satisfy her but a personal interduction, and here she is!'

"I bowed, and said that I was charmed indeed.

"Jemima smirked with the utmost affability. I moved forward a chair and begged her to be seated. She shook her head, and her lover explained:—

"'We ain't no time to stop now, guv'nor. Jemima's got an engigement, and she'll have to be slopin' in half a tick. But there's just one little thing we'd like to do. Me and Jemima have settled it up on the way. It's the best we can do to show our gratitood to yer, and mike yer able to appreciate what a good turn yer've done to yours trooly. I'm agreeble, and she's agreeble, in fack we're both agreeble, that yer should give Jemima—a kiss!'

"'A—a—what?' I exclaimed, feeling suddenly faint at this unexpected and appalling offer.

"'A kiss, guv'nor. And that's wot neither she nor I would let another bloke in England tike. But y'er to have it, voluntary—'cos you've showed yourself a reel dook!'

"'Upon my word,' I said, hurriedly, 'This is awfully good of you; but I really couldn't think of trespassing, of —er—taking such a liberty, I—I——'

"'It's no trespass and it's no liberty, 'cos we're both agreeble,' said the loafer, with conscious generosity. 'Yer've give me a treat, guv'nor, and dam if I don't give yer a treat in return. And ter mike orl proper and seasonable, yer shall kiss Jemima under this, which I sneaked yesterday orf a coster's barrow.' (He had produced a sprig of mistletoe from his pocket, and was waving it in the air.) 'Now, then, Jemima, let the dook tike his reward.'

"Jemima stepped forward, and held up her dirty, pretty face towards me with complete unreserve, yet with the air of one who confers a great favour, and knows it. The loafer brandished his sprig of mistletoe above her preposterous hat. Seen at close quarters, Jemima's face looked not less pretty, indeed, but distinctly dirtier. However, my native politeness did not fail me. I sternly repressed a shudder; then nerved myself for the effort.

"I stooped. My moustache brushed Jemima's grimy mouth. The brim of her huge hat rumpled my front hair. Even in that dreadful moment I repressed a shudder. It was a work of Herculean self-command. But I repressed it.

"They then bade me farewell—addressing me on a footing of equality; clearly conscious that if they had accepted a benefit, they had at any rate given good value in exchange.

"My loafer lingered behind a moment. 'Aha-a-a!' he chuckled, winking, and rubbing his hands. 'Aha-a-a-a. Toothsome little kiss, guv'nor—ain't she?'

"And that, gentlemen, is the one occasion in my life on which I have kissed a pretty girl under the mistletoe."

MUSIC.

THE SIX VOICES CRYING IN THE WILDERNESS.

UNTIL last week, when Mr. Granville Bantock and five of his progressive fellow-students gave an orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, few had any idea that English music was in such a parlous condition. Although five at least of the young composers represented at this performance had already been accorded a trial, either at the Crystal Palace, at Queen's Hall, or elsewhere, it was nevertheless gravely asserted:—

> The chances of obtaining a hearing at the now numerous orchestral concerts in London are so remote, owing to the prevailing taste for foreign music, that the present concert is ventured upon as an experiment by several of the younger generation. . . . If there is a public, be it ever so small, to encourage a native effort of this kind, the welcome will not be met in a churlish spirit. If, on the other hand, the result of this concert is to be recorded as footnotes of musical history have already too often been written, those who are represented here to-night will have the satisfaction of failing in most excellent company.

The audience was small enough in all conscience—smaller, in fact, than at the recent performances of French music in London. There was, therefore, something pathetic in the suggestion that, as to the young English musician of the period, "his fellow countrymen should be ready with the bread, instead of waiting to place the traditional stone over his grave." The funds, it seems, did not run to a preliminary advertisement of this and much similar bathos, or the conduct of audiences towards Mr. Bantock and his five friends would have been even more inexplicable. The fact that these youthful gentlemen are not in any way distinguished ought, indeed, in the judgment of the new generation, to be an all-sufficient reason for crowding the house. It is so, as we know, in the opinion of the youthful dramatist, who, finding a difficulty in placing his poetical tragedy in seven acts, declaims against the crass commercialism of the age, and declares that among theatrical managers there is no such thing as a love of Art, with a capital A. Nevertheless, the audience last week was so small that the Six cried in the Wilderness in vain. The shame is to the public, who should forthwith be exterminated, leaving the Six to form a little Tooley-street Mutual Admiration Society, without fear of "foreign" or other rivalry.

In Mr. Bantock's case concert managers are especially open to censure. This gentleman, it appears, has written a musical version of Southey's poem, "The Curse of Kehama." A curse, as we know from the reports of the divorce and the police-courts, is attractive to all classes, from the highest to the lowest. Mr. Bantock describes his particular half-guinea curse as a "Symphonia," and has divided it into twenty-four parts. They are mostly for orchestra, but as we were all informed—for bloated prejudice prevented the audience last week from making acquaintance with more than a bare twenty-fourth of the entire work—in some of the movements the "vocal element" is utilised "where the text demands such interpretation." Only the overture to Mr. Bantock's "Symphonia," which, by the way, bears the cheerful title of "The Funeral," and depicts the cremation of a Rajah's son, was performed. Mr. Bantock, therefore, hardly seemed to have the courage of his opinions, and refrained from giving us the whole curse. But a simple thing like this in twenty-four parts—the bibulous among subscribers to the Royal Opera who are accustomed to refresh after every entr'acte might describe it as a Symphonia in twenty-four drinks—ought surely to be jumped at by concert managers, were they really actuated by Art rather than by vulgar financial considerations. The first movement, or part, occupied over a quarter of an hour, so that an easy arithmetical calculation will indicate that the complete work would occupy about six hours without entr'actes. And six hours with Mr. Granville Bantock must be an agreeable experience indeed.

Another composition partly represented in the programme last week is entitled "The Divine Surrender." It is by Mr. William Wallace, and the whole work is avowedly a "Mystery Play." As the "Rhapsody of the Virgin Mary" is supposed to be spoken without music, it is assumed that this affair is primarily intended for the stage, where it is well known the Lord Chamberlain's Licenser invariably welcomes Mystery Plays, and, in fact, everything upon Biblical topics. Mr. William Wallace, therefore, has as real a practical grievance against the managers as has his friend Mr. Bantock. He likewise is as shaky as to the courage of his opinions. The "Rhapsody" in question was the only excerpt from the "Mystery Play" performed at last week's concert, but, instead of being recited by "Mary Magdalene on receiving the news of the Resurrection," it was especially, and for this occasion only, set as a soprano solo of the French pattern. Another work given at this concert was the overture to Mr. Bantock's "Eugene Aram," which, as the programme says, is a four act opera based upon Lord Lytton's novel. There is so great a demand for four-act tragic operas by English composers, that no one will be astonished Mr. Bantock has devoted his valuable time to such a composition. Indeed, unless Lady de Grey and her friends be willing at once to accept this delectable effort, to be played as a trilogy with the curse aforesaid, and "The Rhapsody of the Virgin Mary," Covent Garden is a useless institution, and the Royal opera might shut up shop. Mr. Arthur Hinton, with an effective orchestral Fantasia, entitled "The Triumph of Cæsar," and Mr. Reginald Steggall, with a vocal scena, "Elaine," were less ambitious and more practical, so that they hardly deserved notice at all. Nevertheless, as they achieved the principal successes of the evening, it is obvious that, with an unenlighted Queen's Hall audience, real Art goes for nothing.

Both the Crystal Palace and Popular Concert season closed last Saturday. At Sydenham, a movement from one of Bach's Brandenburg concertos was given, with Mr. Fransella as flautist and Mr. Belinski as violinist and Miss Fanny Davies as pianist. At St. James's Hall, M. Fauré made his first appearance at the last Pop, and with M. Wolff played his early violin sonata in A, originally produced in London at one of M. Wolff's own concerts. Miss Beatrice Frost, a talented young soprano with a fine voice and manifold artistic gifts, has made a successful début at Steinway Hall. The Royal College and Royal Academy students have given their breaking-up concerts, in neither case producing any special novelty, and we have had a Wagner concert at Queen's Hall. Except as to the Christmas and Sunday concerts, music will now be suspended until after the New Year.

ART NOTES.

PERHAPS the most interesting feature of the Winter Exhibition of what is colloquially known as the "Old Water Colour Society" is Mr. Harry Quilter's preface to the Catalogue. Like all that is written by Mr. Whistler's once favourite enemy this preface has the unfailing Quilterian characteristics; and whilst nominally indited by way of a memorial of those members of the R. W. S. who have died during the year, is full of autobiographical remembrances and obiter dicta of the most refreshingly frank and outspoken kind. The Exhibition itself is not of a very stimulating or soul-satisfying description, and I certainly enjoyed Mr. Quilter's pen and ink work much more than the water-colours on the walls. There is enough of the natural man in most of us to make us enjoy the dashing way in which he once more rides a-tilt at the Royal Academy. But they are tolerably pachydermatous at Burlington House, and even if Mr. Quilter has pierced once more between the ill-fitting joints of their official armour, it is too much to hope that the Academic hide beneath has felt the point of his weapon. Assuredly, however, the non-election of the late Mr. A. W. Hunt, even to the minor honour of an Associateship, will be regarded by those who best knew his artistic qualifications as "a slight as ungenerous as it was undeserved." That Hunt himself felt it keenly and enduringly is certain, though, as Mr. Quilter truly says, the deceased artist was never in the habit of speaking bitterly on the subject.

It will come as a surprise to many to learn that the late Mr. George du Maurier was a member of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours up to the time of his death. Regular visitors to No. 5A, Pall Mall East, however, will remember him as an occasional contributor of water-colour drawings, though so far as their technique and general effect were concerned they were tinted black and white rather than actual colour work. On this point indeed Mr. Quilter makes what seems to me a by no means unluminous critical comparison. Du Maurier's novels, he writes, "stand in relation to literature in a very similar position to that in which his tinted drawings stood to water-colour painting." His tales are, he adds, tinted outlines rather than full-bodied flesh-and-blood stories—plus the introduction of various realistic details, carefully reproduced from early experience. Peter Ibbetson and Trilby are "such stuff as dreams are made of," and "their little life" will soon be "rounded with a sleep." Lord Leighton was also a member of the R.W.S., though he probably rarely, if ever, contributed a finished water-colour to its exhibitions. Of the works of the other deceased members, Messrs. George Fripp and E. K. Johnson, I may have something to say later on.

But by way of "cutting the cackle and getting to the 'osses"—if Mr. Harry Quilter will excuse the comparison—let me say unhesitatingly that it is Mr. Albert Goodwin to whom the chief artistic honours of the present exhibition unquestionably belong. This always interesting artist again shows his power of painting a picture not only so as to express the beauty of form, colour, or technique which he feels to be in it, but also of investing it with that symbolic or dramatic interest which he is able to find in its subject. He is not content, in fact, to interpret the literal facts of nature as though he were a photographer, but claims for the landscape painter the latitude that is allowed to the figure painter. More years ago than I care to remember, I saw a drawing by Mr. Goodwin at the Exhibition of the Old Water Colour Society, called, if I mistake not, "The Siren Sea." In this he made the bold new departure he has since persisted in so determinedly, and which he maintains so successfully in his present exhibits. All the drawings he shows are worthy of attention, but perhaps the most characteristic of them are the "Pompeii" (No. 220), the "Verona" (No. 300), and the "Portsmouth—'War's Alarms'" (No. 58), the last being a most masterly and suggestive example of the "Goodwinesque" method. The place of honour in the Show is occupied, somewhat unworthily in my opinion, by Professor Herkomer's almost brutally realistic portrait of the present Arch Druid of Wales. The likeness of "Hwfa Môn" may be a good one, but it is scarcely kind either to the Arch Druid or to Welsh Druidism to hang it on the walls of a public picture gallery.

THE SEVENTEENTH "TRUTH" TOY AND DOLL SHOW.

IT would have afforded me much pleasure to have personally conducted the attenuated Mr. Tackleton, toy merchant, and his wizened little dingy-faced, but good hearted foreman, Caleb Plummer, round the TRUTH Show last week. Very interesting would it have been to watch the growing amazement of this ill-assorted couple as they marked the strides which have taken place in toy manufacture since they carried on the business of Gruff & Tackleton in Cricket-on-the-Hearthton, Dickenshire. Wondrous, indeed, would they have found the result of the evolutionary process which has transformed the toy horse of the Tackleton period—a sort of spotted barrel, with straight walking sticks for legs, and a narrow strip of woolly door-mat for mane—into the well-bred, faultlessly-shaped, dapple-grey chargers which pawed the air in front of the organ at the Albert Hall a few days ago. They could not but have been struck, too (especially Caleb), by the contrast between the toy barking dogs, which the latter was so laudably anxious to get "as close to Natur' as he could for sixpence," and the wonderfully exact models of sheep and cows, and lions, which baa'd and moo'd and roared at the TRUTH Show in so realistic a way as to be wellnigh terrifying to the more unsophisticated juvenile visitors. Even in Noah's Arks, in which a tendency to cling to the conventional is still apparent, they would have discovered a marked improvement, rendering it much more possible than it used to be to distinguish Ham and Japhet from Mrs. Noah, and making the flies and the grasshoppers a little less disproportionate in scale to the giraffes and elephants than they were in our happy youth. They would have missed, too, the hideous, hairy, red-eyed Jacks-in-the-Box; the melancholy little ramshackle carts, which used to emit thin wiry sounds, supposed to be musical, as their wheels went round; the sets of clumsy, shapeless, wooden tea things; the crudely mechanical cobblers who monotonously hammered lapstones—à propos des bottes; the stiff, nondescript wooden soldiers with lucifer match-like muskets glued to their sides that were stuck on pegs all over a ridiculous sort of parade-ground of movable trellis work, which could be elongated and contracted at pleasure like a pair of lazy-tongs; and they would have found in their places an endless assortment of the latest developments and sensations of the toy market; toys on which inventors had expended their ingenuity and mechanicians their skill; toys glowing with bright colours, toys teeming with happy surprises; toys which it would never have entered into the mind of Tackleton even in his most inspired moments to suggest, or of Caleb Plummer to construct. But it would have been when they came to the array of dressed dolls that the pair would have been most surprised of all, and I can imagine the testy and taciturn Tackleton, as the glories of that centre stand at the Albert Hall burst upon his astonished gaze, wrapping himself more tightly within "the great green cape which was buttoned up to his chin and reached down to the calves of his legs," and making for the Kensington-road as fast as the feet in his "bull-headed looking boots with mahogany tops" could carry him. Caleb Plummer, however, I think, would have gladly lingered on to feast his work-worn eyes on the fascinating scene, so as to be able to take home with him to that "little cracked nutshell of a house" of his, where his blind daughter Bertha sat waiting for him, a full account of the fairyland he had visited—a fairyland so lovely and so glowing with light and colour that he would have had no need to import a word of his usual "make believe" into his exciting narrative to his child.

And indeed, by general consent it is admitted that the TRUTH Show, which Mr. Tackleton and Caleb Plummer did not see last week, was undoubtedly the very best of the long series that has now been held. Practice serves to make perfect as much at Toy Exhibitions as elsewhere; and experience teaches even the most deft arrangers of dolls and decorations; and there was undoubtedly good cause for the unbroken chorus of praise which has acclaimed the "Seventeenth" TRUTH Show on all sides. At last something closely approximating to perfection in the mode of displaying the thousands of dressed dolls has been attained. Never before have they more fully deserved close inspection, and never before has that close inspection been so possible as this year. At last week's Show none of the dolls were "skied," as they used to be in bygone seasons. All of them for the first time were virtually "upon the line." For the pyramids, which used to rise to such heroic heights in the centre of the arena, had been cut down to a very modest altitude; and the thousands of dolls which were at one time strung up aloft in serried rows as closely packed as sardines in a tin were last week most of them so arranged in tiers following the line of the huge ellipse of the Albert Hall, that each doll had, so to speak, elbow room and breathing space. It will be remembered that, until last year, it had been the rule to fill the space now occupied by the small dressed dolls with thousands of purchased toys massed in numbers which suggested the bodily transference of Lowther Arcade to Kensington Gore. The effect produced by this wholesale display of all the latest productions of Toyland was indubitably polychromatic and resplendent, but experience taught those concerned in the arrangement of the Show that it was purchased at too dear a price. To unpack the whole of the toys for exhibition, and then to repack them for distribution, involved an amount of damage which was positively distressing. Many of them needed to be sent to a hospital, not to amuse the juvenile inmates, but themselves to be treated for the ills which toys are heir to. So it was resolved to take a new departure, and only exhibit so many of the purchased toys as might serve for samples of the bulk. Hence the array of large boxes which this year and last formed a sort of rampart round the area devoted to the Show. Each of these boxes contained a gross of assorted toys packed ready for delivery at hospital or workhouse, and it may be added that this plan has worked so admirably that it will certainly be persevered in, especially as by means of it space is also found for exhibiting the thousands of dressed dolls in a manner more appropriate to their merits and their charms. Of the success of the Show as a public fixture most gratifying proof was found in the enormous number of visitors who crowded the Albert Hall on Wednesday and Thursday last. Attempts to secure anything like an exact return of the attendance were vainly made, but it is certain that the total of any former year was surpassed. The interest taken in the exhibits appeared to be more marked than ever, and to sit in the amphitheatre stalls and watch the delight of the thousands of children as they slowly passed round the crowded stands and tables was in itself a most enjoyable spectacle. But to linger amongst generalities involves a curtailment of those more particular details of the Show which it is my pleasant duty to write, and I will therefore summarily conclude my exordium, and get to the "firstly, secondly, and thirdly" part of what I fear will be my somewhat lengthy discourse.

And first, paying that sort of instinctive respect to magnitude which is so characteristic of human nature, let me talk about the Big Dolls which, to the number of a hundred, occupied most of the available space on the elevated table-land that filled the central part of the Albert Hall arena. Coming down the steps into that arena, the visitors' eyes were at once attracted by a big doll directly opposite the entrance, which appeared curiously familiar in colour and pose. And no wonder, for it had been Mrs. Bower's happy thought to dress her doll in the character of that "Gay Parisienne" who, since her appearance at the Duke of York's Theatre, has been seen on every London hoarding. There she was, reclining in her victoria in her yellow dress, with her yellow-rosetted black poodle at her side and her yellow sunshade coquettishly raked over her big matinée hat—a close copy of the lady on the poster we all of us know so well by sight. Immediately in front of her, as though by a cynical touch of the indefatigable ladies who form at the Albert Hall what is equivalent to the "Hanging Committee" at Burlington House, was a very different kind of scene—a sudden transition from our modern Babylon to an old world Arcadia. It was an odour of patchouli which Mrs. Bower contrived to bring over the footlights with her "Gay Parisienne;" it was the scent of the cowslip which Miss M. R. Collum brought to us with her fascinating milkmaid, whom she represents dropping her three-legged stool as she turns, demurely shy, to answer the "Where are you going to, my pretty maid?" of the young gallant who has followed her through the daisy-starred grass, and is shown in the act of stepping over the rustic stile which crosses her path. Last year, if I recollect aright, Miss Collum gave us another scene in this same idyll of the nursery, but nothing could be more charming than her this year's tableau. The milkmaid is in a blue bodice, fastened with pink laces, with "shepherd's clocks" in her rustic hat, and a tucked up quilted skirt of the orthodox Arcadian cut, whilst the young squire is evidently a town beau of the first water, brave in his coat of yellow brocade, and his white periwig, and patched and powdered "up to the very nines." Close at hand is another striking contrast, for at the squire's elbow stood, posed in an attitude which Mr. William Schwenck Gilbert might himself have stage-managed, Miss M. Taylor's "Pitti Sing," unquestionably one of the best dolls in the whole Show. For not only has Miss Taylor closely imitated in dress, in feature, in chevelure, the Pitti Sing of "The Mikado," but Lady Boston has painted the silken kimono the doll wears with Japanese birds and flowers in the most exquisitely delicate and tasteful manner. "Pitti Sing," I make bold to predict, will occupy a high place in the Prize List, which is to be published next week. On the other side of Miss Collum's Arcadian Group was Miss Dora Labouchere's "Mistress of the Hounds," a novel idea carried out with remarkable skill and success. Surely a more faultlessly attired sportswoman was never seen than this dashing, up-to-date Di Vernon, this modern edition of Lady Gay Spanker. From the tip of her velvet jockey cap to the toes of her patent leather top-boots no realistic detail had been overlooked. Very spirited, too, was this dashing young lady's pose as she stood in her dark Melton habit and orthodox "pink" coat, hunting-crop in hand and horn at her girdle, quite ready, it is evident, to shout "Tally Ho!" or "Gone Away!" or "Yoicks!" or whatever the absurd cry may be which a "Mistress of the Hounds" is expected to utter. Passing round the corner to the right we came almost at once to the Misses Warburg's spirited rendering of "Lohengrin," the hero of Wagner's well-known opera. It was an ambitious notion of these young ladies to choose a character presenting such obvious difficulties to the doll-dresser, but they overcame them with marked skill, and made their doll a really effective "Knight of the Swan," arrayed in a coat of silvery chain mail, with a widely-flowing cloak of silver tissue, a properly blazoned shield, a jewel-hilted sword and a light moustache of almost truculent up-curliness. It should be noted that Miss A. Warburg was the designer and maker of the graceful Swan which was exhibited at Lohengrin's feet, and the "practicable" body of which had been thoughtfully stuffed full of Christmas crackers. Special interest attached to the doll dressed by Miss Marie Corelli, for the authoress of "The Sorrows of Satan" had chosen for her model a character in one of the most successful of her own books—little "Jessamine Dale," the sexton's ill-starred daughter in "The Mighty Atom." In one hand this little Devonshire maid held a rosy-cheeked apple, and a card borne in her other showed us that she was supposed to be saying to her boy-lover, "You can have this apple if so be ye'll let me bite the red bit out." One may well hope that Miss Corelli has set an example which will be widely followed next year. I need scarcely insist on the great attraction which would be caused by a table devoted to dolls dressed entirely by authoresses of fiction to represent characters in their own novels. The doll dressed and exhibited by the Singer Manufacturing Company was remarkable for the fact that the elaborate church embroidery with which her robe was so lavishly adorned was not worked by hand but by a sewing machine; a new departure which can hardly fail to cheapen the price of the copes and other highly decorated vestments which High Church clergymen affect. This "Singer" doll, it may be well to state, coming as it did from what I may call a professional source, was not entered for competition with the dolls dressed by amateur effort which surrounded it. I have already mentioned two successful theatrical dolls. To Miss P. Selbourne belongs the credit for a third—a doll dressed after an evidently close study of the original to represent the perennially popular "Charley's Aunt." No point in Mr. Penley's quaint make-up had been missed; but his old lady was shown us in her black satin, her lace fichu, her mittens, and her cap, as she appeared so many hundreds of times at the Globe Theatre. More than this, Miss Selbourne represented her "Charley's Aunt" so raising the skirt of her dress as to show the tell-tale boots and trousers of "Babs" beneath. One could, in fact, fancy her exclaiming, with the true Penleyan inflection and emphasis, as she reveals these signs of sex, "How can I behave like a respectable old lady in these?" The popular "Geisha," at Daly's, furnished Mrs. Maslyn with her inspiration, for she exhibited a capital reproduction in miniature of Miss Marie Tempest as "O Mimosa San." Miss Pearson must be commended for having added a very effective new figure to the already comprehensive TRUTH Doll Gallery. Her "Première Communiante" was a most dainty and delightful representation of a French girl on her way to a "First Communion." The doll was dressed, of course, wholly in pure white, the costume being an exact copy of that which is de rigueur on such occasions, and she bore in one hand, sceptre-like, one of those long and elaborately moulded candles which are carried to the church, and in the other her "Petit Paroissien Romain." In close juxtaposition to this fair and spotless damsel was to be seen Miss A. Levitt's "Light of the Harem," a doll dressed with Oriental opulence and reclining gracefully on a divan—such a beauty, indeed, as Mr. Frank Dicksee has more than once painted.

There is every year a run on some particular character at the TRUTH Show. This Christmas there was quite an eruption of nurses of various kinds. Prominent amongst these I would mention "The Princess of Wales's" nurse, sent by Miss J. Lewis, a doll dressed in the well-known costume of the Nurses' Association, which Royalty has taken so specially under its patronage, and intended, no doubt, to represent the "Sister," whose badge was fastened on her not long since by the Princess at Marlborough House. Very interesting, also, was Mrs. R. H. Firth's "Netley Sister," in the serviceable red and blue uniform which is worn by the nurses who tend on Tommy Atkins when he is in the large military hospital on the banks of Southampton Water. A French bonne proved a prominent feature in a capital family group dressed by Mrs. Boyd, consisting of a mother and two children, the nurse aforesaid, and the baby she carried in her arms. Then there was Miss J. M. Johnson's "Sister Gertrude"; Mrs. Howard's nurse and baby; Mrs. S. Grant's sick-room nurse with her tablets and pincushion hanging from her girdle; and Miss Crowdy's "Florence Nightingale," bringing back to us memories of Scutari and Gallipoli, and the "ministering angel" who did so much to lighten the horror of those dark days in 1854-55. Miss Louie Pounds of the Prince's Theatre, Manchester, did not send a nurse, but she contributed a character akin to that useful profession in the shape of "Sulette," a French chambermaid, evidently studied from life, and with distinct success. A second large doll dressed by the same young lady was an admirable study of a flower-girl labelled "Sweet Violets," not an idealized flower-girl of the fancy-dress ball type, but the real downright rough London street version of the character, such as Mr. Rudyard Kipling told us about with almost needless frankness in his "Badalia Herodfoot."

"Amy Robsart," dressed by Mr. C. E. Birch, was a doll that naturally attracted exceptional attention, for it is not often that one of the sterner sex shows such facility in doll-dressing as this gentleman displayed. But Mr. Birch, it will be remembered, was an exhibitor last year also; then, as on the present occasion, his success was undoubted. No doll at the Albert Hall last week could boast of a more fashionable figure than Mr. Birch's "Amy," and, with the excellence of the needlework in her handsome and well-fitting costume, even feminine experts could find no fault. Mr. Birch, I understand, is, or has been, an officer in the Army; and, strange to say, another holder of her Majesty's commission was to be found in the ranks of the competitors this Christmas. This was Mr. C. N. Hunter, of the Gloucestershire Regiment, who dressed a very fascinating Witch in red and black. Very effective was the way in which the occult symbols of this lady's profession had been embroidered on her skirts. For the first time, one of the "Tuneful Nine" figured in a TRUTH Show, Miss Constance M. Spilsbury Halford having sent a large doll dressed in a gold-embroidered chiton of the orthodox Greek pattern to represent Euterpe, the Muse more especially connected with lyric poetry. In her hands she bore a classic lyre, and her pose, if somewhat defiant, was full of dash and go. But if I remember my "Lemprière" correctly, it is a flute which Euterpe is usually represented as carrying. Now Miss Halford has directed attention to a field not hitherto reaped in these doll-dressing competitions, perhaps we may see all nine of the Muses at some future Show, to say nothing of the three Graces, and a selection of Olympian goddesses. Another very original idea was admirably carried out by Mrs. J. C. Kennedy in her handsomely-dressed doll labelled "I am the Yellow Domino." This stylish and attractive young lady was, as her name implies, arrayed in an all-covering cloak of yellow, and in her hand had a bag filled with confetti and "spirals," so that she was quite ready to take part in the mimic carnivalesque conflicts on the Promenade des Anglais at Nice, or some other favourite English resort on the Riviera. She had her fan, too, and her black velvet mask at her girdle to be used in case of need. The recent death of the ex-President of the Royal Academy seems to have caused quite a recrudescence of "Millais" dolls this year. Thus there was a charming little damsel, dressed by Miss E. Grimes as "Cherry Ripe," and Miss Bertha Vyner sent a capital "Bubbles" to serve as a companion to her; whilst of other Millais models I shall have to speak when I come to the small dolls. Universal admiration was aroused by the doll dressed and exhibited by Miss L. Croft, and called "After Kate Greenaway," a dainty darling in white satin. I heard more than one opinion emphatically expressed after close examination of this young lady's beautifully-made garments, that there was no better dressed doll in the exhibition. By a curious coincidence, two ladies hit upon the same dresses for the dolls they exhibited. Both Mrs. F. Pritchard and Mrs. Rathborne sent a Swedish and Norwegian peasant, so that by comparing their handiwork it was easy to see how faithfully each had carried out the details of costumes which is now becoming as familiar to our touring fellow country men and women as those of the Italian peasant girl or the Hungarian gipsy. There was also a sturdy Black Forest peasant, dressed by Mrs. W. H. Leslie, in her gala attire of red and blue, crowned by a curious tall hat of the former colour. Dolls in which various well-known flowers are symbolised are always in evidence at TRUTH Shows; and this year, amongst the most successful efforts in this direction I specially noted Mrs. Webber's "Buttercups and Daisies," in which the floral idea was expressed with the most charming taste; Miss E. C. Whitlock's "Snowdrop," and Mrs. T. B. Davis's "Buttercups." Of the "Red Riding Hoods," of which specimens are never wanting at our exhibitions, those sent by Mrs. B. Hallé and Miss Marjorie Grimshaw were most to be commended; and it would be impossible to pass without some words of warm approval Nurse Lambert's "Bo-Peep," so delightful a young lady that it is hard to account for even the most unsusceptible sheep straying from so charming a shepherdess.

When was there a fancy dress ball or a TRUTH Show without a Toreador or a Pierrette? To the Albert Hall last week Miss May Streatfeild sent a handsome representative of the former, whilst Miss G. France and Mrs. Argenti contributed very chic and saucy specimens of the latter character. Mrs. Argenti also dressed a number of small dolls as "Pierrots" and "Pierrettes," as will be seen later on. Miss Isabelle Gregson's pair of dolls representing "Dresden China" merited and well repaid the closest attention. This young lady had managed to express very clearly the colours and peculiar crispness of the china figures she imitated so well. Another capital pair of large dolls came from Miss E. M. Gilmour, who gave two striking pictures of differing charms of urban and rural feminine types in her "Town Mouse" and "Country Mouse." Close to the latter was a most elegant "Duc de Montpensier," beautifully dressed in all the elaborate finery of the lace and ruffle period by Mrs. John Mitford; and furnishing a striking contrast, indeed, to the rosy-cheeked Audrey who had apparently caught his wandering eye, already surfeited, it may be supposed, by the more artificial charms of court-bred demoiselles. Unable to linger for more than a moment over the charms of Miss Crosby's "Sylvan Shepherdess," or to devote more than a passing glance to Miss M. E. Wells's "Sweet Royalist Maiden," and Miss M. Morgan's demurely pretty "Stuart Princess," I must hurry on past Mrs. Clare Brown's "Bride" and Miss Osborne's "Doris," in pink and white, to a very interesting doll dressed by Miss V. Wellesley to represent "Miss Bennett," from Miss Austen's "Pride and Prejudice," a novel of which we have lately had a new edition. Miss M. Jameson had not labelled her doll, but from the black velvet costume it wore, and the bone spoon stuck rakishly in its hat, it was intended, I gathered, to represent one of those Spanish students of whose romantic doings we hear from time to time. No one was likely to pass without notice Miss H. G. Morris's doll arrayed in a long white serge coat, apparently tailor-made, and carrying in a bag upon the arm a most elegant robe de nuit. Not far from this very stylish doll was "Somebody's Darling," dressed by a lady whose name I was unable to decipher; and a most elegant doll in a beautiful fancy-dress costume of the last century, contributed by Mrs. Bozzelli. The spry sailor-boy, dressed by Mrs. Howard's household, was all the more welcome, seeing that he was the only representative of her Majesty's Royal Navy that was to be found amongst the big dolls this year.

But already I find that the amount of space I am able to devote to this section of the Show is all but exhausted, though I have still pages of notes about many other dolls which attracted my attention. These were, as a rule, dolls not dressed in any particular character, but simply attired as little English girls in all kinds of pretty and effective toilettes, and just as much prized by their recipients, let me add, as the more elaborately arrayed specimens of dollhood around them. Such dolls, for example, as those dressed by Miss G. Stiehl, in pink and blue; by Miss N. Mossop, in white satin; and by Miss E. M. Bartlett and Miss C. M. Cunliffe, in fur-trimmed pelisses, are always in great request. Miss E. J. Johnson's "Ivor," and Mrs. R. C. Thompson's boy doll, in a white knickerbocker suit, are also sure of a warm reception amongst the little children to whose delight they will minister this Christmas. Of the rest, I can only spare space to mention Miss M. Pattison's doll, in a dark-blue and red fish-wife costume; Miss A. Randall's, in light blue, with a very handsome pink opera cloak trimmed with feathers; Miss L. D. Steward's, in red, with an over dress of muslin; Miss A. C. Brown's, in a beautifully worked blue-yoked smock; and Miss King's pretty "Kitty," in blue; and to include in terms of comprehensive approval, none the less sincere because necessarily brief, the darlings arrayed in all the prettiest colours of the day, and all the most delightful fashions of the period by Miss M. Arnott, the Misses Bedford, Mrs. Walsh, Miss M. M. Davis, Miss L. D. Stevenson, Mrs. A. Newell, Mrs. Boyd, Miss H. E. Thompson, Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Williams, Miss B. Ritta, Miss E. C. Bedford, Mrs. Benson, Miss L. Evans, Mrs. R. Lawson, Miss H. Morran, and Mrs. E. A. Dash.

So far as the Groups of Dolls are concerned, it may at once be said that the high average of former years was more than sustained at the recent Show. There was an air of freshness and originality about the ideas carried out which at once secured public approbation. A place of honour was very properly accorded to a group of fifty-two dolls dressed, as a printed card informed us, by "a Joint Stock Company, Unlimited: Managing Directors, Miss May Streatfeild and Miss Clare Streatfeild." These dolls, as the mention of their number will have suggested, represented, in a pretty idealised fashion, the four suits of a pack of playing cards. The Court cards were dressed in sumptuous costumes of red, white, and black velvet, and ermine, the ordinary cards being arranged, of course, in apparel less splendid but, at the same time, well fitted for the retainers of their Majesties of Hearts, and Clubs, and Spades, and Diamonds. Each doll also bore tabard-like upon its breast a large hand-painted card, on which the Misses Streatfeild, or some other member of their "unlimited company" had blazoned the denomination of each figure. It was a novel idea, also, to provide all the retainers with neatly-fitting "mortar-boards" by way of headgear, and the general effect of the fifty-two personified, or should I say dollified, cards drawn up in battle array was extremely pretty. Had there only been space enough, a game of "living whist," played with this dainty pack, would assuredly have been a most entertaining spectacle. Another group that I am bound to say interested me immensely was Miss Pearson's spirited representation of a cricket match between the Dingley Dell and All Muggleton Elevens. Miss Pearson is evidently well acquainted with all the mysteries of the game which she so cleverly illustrated, or must, at any rate, have had an efficient "coach," for there is no detail which she has overlooked. The way in which the field had been placed by her was in itself a triumph of accuracy; and in the pitching of the wickets, the position of the creases, the pose of the batsmen and the attitude of the bowlers, the greatest care had obviously been taken. In spite of the published announcement of the match as being one between two local clubs, it was clear from the scoring-book, which was being kept with scrupulous care by a dapper little doll in a well-constructed scorers' box, that the elevens were practically "scratch" ones. The All Muggletonians, who were batting, included such well-known cricketers as M. Read and Brown, and, according to the "telegraph" exhibited in front of the scoring-box, had made 253 for seven wickets, in spite of the fact that two such redoubtable bowlers as Richardson and Jones were sending down "curly ones" and making (vide the score-book aforesaid) a most excellent analysis. The umpire, in his orthodox long white coat, had apparently just answered an appeal from the wicket-keeper in favour of the batsman, who, after this let off, seemed to be preparing to send one of Jones's "bumping" balls over the head of the Cambridge "blue" who was fielding "out in the country." A most interesting group, I repeat, and reflecting great credit on Miss Pearson's patience and ingenuity. It is a long cry from the cricket-ground at Dingley Dell to the Field of Cloth of Gold; but at the TRUTH Doll Show a few paces took one from Miss Pearson's cricket-match to Miss M. R. Collum's brilliant historical group representing the famous meeting of Henry VIII. and Francis I. A splendid background for this carefully-studied scene was furnished by a large tent covered with gold tissue and lined with rich silk hangings blazoned with the fleur-de-lis of France. Bluff King Hal was seen attended by three typical English Beefeaters, arrayed in costumes evidently studied with scrupulous care. Miss Collum, in fact, seems to have taken great pains to make the costumes worn by her dolls in all respects accurate. Thus Cardinal Wolsey, who was in Henry's train, was dressed, I understand, according to a pictorial authority to be found at Hampton Court Palace, whilst the French Men-at-Arms were as historically correct in their attire as the English Beefeaters. The figures were effectively grouped, too, and Miss Collum is to be congratulated on a most interesting and well-thought-out historical tableau. Miss Teresina Hadaway's group may be considered historical also, though it referred to an event not yet six months old. It represented, in fact, the meeting of the Grand Old Men of England and China at Hawarden in August last. For some years now Miss Hadaway has contributed a group to the TRUTH Doll Shows, and it has always added that touch of humour, unconscious it may be, which but for her the Exhibition would lack. In her latest group she has been at considerable trouble in modelling the faces of Mr. Gladstone and Li Hung Chang. The Chinaman is excellent, though I notice he lacks that Peacock Feather which, during his stay with us, was such a notable item of his personal adornment. Possibly, however, Miss Hadaway has been reading the TRUTH Christmas Number. Other dolls in the group, which was arranged round a rustic table in the grounds at Hawarden Castle, were Mr. Gladstone, the Rev. Harry and Mrs. Drew, and the irrepressible little Miss Dorothy, book in hand. Li Hung Chang was seen attended by his interpreter and another follower, not improbably the faithful Wun Lung, his indefatigable private secretary. Altogether, I am inclined to consider this amusing scene the best Miss Hadaway has ever sent to a TRUTH Show, and the interest it aroused amongst the visitors who crowded round it was unmistakable. The Misses Warburg, to whose picturesque and dashing "Lohengrin" I have already alluded, may claim credit for another very ingenious notion carried out with really wonderful skill and success. It occurred to them to form a group of dolls dressed after the children in nine of the late Sir John Millais's well-known pictures. They accordingly selected as their models the figures to be found in the following paintings, viz.:—"The Little Princes in the Tower of London," "Cherry Ripe," "Cinderella," "Little Mrs. Gamp," "Bubbles," "Little Miss Muffet," "The Convalescent," "The Minuet," and "Her First Sermon." The most lifelike of all the dolls, in my opinion, was the one which represented the little girl in the red cloak who figures in the last-named picture. The very expression of the child's face had been caught with great felicity. All these Millais dolls, however, were admirably dressed for the parts they were supposed to fill, and could have been readily identified even if they had borne no labels. "A Bridal Party" is always looked for amongst the doll groups, and this year Mrs. C. M. Sagar-Musgrave contributed a very prettily-posed and dressed representation of that old, old ceremony which never loses its charm as a public spectacle. A fiercely-moustached bridegroom was seen in Mrs. Musgrave's group escorting a dainty bride, attended by four ducks of bridesmaids with forget-me-not bouquets. Of course, too, we had yet another group representing the Four Seasons, the dolls having been, in this instance, dressed with marked good taste and ingenuity by "Juno." It will have been noticed that I have not yet said anything about the groups contributed by Mrs. H. P. Truefitt and the Misses B. and F. Glave. I propose, however, to devote special paragraphs further on in this article to these ladies' dolls, which are, so to speak, hors concours at the TRUTH Shows by reason of their oft-repeated successes in successive past years.

But before dealing with their exceptionally clever handiwork I wish to say something about those very kind friends of TRUTH and the poor children of London who dressed what I may call wholesale quantities of small dolls for this year's Show. Let me first say that I always approach this portion of my descriptive article with diffidence and apprehension, for I feel only too strongly that anything I can write in praise of the ladies who most distinguish themselves in the above respect must necessarily be at best most defective and inadequate. To describe the principal points of a large doll dressed with unexceptional taste and skill is comparatively an easy and simple task, but when it is dolls literally by the hundred that have to be dealt with, it is impossible in the space of a paragraph or two to do any but the very scantest justice to the excellences they display, and to the rare combination of qualities that has been exhibited by the ladies who send them. Take, for example, the two ladies Mrs. C. Alexander and Mrs. Rawson, each of whom dressed 300 dolls for the recent Show and distribution. I doubt if many of my readers even faintly realise what the performance of such a task as this involves. Those, however, who were at the Albert Hall last week, and who saw for themselves the 600 dolls to which I refer, and noted the space they occupied, must have formed some opinion of the wellnigh interminable labour which had brought about such remarkable results. For, as will have been seen, the dressing of these dolls was no mere scamped or perfunctory operation. Many were the exclamations of admiration and surprise which were called forth by Mrs. Alexander's dolls, which were arranged in tiers around that part of the ellipse to the left of visitors as they entered the arena. For not only had her 300 dolls been dressed, and well dressed, they had been dressed also in the most fashionable of colours, in the very latest of modes. In gowns of the very newest tints—prawn pink, cowslip yellow, apple green, oyster grey, and a dozen others—in hats and bonnets of a truly bewildering variety of shape and trimming, they formed a feast of colour which did not cloy, and a most interesting object-lesson in the eclecticism of current fashions. To examine them was in itself, indeed, a liberal education in the mysteries of millinery and dressmaking. Miss Jenny Wren, the doll's dressmaker, might have found here enough hints to carry her triumphantly through the season. I have not missed one of the TRUTH Shows since their commencement, and I can emphatically say that Mrs. C. Alexander has this year surpassed all previous efforts, and established a record for all-round taste and diversity and elegance which it will be supremely difficult to beat. To Mrs. Alexander's dolls succeeded an equal number dressed by Mrs. Rawson, a lady who has now for many years contributed not a little to making successive TRUTH Shows a success. Her 300 dolls were not dressed quite so fashionably as Mrs. Alexander's, but they were eminently fitted for the purpose they have to serve. Mrs. Rawson's motto had obviously been "Thorough." Each of her dolls, I happen to know, was clothed in five distinct garments, all of which, as 300 little girls now know to their great delight, "take on and off." There is, perhaps, nothing which so pleases a girl who becomes the happy possessor of a doll, as taking its clothes off, unless, indeed, it be the operation of putting them on again. A simple calculation shows that no less than 1,500 garments had to be cut out and made before Mrs. Rawson's task was completed. No wonder, then, that she had been at work preparing for the Show since last March. Mrs. Arlosh, another lady who has repeatedly dressed a large number of dolls for TRUTH'S Christmas distribution, this year sent 204. This numerous contingent served to cover the sides of the south-west pyramid, on which they made a most effective show. For each dozen dolls had been dressed in some distinctive colour and fashion, and their arrangement in lines had a striking chromatic effect. No less than 200 dolls were dressed by Mrs. B. Lindo, whose name has become quite familiar to me, so often have I met with it whilst making my annual scrutiny. Mrs. Lindo also has this year surpassed all her former achievements. A special feature of her dolls was the seasonable way in which they had been provided with fur tippets. They looked, thus clad, ready to go anywhere, and to brave the most inclement days of the Arctic winter with which we are threatened. Mrs. Picciotto, a new recruit, as it were, in the army of TRUTH volunteers, has at once taken a place in the foremost rank by dressing two hundred dolls in a very admirable manner. The hours she devoted to her task must have been many; but they are, after all, but infinitesimal compared to the number of hours of delight that her dolls will afford to their new little mistresses. Of the Misses Levitt's excellent work I have already taken occasion to speak; but "The Light of the Harem" was by no means their only contribution to the Show. They also dressed two hundred small dolls, which occupied at the Albert Hall Exhibition a very prominent position on the North-West Pyramid. Amongst these dolls was a contingent of pantomime fairies in gauzy skirts. I also noticed amongst them some capital sailor boys, and a row of baby dolls—always very acceptable, I may state. The Misses Levitt adopted a plan which, I am pleased to think, is likely to become much more general. They held an exhibition of their dolls in their own drawing-room before sending them to the Albert Hall. By the issue of "At Home" cards, with "TRUTH dolls" in the corner, instead of the usual "music," hostesses might agreeably vary their social programme, and would at once please and amuse their friends and make the Show more widely known The hundred dolls dressed by Mrs. Trengrouse, another name well known in TRUTH Show annals, looked warm enough in their seasonable winter attire to start at once if necessary upon a Polar expedition. Miss Richardson's hundred were dressed in garments more suggestive of the sunshine of summer. Remarkable, indeed, was the ingenuity which this latter lady displayed in the matter of straw hats. To vary a previous simile, let me say that Mrs. Hamp Adams made a début on the Albert Hall stage which at once set upon her efforts the seal of undoubted success. In other words, in dressing her hundred dolls she showed an ingenuity, and taste and skill which at once secured favourable attention. The "Wedding Party" could not, unfortunately, be accommodated with sufficient space to enable a public display to be made of its many excellences, but they were marked, I may add, by those who were, so to speak, behind the scenes. Mrs. Hamp Adams's eleven doll cricketers, too, made a brave display. Her soldiers, nurses, acolytes, and nursery-rhyme heroines were also excellent; and I was especially struck with the ingenuity she had shown in designing a most comical "Humpty Dumpty."

Miss L. Rowland-Brown and her friends and neighbours dressed seventy-nine dolls, to which exceptional interest attached from the fact that before coming to the Albert Hall they had been exhibited with great success at a local doll show at Harrow Weald. Encouraged by the success attending on a similar effort last year, Miss Brown, in order to stimulate local interest in the TRUTH doll-dressing, offered prizes for the best dolls dressed in her own neighbourhood. The result was most satisfactory, and I commend Miss Rowland-Brown's excellent idea to others. Amongst the seventy-nine dolls first exhibited at Oxhey Grove and then sent to the Albert Hall was at least one doll which possessed a unique interest. It was dressed as a widow, by Mrs. Brough, a lady who is now in her ninety-fourth year; and who, therefore, may I think, fairly claim to be the doyenne amongst TRUTH'S doll-dressers. Another doll, dressed as a Vaudois peasant, which attracted my special attention was, I found, the contribution of Mme. Blondel, the wife of the well-known Swiss poet. Other notable dolls in the group were an admirable "Gentleman of France," a Javanese Waiting-maid, a bewitching "Daisy Dimple," a capital Squaw (Queen of the Yahoo Indians) and a curious paper doll sent from the Hague. All the servants in the household, I am informed, lent their aid in the doll-dressing, and one very remarkable result of this was to be seen in a smart butcher-boy included amongst the Oxhey Hall dolls, the unaided work of the coachman.

To Miss Pearson's group of cricketers reference has been made on a previous page. She also dressed fifty dolls as very varied characters, including jockeys, "Tommy Atkinses," and beautiful blushing brides. The name of the Misses Beynon has become as "familiar as a household word" at the TRUTH Doll Shows, but they have not yet grown weary in well doing. This year they dressed sixty dolls with their usual completeness and good taste. A similar number, which made a brave show on the North-East Pyramid, were sent by Mrs. M. Sacre. No visitor could fail to be attracted by Miss Coutts Fowlie's fifty sailor boys, for each of them carried in his hand a flag of a gay pattern. The effect of the "fifty flags waving like one" was very striking, and Miss Coutts Fowlie, a valued contributor to former shows, must be congratulated on a distinctly "happy thought." Mrs. Bayes sent, amongst her fifty dolls, a strong contingent of fisher girls, who formed suitable partners for Miss Fowlie's smart sailor lads. A row of dolls, dressed by Mrs. Bayes, in white jackets and red waistcoats, struck a very bright and effective colour note. Mrs. T. B. Davis, Mrs. Sayer, and Miss A. E. Smith, each dressed fifty dolls in a most useful and serviceable way, and if I do not say more about them it is not because there is nothing to be said, but because it is impossible in the course of this already too prolonged article to do more than allude to points of special novelty or exceptional interest. The sumptuous way in which Miss Argenti attired her Pierrots and Pierrettes, secured them a well-deserved place in the front row of the Show. They were, in fact, Liliputian copies of the large Pierrot and Pierrette which were exhibited on the central stand. Following the excellent example set by herself last year Miss K. B. Reid has provided each of her dolls with a name and affixed to each dress a card containing a few lines of explanatory verse, which Miss Reid seems able to compose almost with as much facility as she displays in dressing dolls. Mrs. Benson's dolls (in swansdown-trimmed bonnets), Miss Ashton's, Miss Bingham's, Mrs. S. L. Nathan's, Mrs. Usmar's (in low-cut bodices) were all worthy of special commendation. I was amused to notice that the twenty-four dolls dressed by the boys of the training ship Mercury were every one of them dressed as a girl; and dressed remarkably neatly and nicely, too! Mrs. Sichel's thirty dolls all arrayed in simple white dresses afforded a grateful relief to eyes sated with brilliancy and cloyed with colour. Like the undecorated British diplomat amongst the be-starred, be-crossed, and be-ribboned representatives of the other Great Powers at the Vienna Congress, these dolls in white assumed quite a distingué air in the midst of the polychromatic crowd that hemmed them in. Equally striking, from a somewhat similar cause, were the twelve "Hallelujah Lasses," contributed by Mrs. Spencer Grant. A novel idea was prettily carried out by Miss Bosdet in dressing the dolls to represent England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, and Switzerland. To Miss L. Lewis belongs the distinction of having contributed the only little Lord Fauntleroy I noticed in the Show. Three years ago there were at least fifty. Miss Lewis's "Geisha" doll was capital. I have to note the fact that a third military officer is to be added to the two mentioned earlier in this article as doll-dressers. Colonel Goreham, R.A., contributed a dear little "Woman in White." Other dolls that struck me amongst the thousands I looked at were Miss Saunders' cleverly devised "Union Jack" dolls, their costumes so arranged as to suggest unmistakably our national flag; Miss Spencer Evans's "Nursery Rhyme" heroines; Mrs. Jardine's almost alarming "Bogey" doll; Mrs. A. P. Palmer's "Skirt Dancers"; Miss Atkinson's Scotch Laddies; Miss Seeman's gipsy girls and nuns; Miss V. Wellesley's "Two Little Girls in Blue" and Red Riding Hood; Miss Wrigley's "Folly" and Duchess of Devonshire; Miss C. Morgan's "Bubbles"; and Miss Nellie Morgan's "Phyllis," who has by this time doubtless become some one's "only joy." I also find I have entered on my notes for some feature or other of special merit, the names of Miss L. Tosh, Miss A. Roberts, Miss Lomax, Miss Greaves, Miss M. Robinson, Miss E. Bartlett, Miss Greames, Mrs. A. Hope, Miss D. Westmoreland, Miss Mary Hawkes, Miss E. Sanson, Miss Baldwin, Miss M. Tankard, Mrs. Maris, Miss L. M. Young, Mrs. Phillips, and Miss M. Gibbs.

It was, I think, some four or five years ago that I announced, in writing of Mrs. H. P. Truefitt's dolls, that I had exhausted the whole of the available commendatory adjectives. And yet, since that time, that lady has gone on achieving greater triumphs season after season, and it has been my pleasant though arduous duty to chronicle them as best I have been able. Mrs. Truefitt might excusably have sat down years ago and lamented, like Alexander, that there were no more worlds, in a doll-dressing sense, for her to conquer. But she has, luckily for the TRUTH Shows, preferred to persevere, and has gone on beating her own unique record till we find her this year attaining to what surely is her apogee. There is indeed ample reason for devoting a separate paragraph to her dolls, for otherwise, references to them would have permeated this article; for in all classes into which the Exhibition is divided, her dolls excel. With her big dolls, her little dolls, her groups of dolls, she is alike to the front. Of course they were set out in the position which by right of conquest she has made her own. Just as there are certain portions of wall space reserved at the Royal Academy year after year for the most successful and popular of the Academicians, so at each successive TRUTH Show there is a well-defined and never-encroached-on space which has come to be known as "Truefittia." In this realm of fancy and fantasy, this doll Arcadia, where every colour is dainty and delicate, where every Strephon is handsome and every Chloe beautiful, where every conceit is graceful and every prospect sweet, they fleet it gaily as in the "Golden Age." "Truefittia" is a land where it is always afternoon; where Prince Charming is for ever wooing the fair Florizel, and lovely Celias and Delias gather roses and lilies while they may. It is one of the Happy Islands in the Purple Sea, where, from very joy of living, bewitching damsels skip with ropes twined with forget-me-nots, and the "whole duty of man"—and of woman, too—is to look pretty, dance to the music of pipe and tabor, and sing madrigals and chansonnettes to the accompaniment of ever-plashing fountains. And how, it may be asked—to come to specific details—was "Truefittia" inhabited this year? But how prosaic it seems, after all, to give a mere catalogue of the dolls. Who would think of dissecting a butterfly or analysing the contents of a soufflé? Yet for the sake of those who have never paid a visit to "Truefittia," it may be necessary to mention some of its inhabitants: to tell of the sweet medley of princes and flower-girls; of beaux and milkmaids; of dashing blades and village belles, that it contained. Perhaps the dolls most admired were the two so-called "Little Vagabonds," the Cinderella, the Skipping Girl, the Witch, decked with the silver cobwebs she had swept from the sky; the "Belle of Niagara," in the smartest and yet cosiest of winter costumes, and balanced on the tinest of silver skates; the Vivandière, the King of Charming Land, the irresistible "Masher" in the red dress-coat, and the bevy of bewitching domestics — the daintiest of parlourmaids, the darlingest of nurses, the delightfullest of cooks! Towering above their little neighbours were Mrs. Truefitt's two large dolls, one dressed as "Summer Roses," and the other as "Winter Snow;" the one a dream of loveliness in rose-pink, the other a kind of crystallised symphony in white. In accordance with her graceful annual custom, Mrs. Truefitt also designed a group which served as a collecting box for the TRUTH Toy Fund. This year it took the form of a glorified coster's cart decorated most tastefully with roses and forget-me-nots and drawn by an idealised Arcadian donkey. On a banner carried by one of the attendant nymphs were the words, "TRUTH Toy Fund—Come, show your Charity, Lads and Lasses!" I am glad to be able to add that this irresistible appeal was liberally responded to, and that a considerable sum was thus collected.

Over against "Truefittia," and separated from it by a lofty tableland, there lay another province of the Empire of Lilliput, the well-known Kingdom of Glave-land. Here the Misses B. and F. Glave held uncontested rule last week, and once more charmed the public with the brilliancy of the annual carnival which is carried on under their genial auspices. High revel and fantastic fun were the order of the day in Glave-land. In the centre one saw a group of rustic merrymakers escorting their "Queen of the May" in triumphal procession and footing it blithely on the village green. Close at hand one's eyes fell upon another group of merry dolls masquerading, like the gay cards they were, as "A Good Nap Hand." A step or two farther on and one came on "Skirt Dancers," gyrating to the music of an "Up-to-date" Nigger, whilst lovely ladies in masks and dominoes were watching the antics of a pair of grotesque Clowns. There was Father Christmas, too, laden with toys; and numerous other interesting whimsical typical figures. The general effect was at once striking and phantasmagorical. It was a sort of "Alice in Wonderland" scene, and the Misses Glave, who have already achieved such exceptional success at the TRUTH Doll Shows, managed this year to more than sustain the reputation they have so deservedly earned.

The Home-made Toys were not, perhaps, so numerous as usual this Christmas; but the quality of those exhibited was certainly above the average. I doubt, indeed, if a more strikingly effective model than Mr. Rawson-Buckley's "Church of Saint Verity" has ever been seen at a TRUTH Show. He had constructed, with what must have been infinite pains and very marked skill, an edifice nearly 6 ft. long, and of proportionate width and height. The architectural style seemed a combination of Early English and pointed Gothic, and no detail had been overloooked or forgotten. Stained glass windows, a groined roof, niched statues, hanging lamps, altar vases, a surpliced choir, a tesselated pavement, a carved reredos, an organ, a peal of bells, a "practicable" clock in the west tower, a vestry, a verger—all these had been duly provided. The church was also furnished with a fashionable congregation, for a wedding—the very appropriate wedding of Truth and Charity—was in progress; the point having been reached when the officiating clergy advance to meet the bridal party. To open the great west door and look down the long, lofty nave right away to the noble east window was to obtain a vista of really wonderful impressiveness. I was not surprised, in fact, to find that Mr. Rawson-Buckley is an actor by profession (he is a member of Mr. Ben Greet's "Sign of the Cross" company), for his staging of his church interior, if I may so term it, showed an evident sense of dramatic fitness and effect. How thoroughly, too, the details of his model were carried out, may be gathered from the circumstance that he had provided each of the towers of "St. Verity" with a winding turret staircase. This was conscientiousness indeed—conscientiousness well nigh worthy of that other member of Mr. Rawson-Buckley's profession, who was in the habit of blacking himself all over when he played Othello.

There was but one Doll's House in this year's Show, but this had been very ingeniously constructed by Miss Nora Rogers out of three wine cases. The straw cases of the bottles which these cases had once contained had been cleverly used to thatch the house, which stood in extensive grounds, and seemed to be furnished in a most lavish style—curtains, carpets, lamps, paperhangings, and other fittings being all quite "up to date."

Miss Daisy Peet is a young lady who has several times contributed model toys, but never has she sent so good a one as her this year's effort. It would seem that this young lady spent her last holidays at Lowestoft, and whilst there saw a demonstration in aid of the local lifeboat, which took the form of a public procession. The main features of this procession Miss Peet had reproduced in her model, with really creditable ingenuity and success. Every item of the demonstration found its place in her spirited exhibit, which was a yard or two long, and included several bands of music, carts full of fishermen and smack owners, a car of most realistically attired widows and orphans, the Mayoress's silver cradle, a boat builder's forge, a diver in full diving dress, and a capital model of the Lowestoft lifeboat itself, manned with its crew, and drawn by four horses. Let me congratulate Miss Daisy Peet on an indisputable success! Some years ago, it may be remembered, Mrs. Rawson, also known as "Yoko," contributed no less than a thousand scrap-books to the TRUTH Show. This year she concentrated her energies on one brobdingnagian scrap book, containing no less than 2,600 coloured scraps, and mounted on an easel which was as big as a lectern. This is the same Mrs. Rawson, I may say, who dressed the 300 dolls, and Mr. Rawson-Buckley, architect and builder of the Church of St. Verity, is her brother. She also contributed a group of native Persian dolls, dressed some in indoor and some in outdoor costumes. Miss Marguerite Stokes this year lavished her patience and skill on a model which represented a sort of glorified "Fuller's." It must have taxed her patience and skill to the utmost to stock this "up-to-date" confectioner's with its endless varieties of cakes, and sweets, and fancy rolls, and to dress the numerous tiny dolls who sat at the little round tables drinking tea or eating ices, or playing the parts of waitresses in the "snappiest" of dresses. One fair customer, I noticed, had arrived on her bicycle, whilst another centnry-end grande dame appeared to be calling for a second glass of what looked suspiciously like green chartreuse. Another model toy which attracted appreciative attention was Mr. Percy B.

Blamey's castellated fort, garrisoned by a strong force of leaden artillerymen and Highlanders. On top of each corner tower was a quick firing gun, whilst the parapet was held by a selected body of sharp-shooters. This is a model, the sight of which will, I am certain, tend to make scores of poor London boys well nigh wild with delight. I feel sure that Miss Olivia Graham has a keen sense of humour. Her mimic stage, set for a scene from the pantomime of "The Genie and the Skipper's Child," was a most amusing model, brightened with many happy and comical touches. The Genie himself was a most amusing personage; and the funny Parrot roosting on the tree with the flying fish; the shipwrecked "Miss Priscilla Tabitha," and the demon coming up the Vampire trap; with such melodramatic "properties" as the sack labelled "Human Remains," helped to make up a very mirthful scene. A very strong and æsthetic wooden cradle, designed and made by Miss A. Crichton Stuart, with prettily-worked bedclothes and a doll occupant, was much admired; and the tiny suites of dolls' furniture made by Mrs. Deman and Miss E. Manby Gardner were well worthy of close examination. A pathetic interest attached to "Our Nigger Band," an ingeniously designed group of "darkies" playing various instruments, also home-made, for it was the unaided work of Sarah Magrath, a poor girl who has for the last fourteen years been an inmate of the cripples' ward of St. John's Convalescent Home for Children at Kemp Town, Brighton. There is surely something very touching in this crippled girl devoting her time and energies to making a toy to amuse children perhaps even in sadder circumstances than herself. I said just now there was only one dolls' house in the Show, but I I was forgetting Miss E. B. Cheetham's pretty little rustic cottage with its neatly laid-out garden and well-stocked paddock and outbuildings. Visitors to the Show at the Albert Hall can scarcely have failed to notice a Cleopatra-needle-like erection to the right of the organ. This was covered with Christmas stockings, to the number of two hundred, all of them made and filled with sweets, crackers, oranges, nuts, and small toys of all kinds, by Mrs. Neville Campbell, the kind lady who last year contributed such a well-covered Christmas tree. Worsted balls and toys, such as were made and sent by Mrs. E. Drax and Miss Appolina F. Robinson, are always most eagerly welcomed in the wards of the Children's Hospitals. Amongst the home-dressed Dolls, other than those sent out to be dressed from Truth Office, a large baby doll, beautifully dressed by Miss Gladys Best, was the most important. Miss Ina Bengough also contributed a large doll in white satin; and Mrs. W. Howard White's Cupid doll; Mrs. Dewar's group of tiny dolls dressed in the acme of fashion; and the quaint Bogey dolls cut out of black paper by the Sisters K., were also much admired. There were two exceedingly quaint dolls also, sent by Mr. Harold Hamel Smith, residing at Port of Spain, Trinidad. These dolls were made of leather by the natives of Martinique, and were elaborately dressed to represent a Martiniquienne and a Dominican. Every detail in their costumes was made with the utmost care, and repaid the closest examination. I mentioned in a previous column that one doll in the show was dressed by a widow lady of ninety-four. Amongst the presented dolls was one sent from South Africa by Miss Malby Irvine, aged nine! This little lady has done so well this time that I hope she will be encouraged to try, try, try again! I also noticed that Mrs. Pogson had sent her usual welcome annual contribution of twenty-five dolls, each provided with a bag of sweets containing a new silver sixpence.

I have to close my article with a few lines which might well be stereotyped for use on these annual occasions. That errors, some of description and some of nomenclature, have crept into the foregoing columns is inevitable. Probably, too, there must be faults of omission as well as of commission, and what I want especially to say is how glad the editor of Truth will be to correct any mistakes which may be brought to his attention. Will any ladies, therefore, who have to complain of any errors or omissions of mine, please write to the editor forthwith. I am asked to state, also, that, in all probability, the Prize List and the List of Truth Brooches awarded will be published next week. The report has not yet been received from the Committee of Ladies who so kindly fill the onerous positions of judges, but it will doubtless arrive in time to be printed in the next number of Truth. Meantime, let me, on behalf of the proprietor of Truth, and the many thousands of poor children he at this season represents, express sincere and hearty thanks to all who have contributed in any way to make the Seventeenth Truth Toy and Doll Show the most successful of the series. To those who have given their time or their money, or both; to the ladies who worked so hard and with such excellent taste and judgment to arrange the dolls for exhibition; to Mr. Wentworth Cole and his colleagues who so generously granted the gratuitous use of the Albert Hall; to Mr. H. C. Tonking, who gave organ recitals at frequent intervals during the Show, playing, amongst other effective pieces, his own Grand Festival March of "Illogan," we are alike grateful; and I hope I may be allowed in conclusion to wish the brightest and happiest of Christmases to all those who have assisted to make this holiday season bright and happy for very nearly thirty thousand poor girls and boys in this vast metropolis of London.

Below is a complete list of the ladies who dressed Truth dolls and of the number of large and small dolls dressed by them:—

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I can't remember what the population of London is. Can you? But, whatever it may be, I feel certain that the whole of it turns out into the streets on these afternoons in search of presents. You never saw anything like it. The pavements are black with human beings, most of them hung round with children, and the roadways are filled with steaming horses, loaded vans, crowded omnibuses, and every variety of carriage and cab.

And what do you think is the supreme attraction for most of the wayfarers? You would never guess. The butchers' shops, my dear! Therein are displayed the Cattle Show carcases of the bovine sacrifices to our carnivorous habits. I don't mind the sight of joints, custom having hardened me to that aspect of things, nor am I disagreeably affected by a "side" of beef, if that is the right term for half the animal; but I must admit that the spectacle of the head, with horns and skin complete, afflicts me with much compunction, and almost persuades me to be a vegetarian for the rest of my life.

Can you imagine what attraction there can be in looking at the Christmas beef in this tragic state? In one shop there was a live bullock displayed, surrounded by the joints of his brotherhood. Surely instinct must have made the creature aware of this, and consequently uncomfortable.

I was amused to see one butcher's shop quite specially illuminated as for a gala occasion, and with a placard displayed on which the words "Royal Beef" appeared. Surely this was slightly ambiguous.

We have been saving up our money for the last two months for Redfern's sale, which begins on Monday week and continues for ten days. They sell off all their original models of the past season in gowns, coats, mantles, wraps, and millinery, and their remnants of cloth and other dress materials are always remarkably cheap. Bee got one last year for half-a-guinea, a dress length measuring nine yards double width, and had it converted into one of the prettiest coat and skirt suits that she has ever had. She and Clare are looking forward to the occasion in order to provide themselves with spring coats, and I am going on the prowl for a sumptuous evening mantle, for which Richard is going to pay. Besides, there are always little things, blouses, waistcoats, vests, collarettes, short, smart capes, and so on, which are to be picked up at this sale for a mere nothing, and yet make considerable effect in the costume. It is not surprising that women come up from the country on purpose to be in good time and get the first choice; nor is it very astonishing that when two of them are equally attracted by any of the bargains, there is a lively collision of opinion as to which sighted it first, and consequently, has the highest claim to become the possessor.

The Hon. Mrs. Henniker was "At Home" last Tuesday at her brother's town house, 23, Hill-street, to the members of the Society of Women Journalists and their friends. The hostess looked very girlish and charming in a simple gown of grey silk, the bodice covered with a white fichu and caught in at the waist with a pink sash. She industriously introduced the celebrities to each other, and to outsiders who were anxious to make their acquaintance. Bret Harte was present, but to Bee's intense disappointment, and indeed to my own, had left just as we got there. Mrs. Maxwell, not yet flown south like the swallows, was among the guests, accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Edmund Selous; and I shall never forget the ecstatic delight of a couple of American ladies when they discovered that this popular authoress (Miss Braddon, of course, you know, dear) was there to be looked at, so that they would be able to carry accounts of personal propinquity with her home to the great Continent where her books have been and are so intensely appreciated. These two ladies, by the way, were extremely anxious to know the names of all the celebrated people present, and tackled Bee and me on the subject. Unfortunately, we were almost as ignorant as they, so could not afford them much assistance. However, we managed to indicate Mr. Le Gallienne, Miss Violet Hunt, Miss Clo Graves, Miss Jean Middlemass, Mr. David Murray, A.R.A. (wearing a tie of a soft but glowing sunset pink), Mr. Oswald Crawfurd, Mr. Hamilton Aïdé, Miss Shaw, of the Times, Madame Novikoff, Lady Dorothy Nevill and her daughter, Mr. Herbert Schmalz, and a few others. I suppose it would be impossible to arrange that celebrated people should bear a label expressive of their identity. It might be antagonistic to the modesty of genius, which is to be regretted, for the sake of the curious multitude which enjoys nothing better than to gaze upon celebrities and compare their appearance with the mental picture that every one of us unconsciously forms in our own minds.

Some day, perhaps, there may be an invention whereby these silhouettes may be photographed from the inner consciousness of those who originate them. How curious it would be to compare the fanciful sketch, in portraits, of different minds of one and the same subject! Would even any two have points of resemblance?

The large rooms of Lord Crewe's town house were filled with well-known people, and the hum of conversation was undisturbed by music. This is the high ideal of enjoyment when so many people meet who are interesting to each other. The interchange of ideas is in itself so delightful that the goddess of harmony becomes unappreciated and has to take a back seat, to use a bit of slang, while human nature pursues the genial task of divining others and allowing itself to be divined. La Rochefoucauld, it is true, declared that there was no pleasure in this, but then, you know, dear, he was a sad cynic, and my experience of people is very much pleasanter than his could have been. The more I know of fresh acquaintances, as a rule, the more likeable I find them, and even at first, if shyness or cold manner makes them appear slightly repellent, a closer intimacy almost always reveals some charm that lies half-hidden beneath the surface.

We went on Thursday afternoon to see the Truth Toy Show at the Albert Hall and found the huge arena crowded with visitors. The dolls were extremely well displayed this year, none of them being "skied," but all well within the line of sight. The large dolls were, as usual, the great attraction of the show. Truth has really done wonders in raising the standard of dressed dolls all over the world. Year by year greater perfection has been attained in this agreeable art by the ladies who compete with each other in this particular for the Truth Toy Show. Beautiful material, glittering trimmings, and the very best of needlework combine to produce an effect which is enhanced by the taste and completeness of the miniature toilettes. I am strongly tempted to describe to you in detail some of the exquisitely-dressed dolls and beautiful toys that we saw; but I refrain, for I know that you are sure to read the full account of the Show which will appear in Truth.

One of the large rooms in Queen's Hall was rendered festive in appearance on Thursday and Friday in last week by Mrs. A. B. Marshall's fourth annual cookery exhibition, ball, supper, and wedding-breakfast display. The last named was, of course, the principal item. The very long table was laid with plates, knives and forks, and wine-glasses, and was beautifully decorated with yellow flowers. The dishes, thirty-six in number, were all prepared at the Mortimer-street school of cookery on the two preceding days. The menu is too extensive to be reproduced here, but I may endeavour to describe to you one or two dishes that particularly took my fancy. A liberally large "pâté de foie à la française," the pastry covering of which was cut out in the shape of little rounded leaves, was baked in a series of tints exactly like the plumage of the partridge, was rather appropriate to a pie composed of game livers. A "crême de homard à la norvégienne" was one of the prettiest dishes I have ever seen, the chief tint being a soft, bright orange. It was scattered over with pearls, their silvery glimmer making a pretty effect against the more pronounced colour. I have no doubt they were eatable pearls. One of the most ornamental dishes consisted of "petites corbeilles de nougat à la Dürer," but it is almost invidious to select any for special praise. One or two dishes sent by Monsieur Marquis, the well-known French chef, whose pressed beef galantines and raised pies à la Périgord you appreciate so much, supplemented Mrs. A. B. Marshall's thirty-six, so that you may imagine how bounteous was the provision under which this supper-table groaned, to use the time-honoured expression. One of his was a boar's head, compounded of various gastronomical delights; another was a truffled turkey, a huge and tempting bird, whose price was marked two guineas. I notice that his list contains this season eightpenny bottles of truffles, so convenient for small families, as well as fresh truffles and goose livers. He also supplies stuffed and truffled turkey by the pound, another very accommodating arrangement.

At a different table were displayed the dishes sent in for competition by candidates for Mrs. Marshall's prizes, consisting, respectively, of gold medal and three guineas, silver medal and two guineas, bronze medal and one guinea. These made a brave show, but I must not venture on any detail lest I should never bring this letter to an end. Messrs. Liebig offered a set of prizes, on the same scale as Mrs. A. B. Marshall's, for the best dishes containing their extract of meat; a soup, an entrée, and a jelly, or any kind of preparation dressed with a sauce in which the extract was utilised. This elicited a most interesting collection of competitive compositions.

Fifteen hundred people visited the exhibition during the first day, enjoying the strains of the band and evidently deeply absorbed in the details of culinary philosophy.

Westminster Town Hall was alive with merry youngsters on Friday afternoon, when the fifth annual sale in connection with the Children's Salon was held there. Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar opened the proceedings at half-past two. "Levana," the fairy godmother of the Salon, made one of her terse and telling speeches, advising parents to habituate their children to the practice of helping those not so happily furnished with this world's goods. Mr. J. S. Wood followed with a lucid explanation of the aims and objects of this good-hearted little society, which has already established in perpetuity two cots in London hospitals—rather a brave record for young folks under seventeen years of age, is it not? The proceeds of last week's sale are to be applied to the emergency fund for providing dinners for hungry Board School children during the winter. The stalls, draped with white, were lavishly supplied with articles ornamented with needlework, and sold at the very moderate prices which distinguish this sale so agreeably, and which induce many of us to purchase our smaller Christmas boxes there. In the afternoon there was an entertainment provided by professional children, who give their services for the charity.

Do you not think the common methods of teaching languages in schools are, as a rule, shockingly bad? I have always thought so because I cannot bring myself to believe that it is through mere natural stupidity that so many who are taught learn so little. The other day I had an interesting chat on the subject with Mlle. Duriaux of the School of Modern Languages, 10, Portman-street. Mlle. Duriaux told me all about the "Gouin" method of instruction in French which is practised there, and which she is willing to explain to teachers who would like to adopt it. Of course, I cannot speak of its practical results, but in theory it seemed to me to possess many advantages—indeed, I feel certain that I should have obtained a sounder knowledge of French with a good deal less labour if I had learned by this system.

First to arrive among my Christmas presents was a handsome case filled with my favourite Vinolia preparations. Have you had one? It makes a very pretty and acceptable gift.

Rumours to the contrary notwithstanding, the National Skating Palace in Argyll-street looked flourishing enough when I was there a few days ago, and there seemed no danger, as some had whispered there was, of this attractive resort being closed. I went particularly to see Miss Mabel Davidson, who claims the proud distinction of being "champion lady skater of the world." Not without good reason do her fellow Americans call her the Queen of the Ice. Her performances exhibit really wonderful grace and skill.

Ursula sends me the following letter:—

Dearest Madge,—Although you have the blest privilege of being a dweller in town, you probably know something of the mental torpor which comes over a country district at the approach of winter, when for days together one is confronted with the alternative of moping over the fire with an elderly novel or wading along slushy country roads in the teeth of driving hail or rain, to come home so plastered with mud from head to foot that your nearest and dearest refuse to recognise you. Drives and afternoon teas are things of the past, the hunt ball is still in the dim future, and in the meantime one seems cut off from human society. Into this state of social somnolence we were rapidly sinking, when our whole neighbourhood was wakened up by the prospect of a visit from the Duke and Duchess of York, and during this week they have been the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Portland at Welbeck Abbey. Their Royal Highnesses arrived on Monday evening, and received a hearty welcome from "Woodland Worksop," which was very prettily illuminated in honour of the occasion. In spite of the weather being damp and cold, the Royal visitors drove through in an open carriage; and afterwards, instead of entering Welbeck by the imposing new entrance gates, they proceeded by way of the famous long tunnels, and passed under the lake to the Abbey, where a house party were already assembled.

On Tuesday the weather was glorious, and there was a very successful shoot for the masculine members of the party, while the ladies drove; but, alas! on Wednesday, a thick fog hung like a pall over the country, and after driving to the famous Clipstone preserves, and waiting there for an hour, the sportsmen were compelled to return home. Yesterday was more favourable, and after a good day among the pheasants a largely-attended ball was given at night in the underground picture-gallery, which is said to be the largest and most magnificent private room in England. Gottlieb's band was stationed on a platform screened in palms and foliage, and the upper part of the hall was arranged as a comfortable sitting-out lounge, plus the welcome addition of a buffet. The Duke and Duchess received their guests, she wearing white satin, the bodice embroidered in silver and enriched with huge outstanding epaulets, a pale blue sash tied at the side, diamond and sapphire tiara, necklace, &c. None of the house party was there when we arrived, but after a time they entered to "God Save the Queen," the Duchess of York, of course, leading the way with the Duke of Portland, while her Royal consort escorted his hostess; then followed the other guests, two and two, and without loss of time they formed a quadrille, which was the centre of attraction for the time being. The scene all through the evening was really a most brilliant one; many men had discarded the regulation black and white in favour of their pink coats, and various well-known hunts were represented, while the display of handsome dresses on the part of the weaker sex was exceptional, and diamond tiaras were as plentiful as roses in June. I need not say that the supper was an artistic triumph, and will now proceed to tell you something of the frocks. To begin, as needs must, with the Duchess of York. She wore light mauve satin, the skirt edged with a full ruche of what looked like mousseline de soie—the pointed bodice edged with crystal jewelled trimming, and the sleeves of the mousseline. With this she wore a magnificent tiara and necklace of diamonds. In attendance was Lady Eva Dugdale in yellow satin, trimmed with white chiffon and jewelled net, with which costume, as well as in most of the other instances, please include mentally diamond tiara, necklace, and brooches galore, adding, occasionally, strings and ropes of pearl. There was much anxiety to see the Duchess of Marlborough, who is a wonderfully tall, thin damsel, with a piquant face and expressive eyes. She wore white satin, with a pattern of thin silver lines running through it, and the bodice was lightly trimmed with lace, which was partly kept in place by the most enormous diamond crescent I ever saw in my life—it stretched right from one side across to the other, while her pearls were also beautiful. The Duchess of Manchester was in black satin embroidered in silver, and the Duchess of Devonshire was also in mourning, and wore her famous "fender" tiara. The Duchess of St. Albans was in grey moire trimmed with white chiffon, touches of dark velvet and clusters of pink roses; and the Duchess of Newcastle looked her best in red glacé silk, with chiffon sleeves to match, and folded red silk belt fastened with a large diamond buckle. The Marchioness of Lansdowne, who came with the party from Clumber, wore striped silk with an Indian embroidered front, and the Countess of Coventry appeared in heliotrope. Lady Sarah Wilson was another guest from Clumber, and her gown was specially noticeable—a shimmery salmon-pink tulle over pink satin, rucked satin body of a deeper shade, and trails of purply-pink convolvulus, while the sortie du bal she donned in the cloak-room was a most covetable possession in apricot silk and lovely lace with a high collar of ermine. Lady Dudley looked sweet and more youthful than ever in pale green satin, with jewelled net on the corsage, and a pearl tiara; and Lady Raincliffe (daughter-in-law of Lord Londesborough) had a lovely gown of white tulle, dotted closely with green jewels, over white satin, folds of green satin on the bodice, and splendid diamonds and emeralds. Lady Granby's toilettes are always something out of the common, and she did not disappoint this time, her dress (black net over grey) being adorned with broad straps of dark jewelled trimming which hung from the folded grey belt. The sleeves were of white chiffon, and a broad strap of diamonds ran round the top of the corsage crossing the shoulders. Lady Mary Pierrepont's fair beauty accorded well with her white net over lilac silk. Lady Maude Rolleston was in white satin striped with silver and blue belt; Lady Clanwilliam also in white satin with pearl trimming; Lady Bertha Fitzmaurice in white; Lady Dorothy Coventry in pink. Amongst the noticeable gowns worn of the general company were a pale green satin trimmed with pink roses; a black net, embroidered in silver and trimmed with knots of white roses; a grey brocade, worn with a lace fichu by a white-haired lady; a white silk, with bolero of pale blue and silver fringes; a heliotrope brocade, with chiffon bodice and velvet belt; a creamy satin, trimmed with knots of violets; another white satin, exquisitely hand-painted with wreaths of Virginia creeper and a knot of these leaves in the hair; a green brocade, with chiffon bodice; and an ivory satin, with pearl embroidered and pink velvet. A handsome gown was grey brocade, the bodice embroidered in silver and jewelled trimming with bands of sable fur, and another successful gown was pale green satin with trails of tiny pink roses round the top of the corsage and a knot in the hair-jewelled belt. Touches of red velvet brightened a white silk, and a black was prettily trimmed with guipure; a gown of rich black satin looked well with folds of sequin-spangled net, and a word of commendation must be given to a débutantes gown of white tulle over satin, with lines of lilies of the valley alternating on the skirt with flounces of the tulle. Now I think I have treated you very well, in view of the over-

Here are some nice recipes. You will like this Green Goose :—

Cut the meat from the breast of a cold goose into slices. Divide two or three lambs' sweetbreads (which have been parboiled in gravy) in halves. Place alternately on a buttered dish a slice of goose and one of sweetbread, until the whole is used. Dust over them spiced bread crumbs, and squeeze the juice from two oranges on to the dish. Place dice-shaped pieces of butter on the top. Cover with a second plate and set in a hot oven until nearly cooked. Properly poach as many new-laid eggs as required, trim each, and arrange them quickly on the slices of goose and sweetbread. Garnish with fried parsley, which should be quite green when cooked.

Try Turkey and truffles thus :—

Choose a fine young turkey, ready dressed as for roasting. Chop about ½ lb. of mushrooms which have been skinned and stalked; add to these 2 oz. of scraped bacon, a tablespoonful of minced parsley, one chopped shallot, and the leaves from a sprig of sweet basil. Take the liver (removing the gall), blanch and mince. Mix these ingredients all together with a little butter, season with pepper and salt, and with this fill the craw of the bird. Scald the turkey in any boiling fat; so that it may be blanched and plump. Secure the neck safely, and truss the bird. Cover it with slices of bacon, and roast it before a brisk fire. Cut a ¼ lb. of truffles into star-shaped pieces, which have been boiled; then throw them into as much gravy as required, and let them simmer in a stewpan for a quarter of an hour. Thicken with a tablespoonful of ham cullis. See that this sauce is of a good flavour. Send to table in a hot tureen.

Here is the recipe for a delicious and economical dish of mincemeat fritters :—

Have ready a mince, prepared from 2 lb. of stoned raisins, 2 lb. of currants, 1 lb. of sultanas, 10 lb. of apples, ¾ lb. of sugar, 2 lb. of suet, the chopped rind of a lemon, the juice of two, a ¼ lb. of mixed spice, 1 gill of brandy, 2 oz. of citron, and 2 oz. of candied lemon-peel. Mix ½ lb. of mincemeat with 2 oz. of finely grated bread crumbs, 2 well-beaten eggs, and the strained juice of half a lemon. Stir well together, and drop a sufficient quantity of the mixture into a pan of very pure lard or fresh butter. Fry for seven or eight minutes; when the fritters become a delicate brown, dry them upon a napkin, sprinkle them lightly with lemon-juice and castor sugar, roll neatly, and send to table hot.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

It is not in the torrid zones of the Equator or in the depressing darkness and cold of the North Pole that debility and mental depression make their largest number of victims. It is in our large cities where the worry of business, the overpressure of daily life, and the thousand-and-one sources of excitement combine to undermine the nervous system, reduce the energetic, active man to a fretful invalid, paralysing the imagination of the man of letters and putting a term to the steady application of the man of science. Fortunately, the remedy is to be found close to the evil, for in the Mariani Wine the overwrought victim of nervous exhaustion has a certain agreeable and reliable means of reconstituting and reinvigorating his vitality.

THE CHILDREN OF THE HOUR.

A PAPER FOR THE FEW.

This paper will be published shortly. It will consist of copyright articles and comments by the most distinguished authors of the day. It will be beautifully printed on hand-made paper, and only 1,000 copies of each issue will be printed, of which a certain number will be reserved as press copies and for binding. The remainder are now offered for subscription; they are being rapidly taken up, and immediate application is necessary in order to secure copies.

The Globe says: "The little paper for which we have in this column so often appealed has at last come. There is at this moment being issued in London a little eight-page morning messenger which, twice a week, drops upon the breakfast tables of those privileged to receive it. It is extremely small, it is written with the utmost care, and it is concerned less with affairs than with culture."

CHAPMAN & HALL'S

LATEST 6/- NOVELS.

A STRANGE SOLUTION.

By Winifred Graham.

The Gentlewoman says:—"The story is introduced in a manner which is truly unique. A woman . . . whose husband lies dead in a room above, dines at an hotel with the man she is to marry the following morning. The story is made the more forcible from the absolute simplicity with which it is told. It is distinctly a problem novel, though not of the grosser kind. The book is unique and distinctly interesting throughout."

THE WAY OF MARRIAGE.

By Violet Hunt.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"A more merciless unveiling of the petty intrigues, and the poor little shifts to which maidens must descend in these unmarrying days, to secure for themselves a desirable establishment, it is scarcely possible to conceive. . . . There is no denying the insight into average feminine motives and the power of satire which characterises these brilliant sketches of feminine types."

THE CAREER OF CANDIDA.

By George Paston.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"One of the most robust and refreshing stories of the fast waning year. It tackles more than one thorny social problem with admirable courage, and challenges Mrs. Grundy to mortal encounter, but there is not the least verbal offence in it, not even to the most priggish of novel readers."

WHERE THAMES IS WIDE.

By Charles James.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"An excellent comedy this, both amusing and well written. . . . A charming story and entertaining, a quality we find in so few works ostensibly written to amuse."

THE DRAGON SLAYER.

By Roger Peacock.

The St. James's says:—"We do not remember to have read so engrossing and exciting a story as 'The Dragon Slayer.' . . . Well written in a vigorous and lucid style."

LONDON FEVER HOSPITAL, Liverpool-road, Islington, N. Patron, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. President, the Right Hon. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.—For the reception of persons suffering from Infectious Fevers. A fee is charged, but about three-fourths of the cost of each patient is borne by the Hospital. 80,000 sufferers have been treated here since 1802, 800 during the present year. Donors of £10. 10s. or more in one sum are Governors for life. Subscribers of a guinea or upwards for more than a year are Governors as long as they maintain their subscription. Domestic Servants of Governors and certain Employees of subscribing Firms, Clubs, and Hotels are treated free of charge. In time of pressure sufferers cannot be received from places situated outside the metropolitan area except from the households of Governors. The Hospital is in urgent need of additional help, which will be gratefully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital.

W. CHRISTIE (Major), Secretary.

WHY WINTER'S WANT calls for WINTER'S WORK on the part of

ST. GILES' CHRISTIAN MISSION.

Because for 36 years past the Sickly and Destitute, the Hungry and Helpless, have, in large numbers, sought and received our aid.

Because to so many of the Deserving Poor Winter and Want come hand in hand.

Unrelieved their sufferings are piteous! We seek to distribute Food, Firing, Blankets, and Clothing. Your Financial Support earnestly solicited!!

Treasurer, F. A. BEVAN, Esq., 54, Lombard-street, E.C.

The properties to be acquired by this Company consist of Three Gold Mines, with over 4,000 feet of Development Work, Surface Equipments costing upwards of £100,000, and 17,000 acres of Land.

THE Consolidated Gold Fields of Mexico, LIMITED.

CAPITAL £300,000, in 300,000 Shares of One Pound Each, 100,000 of which will be held in reserve to meet the conversion of the Issue of £100,000 Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock, which is now offered for Subscription.

The Debenture Stock will be secured by a first charge to the Trustees for the Debenture Stockholders upon the real property, now to be acquired by the Company, and on all the personal property of the Company (except uncalled or unpaid capital) susceptible of charge according to the Law of Mexico, without recourse to a Chattel Mortgage or other recorded instrument hindering the business of the Company. This Debenture Stock will be redeemable at the option of the Company at any time after 1900, on six months' notice, at the price of £110 per cent. When the instalments have been duly paid, and at any time before notice of redemption has been given the Debenture Stock will be convertible, at the option of the holder, on three months' notice, into Ordinary Shares of the Company at par, in amounts of not less than £5. Interest on the Debenture Stock will be payable half-yearly on the 1st January and 1st July, the first payment to be made on the 1st July next, and to be calculated from the respective dates of the payments of the instalments.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed, inter alia, for the purpose of acquiring the equipped and developed Mines known as the Santa Elena, Santa Elena East Extension, and Phœnix, together with (approximately) 17,000 acres of land, about 1,000 acres of which is tillable land, the remainder being timber land, situate in the Arizpe District, State of Sonora, Mexico.

Without going into the question of the value of this large tract of country, containing upwards of 25 square miles, it will be found by the reports that the actual mines which are opened up can be brought to a producing stage within a very short space of time, and for this reason, and also because there are large and tangible assets, consisting of—Buildings.

Machinery and Plant, including 60 stamp quartz mill.
Water System.
Machine Shop.
Foundry.
Stores, Wood, Tools, &c., &c.

the cost of which exceeded £100,000, it has been deemed advisible to issue convertible Debenture Stock, the holders of which, whilst having the option of securing all the privileges of ordinary Shareholders when the mines will be in their producing stage, have the benefit of holding a first charge on the real property and all other assets of the Company (except uncalled Capital) susceptible of charge without recourse to a chattel mortgage, or other recorded instrument hindering the business of the Company.

It is expected that the Mine will be in full working order and earning dividends within six months from transfer of the property.

The further substantial asset of the Company is the amount of ore in sight, of which the exact measurement is given by Mr. Nicholson in his report as 30,278 tons blocked out, of a gross value of £105,000, besides a large quantity of ore which will be available with a small amount of work, but which, not being blocked out on all sides, cannot correctly be termed as in sight.

The properties have been reported on by the following eminent Mining Engineers, viz.:—Mr. A. F. Wuensch (March 1st, 1895), Mr. J. W. Moyle (July 10th, 1896), Mr. G. D. Roberts (July 25th, 1896), and Mr. Frank Nicholson, E.M.M.S., M.A.I.M.E. (September 28th, 1896). Mr. Nicholson was specially instructed to report by the Vendor Syndicate, which guarantees the subscription of £70,000 of the Debenture Stock now offered.

The Santa Elena vein, which traverses the properties, has been traced for a distance of over one mile, its outcrop being in many places from 50 to 100 feet in width. This outcrop was worked by the Mexicans for a distance of upwards of 300 feet in length, and a depth of from 60 to 100 feet, with a width of from 40 to 70 feet, and yielded an amount of gold and silver estimated at from Three to Five millions of dollars. The mine was subsequently developed at three different points by shafts connecting with two levels on the West and five levels on the East; also by two tunnels on the hanging wall, and by a new vertical shaft sunk outside the vein to cut the vein at a depth of 600 feet. This shaft has been sunk to a depth of 430 feet, and at 250 feet a level has been driven into the vein.

Practical tests of the ore have been made, which demonstrate that the Cyanide treatment extracts 96 per cent. of the gold contents. Before commencing active milling operations, it is intended to put in amalgamating plates and a Cyanide Plant, which, with other necessary requirements, will involve an expenditure of about £14,000. It is estimated that about 3,600 tons of ore per month can then be treated at a cost of 6s. per ton, with a saving of 80 per cent. of the value of the ore. The estimated cost of mining, with other expenses, is 8s. per ton.

Ore on the 250 feet level (the lowest level in the Mine) gave a value of 2·68 oz. gold, and 21·72 oz. silver per ton. On the San Juan level east, a value of £2 9s. per ton, and above the San Juan level a value of £4 18s. per ton. Samples taken from a width of from 7 to 55 feet across the vein, from different sections of the mine, gave an average value of £2 gold and 12·79 oz. silver per ton. The mine has not been developed with a view of exposing potentialities, and there is at present "in sight" only a very small proportion of the ore that is evidently available. Summarising the ore now opened up and ready for extraction as stated by Mr. Nicholson in his detailed report (viz., 30,278 tons), the average value per ton is £3 10s. The Engineers refer to the results of 47 bulk samples taken from all parts of the Mine.

Mr. Roberts states that he has made five examinations of the property, and that the vein is the largest gold-bearing quartz vein he has ever seen; that the outcrop indicates it to be from 100 to 200 feet in width, and perhaps in places much wider. The character and continuity of the vein, both on the surface and in the lower workings, give every reason to expect the rich ore to continue to a great depth.

"In regard to future developments," he says, "I would recommend that the present vertical shaft, now 430 feet deep, should be continued to the vein, which it will cut at a depth of 600 feet; also to continue the cross-cut from the shaft which has touched the vein on the 430 feet level. This cross-cut should be continued to the footwall. I would also recommend to continue both main drifts from the 250 feet level; the faces of both drifts are now in very rich ore."

Mr. Wuensch says: "The possibilities of the Santa Elena vein impress me most favourably. The fissure occupied by the vein is deep-seated, as evidenced by its great length and width, and the source of its quartz, viz., the dyke, will continue downward with it in depth, and will disclose values as great as anywhere along its present line."

Mr. Moyle, in his exhaustive report, states: "I believe the St. Elena property can, within one year, be made one of the largest gold and silver producers in the world. The fissure is wide and deep seated, the formation is favourable for large and continuous ore bodies. The length and width of the payable ore, on and near the surface, is almost phenomenal. All things considered one cannot examine the property without being impressed by its immensity, and become a firm believer in its future as a large and permanent producer."

Mr. Nicholson, who is so well-known as a Mining Engineer of the highest repute, has, with the assistance of his own staff, examined the property, and reports that he is extremely well pleased with the mine, and considers its prospective value immense. It is a true fissure vein of great size; the croppings are unusually strong. Its course is east and west, and its dip about 65° to the south. Mr. Nicholson states that he can fully confirm Mr. Moyle's report in all essential particulars.

Arrangements have been made with Mr. Nicholson to act as General Manager of the Company in Mexico for a period of two years, and at the expiration of this period, to act as Consulting Engineer for a further period of two years.

The large possessions of land to be acquired by this Company are well-timbered, and the Sonora River insures an abundance of water throughout the year.

With the present 60 stamps working 3,600 tons of ore per month of a value of £3. 10s. per ton (which is the average value of the vein, as shown in the Engineer's Reports), at a cost of 14s. per ton, with a recovery of 80 per cent. of its value, there would result a net profit of £90,720 per annum. But assuming the recovery to be only 75 per cent., the net profit resulting would be £83,160, sufficient to return a dividend of over 27½ per cent. on 300,000 Ordinary Shares, which will be the amount of Share Capital if the Debenture Stockholders exercise their option of conversion.

When the mine is in a more advanced state of development it is intended to increase the stamping power to 120 stamps, which can be done at no great cost, as the present boiler and engine power will be sufficient. The profits should then show a large increase over the above figures.

The Directors desire to call the special attention of subscribers to the form of Debenture Stock issued, which, at the option of the holder, is convertible into Ordinary Shares of the Company.

The purchase price of the entire property, with mines, machinery and plant, has been fixed by the vendors, the S.E. Syndicate, Limited, which promotes this Company, at £250,000, payable as to £32,500 in cash, £47,500 in cash or Debentures, and £170,000 in fully-paid shares. £20,000 Debenture Stock and £30,000 Ordinary Shares are appropriated to provide working capital.

The statements in this Prospectus are based on the before-mentioned Reports, which, together with the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and the draft Trust Deed for securing the Debenture Stock, can be seen at the Offices of the Company's Solicitors.

Applications should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount of the deposit.

If the whole amount applied for be not allotted, the surplus paid on deposit will be appropriated towards payment of the sum due on allotment. Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full.

Prospectus and Form of Application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and from the Bankers, Solicitors or Brokers.

Nearly 5,000 Rescued Waifs!

Where? In Dr. Barnardo's Homes, with their 86 distinct houses and 24 Mission branches.

Why were they Admitted?

Because they were Destitute; without any other condition, either as to age, sex, creed, birthplace, nationality, physical condition, or money payment or guarantee. The doors are always open to receive such by day or night.

How are they Trained?

The Boys are carefully taught in fourteen different handicrafts; the Girls are brought up in cottage life to domestic service. About 1,900 also are boarded out in rural districts.

What Becomes of Them?

About 1,500 are placed out every year in various positions in the United Kingdom, or sent to sea, and 700 others are, after training, emigrated to Canada and the Colonies, where already 8,731 have been put to situations with farmers, or on the large industrial farm belonging to the Institutions.

How do they Succeed in After Life?

Splendidly! Over 98 per cent. of the 8,731 emigrants, for instance, have turned out satisfactorily.

How Many Destitute or Orphan Children are Admitted Weekly?

From 40 to 60. Every 24 hours about eight souls are added to Dr. Barnardo's great family.

How are they Maintained?

Solely by the free-will offerings of Christ's servants throughout the world.

What is the Religious Atmosphere of the Homes?

Protestant, Evangelical, and Christian, but not Sectarian. In their support all Evangelical Christians may and do join hands.

INTERPRETING THE REBUSES, NOS. 1 TO 32, TO BE FOUND BELOW.

All solutions must reach me by the morning of Monday, January 4, 1897.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of JINGLE, winner of Prize No. 929, is Holcombe Ingleby, Esq., Heacham Hall, Norfolk.

 I have to express my regret that, by a clerical error of mine, the name of TOUCAN was published last week instead of that of JINGLE, as winner of Prize No. 929. The name of JINGLE was published as that of the Prize winner the week before, and I meant, of course, to have reprinted it the following week.

 The real name and the address of EBORACUM, winner of Prize No. 928, is G. W. de C. Baldwin, Esq., Diocesan College, York.

WAYNFLETE.—I gave the word "syringe" for the very reason that it was doubtful whether any rhyme could be found for it. To have asked competitors to find rhymes for a word for which rhymes are known to exist would not have served as a test of the ingenuity I wished to incite.

ORIGINAL SONGS SUITABLE TO BE SET TO MUSIC.

MY BANJO.

Some months ago, at a Waxworks Show, I sang a comic song;
I scrambled through the music, too, but I played it very wrong.
So, when the Show was ended, my friends all told me flat
That the author never intended such an exhibition as that.
"Why don't you get a banjo, and on it try to play?
"That song would suit a banjo," so all the people say.
"A banjo is so simple, you'd learn it in a day;
Then you'd amuse the people that now you drive away."

This kind advice, it seemed so nice, I thought that I would try,
So off I hopped to a banjo shop, a banjo for to buy;
The man was very civil, and smiled and bowed his head
And talked a deal of drivel, and this is what he said:
"Now, here's a very fine banjo, sir, a banjo you could play—
A beautiful five-stringed banjo, sir—banjos are cheap to-day—
A banjo you'd be proud of, no matter where you stay,
And yet so inexpensive, it's almost given away."

With care and thought at last I bought a banjo in its case,
With lots of strings and frets and things all stretched across its face;
But though, with fingers aching, I've played from morn till night,
The strings are always breaking ere I can get them tight.
And now I've got this banjo my hair is turning grey;
I'm sick and tired of banjos—yes, more than I can say;
And if any one wants a banjo, and thinks that he can play,
Then let him have my banjo, and take it right away.

SLEEPING AND WAKING.

Sleep, baby, sleep!
The purple curtains of the night are spread,
The fair white stars are watching overhead;
Through the closed casement, in the stilly hours,
There comes no wooing fragrance from the flowers;
And all the merry birds are hushed to rest,
Since baby lies within her own warm nest.
Sleep, baby, sleep!

Wake, baby, wake!
The sun is shining through the window bars,
And mother's eyes are brighter than the stars;
Out in the garden nod the roses tall,
And mother's kiss is sweeter than them all;
The birds are trilling in the boughs above,
And mother waits to sing her song of love.
Wake, baby, wake!

W. Wynn.

THE DEVON LYNN.

When dreamy August has called to pleasure,
And restful holiday hours begin,
There's not a scene in the world of leisure
Like the woodland ways by the Devon Lynn.
And far and wide in the world of wooing,
Where eyes are dewy and lips are sweet,
There's not a maid for a man's undoing
Like the maid I met at the Waters' meet.

There are Scottish bracken and ling together,
And Lakeland coverts of fern and whin;
But there's not a moor in the world of heather
Like the purple heights by the Devon Lynn.
There are Yorkshire lasses with winsome faces,
And bright eyes shine at Helvellyn's feet;
But the perfect flower of all maiden graces
Is the face I loved at the Waters' meet.

There are rosy lights in a Whitby gloaming,
Killarney's grey has a gleam within;
But there's no such heaven in a world of roaming
As the summer sky o'er the Devon Lynn.
There are Irish spirits of tender seeming,
And northern hearts have a loyal beat;
But the purest pearl of a lover's dreaming
Is the heart I won at the Waters'-meet.

Sir P. Felis.

THE CAROL SINGERS.

Through snowy lanes, where moonlight wanes,
We come with the morning star:
A merrie band, at your door we stand,
With greeting from afar!
O, wake and sing of the new-born King
In the dawning chill and gray,
Of the Holy Child and His mother mild,
For this is Christmas Day!

O, tidings glad for the poor and sad
Who toil through a life's brief span;
This day full well we love to tell
Of the very God-made man.
Hope sings for all though shadows fall,
Whate'er the world may say,
Since our Lord was born to a life of scorn
On the blessed Christmas Day.

The morn draws on—our song is done—
But its echo shall not cease;
To you and yours this tide assures
For aye "Goodwill and Peace."
The bells amain take up the strain,
As on we wend our way,
The news to spread as the East glows red,
For this is Christmas Day.

Alison.

BEAUTIFUL BEYOND WORDS.

A little restless lad, with tired eyes and sad,
Watched from his bed the shadows round him creep;
But when the kind white stars looked through the window-bars,
They softly kissed the weary one to sleep.
And then he dreamed a happy dream,
More beautiful than words can say—
By flowing mead and silver stream,
A shining angel led the way:
He marked with gladness and surprise
The lovelight in the calm, sweet eyes;
And life would evermore be fair,
For he would be the angel's care.

In weariness and pain the child awoke again,
He sobbed aloud as in the gloom he lay;
But love's light step drew near, to comfort and to cheer,
And lips so gentle kissed the tears away.
More kindly than the stars had shone,
The dear face beamed above his bed;
And all the loneliness was gone,
As soothing words were fondly said;
A tender hand his own caress'd,
His grief and pain were hushed to rest;
A smile across his features played,
The dream had fled—the angel stayed.

Winifred H.

KATHLEEN.

That morn my heart was light, Kathleen,
That night it was heavy as lead;
In the morn I had you and the babe, Kathleen,
At night ye both lay dead.

That morn the sky was bright, Kathleen,
That night it was black with grief;
In the morn the ship sailed fair, Kathleen,
At night it was sunk on a reef.

This day I lave ye both, Kathleen,
Laid 'neath Kilrea's green sod,
But I carry ye both in my heart, Kathleen,
In my prayers each day to God.

I'll lave this day our cabin home,
Sure I can't stay now Kathleen;
To a far-off land I'm bound to roam,
My heart with sorrow filled, Kathleen.

Ye knew me poor, but true, Kathleen,
An' sure if I did ye wrong,
The sore in my heart is great, Kathleen,
I've no music now to my song.

'Tis to you and the babe that was mine, Kathleen,
Now over your grave I bid farewell;
An' sure we'll meet in Heaven, Kathleen,
Once more our love to tell.

KUTNOW'S IMPROVED EFFERVESCENT CARLSBAD POWDER.

BILIOUSNESS AND INDIGESTION.

Any excess of quantity or richness in diet almost invariably deranges the digestion of every one of us, or sets up biliousness with its attendant symptoms of Sick-headache, Constipation, &c. Now that the holiday season is upon us, we shall all be apt to find after the festive period that our stomachs or livers are out of order, and in need of a gentle stimulant and corrective. But a dose or two of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder will speedily remove the unpleasant evils resulting from excess of drink or diet, or from disorders of the liver and digestion because of the unwonted richness of diet, or too great mixing of foods. Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder, unlike pills and potions, is pleasant to take, acts in an hour or two easily and naturally, without pain or discomfort, and leaves the former patient as "fit as a fiddle" for further pleasures, exertion, or work.

A Medical Correspondent says of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder:—"Its advantages appear to arise from its possessing the power to eliminate from the body the excess of bile and acids, thereby purifying the blood and strengthening the general tone by improving the assimilative processes of the debilitated system. Consequently it has a salutary effect in cases of hypochondriasis, associated with low spirits and general depression."

The LANCET (March, 1891) says:—

"The medicinal virtues of the well-known waters of Carlsbad depend on the presence of mineral salts. . . . The water is accordingly reputed to be useful in rheumatism, gout, and kidney disorders. Kutnow's Carlsbad Powder is stated to contain, amongst other ingredients, the active principle of the Sprudel salt obtained direct from the mineral water. However this may be, our analysis confirmed the presence of the chief constituents referred to. The Powder is beautifully clean and white, and is evidently prepared with care, while the taste of the effervescing solution is by no means disagreeable."

The BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL (Sept. 10, 1892) says:—

"Messrs. Kutnow & Co. showed an improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder, decidedly more palatable than the ordinary Carlsbad Powder, evaporated at the springs, of which it reproduces the therapeutic effects, while effectually covering the nauseous taste and objectionable bitter flavour of sulphate of soda. It is gentle, effervescent, and is a very efficient and agreeable aperient."

THE TREATMENT OF CONSTIPATION.

The objectionable and injurious torpor of the intestines in Constipation is properly treated by the use of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder, in which the natural salts of famous Continental mineral springs are desiccated and effervescents added thereto, to reproduce in natural effect — with the added advantages of palatability and absence of griping or nausea — the efficacious and valuable properties of the mineral springs themselves. A course of two or three weeks of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder will be found, in most cases, requisite to so regulate the excretory functions that they re-acquire the natural habit of acting without artificial stimulation. Thus is constipation relieved without any injurious action of any kind, because both the stomachic and liver functions are at the same time lubricated, as it were, and greatly benefited. Patients whose diet is injudiciously chosen, who are fond of rich or indigestible foods, who, in fact, live not sufficiently abstemiously, or those who live sedentarily, and, therefore to some extent unnaturally, or in the extreme of either poverty or richness of diet, will find it desirable to keep Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder by them, that an occasional dose may correct the errors of drink and diet to which reference has been made above.

From Dr. BRACHET, Physician at the Baths of Aix-les-Bains:—

"Aix-les-Bains, Sept. 15, 1891.—I have prescribed your Powder for about a year in my hospital practice here, as well as frequently to my private patients. I have obtained the best results in patients suffering from rheumatism and gout, as well as in those who are constipated and bilious from the effects of the 'cure,' or from the change of food and climate. I consider Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder a preparation indispensable to persons travelling."

"Of the great utility of Carlsbad Salts to persons leading sedentary lives and inclining to corpulence there can be no question; the principal difficulty in their habitual use arises from the nauseous character of the dose. This (Kutnow's) Powder contains the active principle of the Sprudel salts in a slightly sweetened and effervescent form. A tablespoonful of the Powder in half a tumbler of water makes a decidedly pleasant draught, and taken in early morning is an efficient aperient."

THE KILBURN SISTERHOOD.

LATEST DEVELOPMENTS OF THE SCANDAL.

SIX months have now elapsed since the publication of the TRUTH report on the various allegations against the work of the Kilburn Sisterhood. That report, it may be said without boasting, created a very deep impression upon the public, and more especially upon those who had previously believed in and supported the work of the Sisters. The report was published in no spirit of hostility to the Community as a body, and still less to the religious and charitable aims which it professes; and it was my hope, in making public the results of a very long and careful inquiry—incomplete only because the Mother Superior withdrew from her engagement when she saw the possibility that my conclusions might not be entirely to her liking,—that the result would be a wholesome reform of the government and methods of the Sisterhood.

That expectation has been disappointed. On the part of the Mother Superior and her advisers no disposition has been manifested to acknowledge the justice of a single criticism which the Community has incurred, or to depart a hair's breadth from their previous attitude of antagonism to everything in the nature of outside suggestions and advice. On the part of the supporters and subscribers of the "Church Extension Association," as it is called, though the defections have been very numerous, and the contributions to the work of the Sisterhood have been, to all appearance, very seriously reduced, no one has appeared able and willing to take the lead in a reforming movement, or to make any serious effort to divert the Mother Superior from the disastrous course to which she has committed herself.

Under these circumstances, the time seems to have arrived for me to enlighten the public fully as to what the Sisters have been doing during the last six months, and also to make public much evidence that has reached me during that time, bearing upon the points raised in the original article. When once I have taken up a question of this nature, it is not my habit to drop it until some visible good has resulted from my efforts, and I still see ground to hope that, when the true facts of the situation are more generally appreciated, a drastic reform of the Kilburn institutions will be accomplished. What I propose to do now is to show that the most objectionable features in the work of the Sisterhood are still preserved without alteration, and that in their efforts to counteract the effects of the TRUTH article the Mother Superior and her colleagues have resorted to every form of trickery and deceit; and I shall ask special attention to a number of facts, which in my judgment stamp the ladies into whose hands the control of the Sisterhood has fallen as totally undeserving of confidence in any shape.

Before coming to details, I will call the attention of the reader to the fact that two letters of great importance, to which I shall have occasion to refer, have been reproduced in facsimile, and will be found interleaved in this article. The reason for taking that step is this: In an article published some three months back, I printed and commented upon a letter written by Sister Kate, which made a deep impression upon all who have taken an interest in the controversy, and came as a shock even to many who had up to that time cherished a belief in the Kilburn Sisterhood. The Sisters have replied, I understand, by declaring that the letter is a forgery. Reference is also made in recent issues of Our Work to the use of "forged letters" for the purpose of injuring the Sisterhood. For this reason I reproduce the letter above referred to, and another which also convicts the Sisters of gross prevarication. In regard to both letters I may say that the manner in which they have come into my hands precludes all doubt as to their authenticity; but I have thought it best to make assurance double sure by giving all those familiar with documents from Kilburn an opportunity of forming an opinion for themselves. I cannot seriously believe, however, that either Sister May or Sister Kate, the two ladies by whom these letters were written, will venture to deny their genuineness.

I will now turn to a matter affecting the practical charitable work of the Orphanages which was discussed at some length in the report on the TRUTH inquiry.

THE KILBURN BABY FARM.

Readers of the first TRUTH Report will remember that a passage was devoted to the "Foundling Home" recently established by the Kilburn Sisters, and condemned by the Charity Organisation Society as calculated to do more harm than good, by reason of the facilities which it held out to young women for ridding themselves permanently of illegitimate babies. In the original prospectus of this institution, "foundlings" were to be received on a payment by the parents ranging from £20 to £120, the parents renouncing all rights over the children under a heavy pecuniary penalty. This prospectus was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities—represented, I think, by the Bishop of Marlborough—and, in deference to their objections, the Sisters professed to withdraw it. In the pamphlet which formed the subject of the TRUTH investigation, the Charity Organisation Society contended that, whether or not the original prospectus had been withdrawn, the Sisters had continued to advertise for and receive "foundlings" on exactly the terms there stated. In answer to this, the Sisters, in their interviews with me, represented that they had modified their original plan by making inquiries respecting the antecedents of women who desired to be relieved of their babies, and also by endeavouring to keep an eye on their conduct after the children had been transferred to the orphanage. They did not suggest, however, that they had ever rejected a child, when the money was forthcoming, on the ground of the mother's antecedents, nor that they had ever returned a child on the ground of the mother's subsequent conduct. One of the Sisters frankly informed me that the ideal which they had in view, if ever their finances would permit its adoption, was the plan, in vogue in some Continental convents, of placing a basket at the door into which "unwanted babies" might be dropped without any questions being asked. The conclusion which I formed was that such concessions as they might have made to public opinion, the advice of their Bishop, or the criticism of experts in rescue work, were more or less a matter of form, that the Sisters were practically adhering to their original scheme of a receiving house for all foundlings with whom a certain sum of money was forthcoming, and that the consequences of such a system could not fail to be mischievous.

Now, how does this matter stand to-day? In the interval that has elapsed since my inquiry it would seem that the Sisters have abandoned even the pretence of carrying on this work as one of philanthropy, and have reduced it into an undisguised means of money-making. I will give the facts on which I form this opinion. The Sisters have continued to advertise publicly for "foundlings," selecting for the purpose the papers most likely to be read by the class in which such encumbrances are most common. Here is a sample advertisement taken from Lloyd's News:—

HOME FOR ORPHAN AND ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN.

For terms and particulars apply to Miss Fanny Sheppard, 44, Randolph-gardens, N.W.; or 3, King-street, Plymouth. (Letters to be marked private.) Personal interviews on Saturdays and Sundays only, between the hours of 6 p.m. and 8 p.m.

In answer to this advertisement the following letter was recently sent to Miss Sheppard (who is the Sister in charge of this particular department):—

To Miss Fanny Shepherd.

Please could you take my baby in your home please I havent had a misfortune before and its so hard to no what to do I am a servant and I couldnt pay much and I saw in the paper that you was taking in children and Orphans and mine is such a burden and please I dont no what to do in my trouble and please dont call but write becase I am strait now and I dont want people to no about it hoping you can help me NELLY ——.

The following was the answer:—

44, Randolph-gardens, London, N.W.

To Nelly ——.

We are sorry we cannot help you with your child, but our funds are too low now to admit of our taking infants unless £40 is paid with them.—Faithfully yours, F. SHEPPARD.

The minimum charge, it will be seen, which was £20 when the scheme was first started, has now been doubled, and £40 is the lowest price at which a child can be taken. Two things are clear upon this: (1) The present Kilburn Foundling Home is absolutely useless to poor girls genuinely desirous of making provision for their babies. The contention that this Home will remove the temptation to infanticide, and counteract the evils of baby-farming—the contention on which the whole defence of the system was rested in the Sisters' conversations with me—is therefore blown to the winds. (2) Want of funds, it will be seen, is the excuse for the large sum demanded as the price of accepting an illegitimate child. What does this mean? That the system is no longer on a charitable, but on a commercial basis; that babies are only accepted when the Sisterhood is relieved of any expense connected with them. The reader will note that this alteration of the tariff has followed upon the heavy blow which the Sisterhood has sustained through the publication of the TRUTH Report, and I think few will hesitate to infer that this system of advertising for illegitimate children at £40 a head is nothing more nor less than a device for relieving the present financial difficulties of the Sisterhood. In support of that view, let me call attention to a far more significant correspondence than the last. The following letter was recently sent to Miss Sheppard by a gentleman writing from an address in Threadneedle-street:—

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

DEAR MADAM,—Having seen a recent advertisement of yours in Lloyd's Newspaper, I should esteem it a great favour if you could send me full particulars, terms, &c., for admission to the Home referred to. I am interested in finding a home for an illegitimate child a few months old. The father would, I am sure, be willing to pay a reasonable sum in order to ensure its admission. I am trusting entirely to your discretion not to mention this matter. Trusting to hear from you, I remain yours, ———.

Here is the answer. I invite special attention to the fact that when it is a gentleman in Threadneedle-street who wishes to dispose of an illegitimate child, the price is raised to £50, though this was actually within a day or two of Miss Sheppard's letter to Fanny —— :—

44, Randolph-gardens, Kilburn.

SIR,—The entrance fee for an infant to our Foundling Home would be £50. For this amount the managers undertake the entire expense of the child's maintenance and education. The mother (if living) must sign a form agreeing to give up the child entirely to the control of the managers.

Particulars of the case must be given before the child can be accepted for admission. These will be treated as strictly confidential.—Yours faithfully, F. SHEPPARD.

The gentleman then wrote back as follows:—

DEAR MADAM,—Thanks for your letter of 17th inst. The terms you mention, viz., £50, seem to me reasonable enough, and there would be no difficulty as to the mother signing any document making over the child entirely to your charge. I should be glad to know, therefore, as soon as possible, precisely what particulars you desire before accepting the child for admission to your Home. At present, all I am at liberty to say is that it is through my own indiscretion I am compelled to make some such arrangement. Accepting, therefore, that this confession on my part will be treated as strictly confidential,—Believe me, faithfully yours, P. P.

In reply to this, Miss Sheppard wrote enclosing a document for execution, and stating that the Sisters require "an assurance that the mother has not before fallen, that she is not a married woman, and that she is now wishful to regain her character." This was the document enclosed :—

Form to be signed.

I, the undersigned, desire to place my child [Name].....born.....day of.....18..... in the Orphanage and Foundling Home of the Church Extension Association. And I hereby promise that I will not interfere in any way with the bringing up and education of the said child, and will not molest or interfere with the Managers of the said Homes in any way whatever, and that the Managers shall have the entire custody, tutelage, guardianship, and care of the said child.

If I desire at any future time to resume the guardianship of my child, I hereby promise to do so only with the consent of the Managers of the Institution, and to pay the sum of 6s. per week to the Managers for the time that my child has been in their care. This sum to be paid before the child is handed over to me.

It will be seen at once from these documents that every objection that has been offered to the original scheme of the Kilburn Sisters applies to the practice which they are at present following. In the correspondence last cited there is not a suggestion that any genuine inquiry will be made into the mother's antecedents, or her present mode of life. All that is asked for is "an assurance" (which, to all appearance, might come from the father himself) on a certain point; and the Sisters ask for no guarantee of the truthfulness of such "assurances." Provided the £50 were forthcoming, it is pretty obvious that no question would be raised about the admission of any child on the grounds that the parents' "assurances" were unsatisfactory. Again, it will be seen from the form above quoted that the original terms by which the parents renounce all further rights over their child, under a pecuniary penalty, are still in force. The parents can only resume guardianship on payment of a sum of six shillings per week for the time the child has been in the Home—a sum which would work out at over £150 by the time the child was ten years old. In the face of this agreement, it cannot be questioned that one object of the arrangement is to destroy the parental tie altogether, and to get the child absolutely into the power of the Sisterhood. Finally, it is to be noted that the Sisterhood are quite as ready to do business with the father as with the mother, this being shown not merely by the correspondence cited, but by the very form of the agreement, which is drawn for the use of either parent.

There is not the slightest doubt that this scheme is in active operation. The mere fact of the advertisements appearing regularly shows that people are being found who are ready to part with illegitimate children to the Sisterhood, even at the present high tariff. It will be noted that in the advertisement from Lloyd's News which I have quoted, Miss Sheppard gives an alternative address at Plymouth. This is the address of the Plymouth depot of the Church Extension Association, about which I shall have more to say presently. Between April last, when this depot was opened, and the beginning of August, I believe that at least four babies had been received there, and with one of these something like £30 or £40 was paid down in cash to the manager of the depot. These babies are boarded out in the neighbourhood for a few shillings per week. I do not say that, in this instance, the children have not been properly looked after in the houses of their foster-parents by the ladies who interest themselves in the work of the Sisterhood at Plymouth—though from an expression which occurs incidentally in certain correspondence to be noticed presently, it would seem that the payments to the foster-parents have not always been punctually sent from Kilburn. At the same time, it is a system which may readily lend itself to abuse, and certainly not one which can be set up as an antidote to baby-farming. All that it comes to is this: that, instead of the child being put out to nurse by a mother, who may be tempted to forget all about it, it is put out to nurse by the Sisters or their agents, who undertake to look after it, and exact for their services a very handsome sum in cash. The Sisters have in fact undertaken, as it were, the position of "middlemen" in the baby-farming business; and, looking at it from a purely business point of view, I should think there is no doubt that they are making quite the normal middleman's profit on the transaction.

In the first Truth Report, I spoke in qualified terms on this subject, contenting myself with saying that the Charity Organisation Society's criticism, which was the matter I was primarily concerned with, was in no way unwarranted by the facts. Knowing what I do now, I do not hesitate to pronounce the most unqualified condemnation upon the whole system. In its present aspect it is nothing more nor less than a trade in illegitimate babies, carried out on purely commercial principles, and with the obvious purpose of increasing the revenue of the Church Extension Association, and bringing funds to Kilburn in the present financial crisis. The pretence that the social evils of infanticide and baby-farming are being combated by this system becomes utterly untenable in the face of such facts as appear above. When one sees a servant girl told that her baby can only be taken off her hands if she is prepared to pay down £40, while a City man is informed that the Sisters will relieve him of his little difficulty for £50 in cash and a formal assurance that the thing has not happened before and will not happen again, to talk about moral and philanthropic aims which are to be attained by such means becomes little better than offensive cant. The one end and aim of this, as of too many other branches of the Kilburn work, is £. s. d., and the second of the instances given above shows that the Sisters would not hesitate to make money by pandering to those who can afford to pay handsomely in order to be relieved of the consequences of their own immorality. Nothing that has yet come to light respecting the work of these "Sisters of the Church" proves more conclusively the wicked folly with which their work has recently been directed.

The Sisters and the "Truth" Report.

I propose next to give some account of the attitude of the Kilburn Sisters towards the Truth Report published in June last. From time to time during the last six months I have noted certain spasmodic efforts which have been made to reply to the criticisms there formulated; but it has now become desirable to look at these little efforts more in detail. It must be understood at the outset that the general policy of the Sisterhood is to ignore the Truth Report altogether. No specific or definite reply to the allegations as a whole has been put forward. The course adopted has been (1) to circulate, whenever the opportunity occurred, the Church Bells pamphlet, which has already been referred to in these columns; (2) to put up local secretaries, or other representatives of the Church Extension Association, to give general denials, either in the Press or elsewhere, of the allegations unfavourable to the Sisterhood; (3) to disseminate similar denials, seasoned with the most unwarrantable innuendoes and imputations against the critics of the Sisterhood, through the medium of literature issued from Kilburn. Speaking generally, I may say that, in all these attempts at self-defence, the managers of the Sisterhood have given unbounded proof of that aptitude for misrepresentation and evasion of the real issues which has characterised them since they first incurred hostile criticism. Let me deal first with

The "Church Bells" Pamphlet.

As was explained in Truth of August 20, the Church Bells pamphlet makes no pretension whatever to be considered as an answer to Truth. The best proof of this is that it was actually issued several weeks before the Truth Report appeared. It seems, therefore, at starting, an act of questionable honesty on the part of the Sisters, or any one acting on their behalf, to offer the Church Bells report as an answer to Truth. Church Bells has never made any attempt whatever to controvert or even to criticise the first TRUTH supplement of the Kilburn Sisterhood. So far as I am aware, the only reference to the TRUTH inquiry in Church Bells was a paragraph published on July 24, in which the Editor, although he recorded his dissent from many of the conclusions at which I had arrived, expressly disclaimed any intention of entering into a controversy on the subject. At the same time he paid me the compliment of expressing himself as favourably struck with the temperate tone of the TRUTH article, and with my desire that the work of the Sisterhood, once reformed, should continue to flourish. It cannot be fairly suggested, therefore, that anything in the nature of a reply to TRUTH has ever been attempted in Church Bells.

What, then, was the Church Bells report? It professes to be, like the TRUTH report, the result of an inquiry undertaken by the Editor into the allegations made by the Charity Organisation Society. But it differed from the TRUTH report in this, that the inquiry on which it was based was conducted solely between the representative of Church Bells and the Kilburn Sisters, without any reference whatever to the Charity Organisation Society, or to any evidence which that Society might have been in a position to produce in support of its case. The pamplet is, I believe, the work of a lady, the wife of either the Editor or one of the proprietors of Church Bells, and the publication was undertaken, I suppose, as a matter of journalistic business. The lady—who has been dignified with the title of "Commissioner"—seems to have paid "friendly visits" (to use a phrase in which Miss Ashdown described what was expected of me) to the Sisters at Kilburn. She inspected the various institutions, interviewed the Sisters, discussed the Charity Organisation Society's allegations with them, and formed her own conclusion as to the sufficiency of the Sisters' answers. This is very much the same thing as if a magistrate who undertook to try a charge were to content himself with reading the charge and examining the prisoner and his witnesses upon it, and then proceeded to give judgment without having so much as looked at the evidence for the prosecution. It is an elementary principle of justice that if you want to arrive at the truth between two sets of disputants you must hear both sides of the case. This principle the Editor of Church Bells made no pretence whatever of following. His report, therefore, is of no value as a judicial finding upon the facts, and is, for the most part, little more than an ex parte statement. Nor, with all respect to the lady "commissioner," can she be regarded as a person properly qualified to elucidate difficult questions of this kind, or any match for the very astute and not over scrupulous parties with whom she had to deal. To anybody who remembers the history and incidents of the TRUTH inquiry—the evasive tactics adopted to prevent my getting at awkward truths, the elaborate attempts to throw dust in my eyes, the downright misrepresentations resorted to in some instances, and the final withdrawal of the Sisters from the inquiry they had themselves invited, when they found that I wanted to know too much—this attempt of a Church newspaper to unravel the mysteries of Kilburn, through the agency of an amiable lady with little knowledge of the world and probably a preconceived prejudice in favour of the Sisters, will appear very little better than an empty farce.

But, as I have said on a former occasion, there is more than this against the Church Bells inquiry. The report itself strongly suggests in many places that the author, or authors, deliberately shut their eyes to facts unfavourable to the Sisters, and this suggestion is proved up to the hilt by a correspondence, to which I have already briefly called attention. On July 10 last, some time after the publication of the Church Bells report, the following letter was addressed to the Editor. The writer supplied his name and address, but there is no necessity to repeat them here :—

To the Editor of Church Bells.

July 10, 1896.

SIR,—As you have taken up the position of champion of the Kilburn Sisterhood, I should be glad to have an explanation of two points that at present exercise the minds of their friends.

One is, Why "The Elms," West Hampstead, which was in fact occupied by pupil teachers, was called a home for children of weakly intellect, subscriptions asked for it on that plea, and in the yearly report for 1893 a description given of its "happy family of twenty-nine?"

Was this a flight of pure imagination, or were the pupil teachers persons of weak intellect?

The second point is, Why the Mother herself chose as adviser one of the Christian Brothers—Brother Noah—and allowed this member of a well-known Romish Society to lecture both to the Sisters and to the children at Broadstairs, in the "Bishop's room," in 1892, when the reason put forth by her for the great secession of Sisters from Kilburn was that they were desirous of introducing Romish practices.

I enclose my name and address as a proof of good faith, and beg to inscribe myself, A LOVER OF JUSTICE.

The points raised in this letter are, one would think, well deserving of notice from any one who undertakes to publicly vindicate the Sisterhood. How did the Editor of Church Bells deal with them? He did not publish the letter in his paper, but he privately addressed the following communication to the writer:—

From Church Bells Office,
12, Southampton-street, Strand,
London, W.C.
July 13, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—The Editor desires me to thank you for your letter and enclosure. He wishes me to point out that you are in error in stating that he has taken up the position of champion of the Kilburn Sisters. He undertook an investigation into certain definite charges which were made against the Community by the Charity Organisation Society, and the results of that investigation have been published in the pamphlet, "The Kilburn Sisters and their Accusers."

It is obvious that he cannot undertake, in addition, to investigate every isolated charge that may be brought forward by private persons, which is what he understands you desire him to do in the present instance.—Yours faithfully,

THE SUB-EDITOR.

This letter is a diplomatic subterfuge, worthy of the Kilburn Sisters themselves. The Editor, although he repudiates the suggestion that he has taken up the position of champion of the Kilburn Sisters, had put forth a document purporting to vindicate their conduct at almost every point, and had, from time to time, expressed himself in the very strongest terms about those who had taken up an attitude of hostility towards Kilburn. If this is not championship, I do not know what is. At any rate, the paper having taken up this attitude—whatever it is to be called—a gentleman, professing friendly sentiments towards the Sisters, lays before the Editor two very serious points. One point is that a statement which is a pure invention has been made in an official report of the C.E.A. for the purpose of obtaining money from the public; the other is that the Mother Superior, who has alleged that the great schism in the community in 1894 was entirely due to the Romanising tendencies of the seceding Sisters, has really been herself in intimate relations with the representative of a well-known Romish Society, and has employed this person as an instructor of the Sisters and the children under their care. If the Editor of Church Bells had been seriously desirous of making known the truth, and nothing but the truth about Kilburn, these are questions which one would think he would feel himself bound to deal with in some way. The questions impute to the Sisterhood (1) deliberate mendacity in its published accounts of its own work, and (2) disloyalty to the Church of England; and, assuming the honesty of purpose of the Editor of Church Bells, it might be expected that, even if he hesitated about publishing such imputations while uncertain about the facts, he would at least have felt bound, after what he had written in defence of the Sisters, to satisfy himself whether there was anything in the allegations. If the charges were unfounded, a mere journey, or even a letter, to Kilburn would have put him in a position to repudiate them. If he did not care to undertake that trouble, he could have published the letter under reservation, and left the Sisters, or any of their numerous spokesmen, to answer it for themselves. He takes neither course, but airily brushes the awkward question aside with the remark that he cannot investigate "every isolated charge." Such an attitude on points of vital moment, seems to me to show that Church Bells did not, in the proper sense of the word, investigate the case against Kilburn, and did not desire so to investigate it.

Father Noah.

I cannot leave this branch of the subject without pointing out more definitely the significance of the reference above made to the connection of the Mother Superior with the "Christian Brothers." It is a matter which I heard of in the course of my own inquiries into the Kilburn undertakings; but I refrained from any reference to it in the Truth Report, first, because my knowledge of the facts was not complete, and, secondly, because I desired to avoid the introduction of any theological question into the case, or to raise anything which might be regarded as a mere matter of prejudice against the Sisters on sectarian grounds. But in view of the refusal of the Editor of Church Bells—a Church of England paper which has shown a marked partiality for the Sisterhood—to give the slightest attention to this allegation, it seems to me that all who have subscribed, or are still subscribing, to the Church Extension Association have a right to know what this allegation means. As to Father Noah's lecture at Broadstairs in 1892, I know nothing beyond the statement of the writer of the above letter to Church Bells; but that there is some ground for the allegation as to the friendly relations between Father Noah and the Mother Superior, I have good reason to believe. Now the Christian Brothers, the Roman Catholic community of which Father Noah is a distinguished ornament, are a community of a somewhat singular character. They are, as I understand it, a proselytising body. Their aims are educational, and are expressly directed to the inculcation of Romish principles in the young. That the Mother Superior should be on terms of private intimacy with any member of this community is, of course, a matter of no public concern. She is as much entitled as any of us to form friendships with persons of different religious belief from herself. But if she has carried her friendly sentiments towards Father Noah, or any other Christian Brother, to the length of inviting him to lecture in the institutions under her authority, she has certainly committed a very grave indiscretion; and if, at the time when she promulgated the slander that the secessions from Kilburn in 1894 were due to the Romish proclivities of the seceders, she had herself been guilty of admitting a proselytising Romanist to give instruction, either to the Kilburn Sisters or the Kilburn Orphans, I can only say that this is one of the most lamentable proofs that have yet come to light of this good lady's lack of straightforwardness. I put these propositions in a hypothetical form, because, as I have said, the facts are not altogether clear. But there cannot be any question that this is a matter which ought to be cleared up, and which no friend or apologist of Kilburn can afford to shirk.

The Sisters at Plymouth.

I shall ask the reader next to look at some of the attempts that have been made by the Kilburn Sisters to mitigate the effect of the Truth report. In the first place we will take certain proceedings at Plymouth in August last, which have been already noticed in Truth, but in regard to the inner history of which much interesting information has since been forthcoming. It may be remembered that in August a meeting was summoned by advertisements and letters in the local Press for the purpose of hearing an address from "A Senior Sister," who was coming to Plymouth to give an answer to the allegations of Truth. In a letter addressed to the Western Morning News, and signed "Miss L. Humphris," Secretary, C.E.A., these expressions were used respecting the objects of the meeting:—"The accusations made by Truth will be fully discussed, and I should like all persons who are interested in the matter—either for or against—to come and hear for themselves." Another advertisement published in the local Press stated that at the meeting "a Kilburn Sister will gladly answer any question relating to the recent Truth allegations. All are invited." The place for which the meeting was summoned was the local Depot of the Church Extension Association. The public did not respond very freely to the invitation, and only a handful of people attended; but, as might have been expected, after the public manner in which the invitation had been issued, two reporters from the local Press presented themselves. They were stopped at the door by the "Senior Sister," Sister May, who had come to Plymouth for the purpose of rebutting the Truth accusations, and who informed them that the meeting was not a public one. This attitude was, not unnaturally, objected to by some of the other members of the public who had attended. A discussion arose at once as to whether the meeting was to be public or not. Sister May stoutly adhered to the position she had taken up, and declined to speak, if reporters were to be present. In the end, an adjournment of the meeting was proposed and carried, and the proceedings terminated without any attempt to carry out the objects for which it had been summoned. Subsequently to the meeting, a letter was published in the Western Morning News over the signature "E. P. Davie," asserting that "the meeting was planned and advertised by myself and another lady without the authority or knowledge of the Kilburn Sisters," and that the writer "only found out too late that nothing could be further from their wishes than that any public meeting of the kind should be held."

I have already commented upon the discreditable character of this performance. There can be no question that the meeting was called as a public meeting, and the refusal of the Sister to speak, if her words were to be reported, can only be attributed to reluctance to run the risk of her remarks being publicly criticised or refuted. The attempt subsequently made to relieve the Sisterhood of the discredit of the proceedings by suggesting that the advertisements were issued without their knowledge or authority is, on the face of it, almost too ridiculous for belief, and only gives the affair an uglier look. But I am now able to throw some further light on the whole incident, which more than justifies the unfavourable conclusions already formed about it.

The lady who took the leading part in organising the Plymouth meeting was Miss Bourchier, who was, I believe, Secretary to another local branch of the C.E.A., but who had been taking an active part in the work of the Association at Plymouth. Some of my readers may remember a reference in Truth to the fact that Miss Bourchier was at one time offering, through the Western Morning News, to send the Church Bells pamphlet to any one whose confidence in the Sisterhood might have been shaken by the Truth disclosures. The origin of the meeting is to be found in the following letter from Sister May to Miss Bourchier—one of the two letters which I have had reproduced, and a facsimile of which is attached:—

Minster-street, Salisbury.
August 5.

My Dear Miss Bourchier,—I hope to be at Plymouth for a few days next week, so am writing to ask whether you think there would be time to get up a meeting or even gather a few people together, either at the Depot or elsewhere, to disabuse them about Truth?

Perhaps you could go round with me to some of them, friends and others, so as to do as much work as possible in a short time?

I think I shall arrive either Saturday or Monday, but have not written to Miss Davie yet. I trust you will be at home.

A letter would find me at 14, Colston-street, Bristol, by return.
—In great haste, yours very sincerely, Sister May, S.C.

Note the terms of this letter. Miss Bourchier is expressly asked "to get up a meeting or even gather a few people together, either at the Depot or elsewhere, to disabuse them about Truth." No one could read this as anything but an invitation to get up a public meeting, if practicable; nor is it possible to believe that the writer had anything else in her mind. Otherwise the distinction which she draws between "a meeting" and the gathering together of a few people is absolutely meaningless. The language thus used is totally inconsistent with the pretence subsequently put forward that the proceedings were to be private, and that it was promoted without the knowledge of the Sisters. Miss Bourchier read the letter as any one else would read it, and took every means that she could think of to get as many people together as possible to be disabused about TRUTH.

It is highly instructive to note how her efforts were rewarded. After the meeting and the repudiation by Sister May of the action of the local representative of the Sisterhood, Miss Bourchier's friends advised her to resign the local secretaryship, and she did so accordingly, in a letter to Sister May. Her mother wrote a few lines at the same time, explaining that she and Miss Bourchier's father could not allow their daughter to be any longer connected with the Association after what had occurred. To this Sister May replied, in a letter to Mrs. Bourchier, that Miss Bourchier had acted entirely on her own responsibility, and imputing to her the blame for everything that had occurred. Mrs. Bourchier, not unnaturally, retorted somewhat warmly, referring Sister May to her own letter of August 5. The Sister took refuge in the soft answer which is supposed to turn away wrath, but in no way accepted any share of the responsibility. She at the same time wrote a little homily to Miss Bourchier, concluding with the expression, "but we must comfort ourselves by remembering that God can overrule even mistakes to His Glory, and we may trust it will be so in this case." I trust it may be so, too; but before the mistakes of Sister May and her colleagues can be overruled in the manner suggested, a great deal will have to happen, of which there is no indication at present.

There is another little point in connection with Sister May's proceedings. As mentioned above, the letter in the Western Morning News, which summoned all persons interested, "whether for or against," to hear the Sister's refutation of TRUTH, was signed, "L. Humphris." This is the name of the Sister under whose management the Plymouth Depot had been open—Sister Louisa. After starting the Plymouth Depot, Sister Louisa seems to have left Plymouth altogether for some months, the work being in charge of a paid agent of the Association, Miss Davie, but Sister Louisa remained the nominal head of the establishment, and all business correspondence was authorised to be signed in her name. It was in accordance with this practice that Sister Louisa's name was signed to the official letter from the local branch addressed to the Western Morning News, and, indeed, the local representatives of the Association were under the belief that they had no authority to write in any other name. When Sister May had repudiated the action which Miss Bourchier had taken at her request, she also objected very strongly to the use of Miss Humphris's name in this letter, and in her final epistle to Miss Bourchier she refers to it as a "serious error." This is, in fact, one of the mistakes which she hopes will be "overruled for good."

It seems to me that it would be difficult to find a more flagrant instance of double-dealing than these proceedings afford. If there was any mistake in regard to the summoning of the meeting, the mistake clearly arose from the loose and misleading manner in which Sister May expressed herself in her first letter to Miss Bourchier, and her attempt to shift the whole responsibility on to somebody else, is in the highest degree disingenuous, as well as being most unfair and ungrateful towards the lady who had exerted herself so earnestly on behalf of the Sisterhood. Equally disingenuous, and equally unfair, is the repudiation of the authority to use the name of Miss Humphris. The motive here is clear. Miss Humphris is one of the Kilburn Sisters, and her signature to this letter makes the Sisterhood directly responsible for the summoning of the meeting. It is, therefore, obviously as a step towards washing their hands of all responsibility for the discreditable proceedings in connection with the meeting, that Sister May repudiates the general authority which had been given to the local representatives to use Sister Louisa's name in their business correspondence. That this was the motive is clear from what follows.

Having thus repudiated their own instructions to Miss Bourchier, and their own general authority to their agent at the Depot, the Sisters finally clench the matter by the letter from Miss Davie, which I have referred to above. The history of this letter is as significant as any other part of the proceedings. By the courtesy of the Editor of the Western Morning News, I have been enabled to see the original manuscript of this letter. It is written, not by Miss Davie herself, but in handwriting which is frequently found in communications from Kilburn. It appears that a messenger was specially sent down from Kilburn to Plymouth with this letter ready drafted, for the purpose of obtaining Miss Davie's signature to it. Miss Davie, as I have said, was a paid servant of the Sisters. To refuse to sign would have been a difficult matter for her, but after some demur she consented to sign it, and the messenger went back with it to London. Miss Davie has stated that, before signing, she struck out the reference to "another lady" as having assisted in arranging the meeting, and took the whole responsibility for what had happened upon herself. If so, it would appear that the Sisters at Kilburn took upon themselves to alter her letter by re-inserting the reference to the "other lady" (Miss Bourchier) before they forwarded it, as they did, from Kilburn to the Western Morning News. In view of the severe censure pronounced by Sister May upon the unauthorised use of Miss Humphris's name in another letter by the representative of the local branch, it would be both instructive and amusing to find that the Sisters actually took upon themselves to send to the Press a letter purporting to be written by Miss Davie, and containing a statement which Miss Davie had declined to sign. But however that may be, the fact remains that this letter, drawn up at Kilburn, sent down to Plymouth to be signed by a paid servant of the Sisterhood, taken back to Kilburn, and thence forwarded to the Western Morning News is essentially false and misleading in its statements. Every reader can see for himself, by reference to the account given above of the manner in which the Plymouth meeting came to be arranged, that it is absolutely untrue that, as asserted in Miss Davie's letter, the meeting was planned and advertised by "myself" (Miss Davie) "and another lady without the authority or knowledge of any of the Kilburn Sisters." The statement is directly at variance with the facts, and Sister May's first letter to Miss Bourchier remains on record to prove the falsehood. I may add that Miss Davie's letter was reprinted in the September number of Our Work, without a hint of the way in which it had been written and signed; indeed, with a reference to Miss Davie as a "lady-worker." In the accompanying editorial comment the statement was repeated that Plymouth meeting was planned and advertised "without any sanction from Kilburn," and "entirely without the knowledge of the Sisters."

I trust that I shall not be accused of devoting an undue amount of space to this matter. My reason for dealing with it at such length is that, when properly understood, the whole transaction affords a most convincing demonstration of the duplicity—it might, I think, fairly be called dishonesty—of these Kilburn ladies. When the managers of a great public institution can treat a loyal and devoted supporter with the gross unfairness shown to Miss Bourchier in this instance, when they can unscrupulously repudiate their own authority to their own agents, and when they can get their own paid servant to put her signature to what is shown by their own handwriting to be an utter falsehood, and all this for the sole purpose of clearing themselves of responsibility for a silly blunder by one of their own number, is it possible that the most fanatical believer in their virtues can still remain under any delusion respecting them? Yet this is only one instance of that unscrupulousness the evidence of which is to be found at almost every turn in the recent history of the Kilburn Sisterhood.

A VOICE FROM BIRMINGHAM.

I pass now to another recent example of the tactics adopted in defence of the Sisterhood. In October last, at a Protestant Alliance meeting at Shrewsbury, the Rev. A. Roger made certain statements respecting the treatment of the orphans at Kilburn. I need not repeat here that with any attack upon the Sisters on purely sectarian grounds I have no sympathy whatever; but at the same time it must, of course, be admitted that the Protestant Alliance, or any other religious body opposed to the theological principles of Kilburn, is perfectly within its right in making known the errors and indiscretions of the Sisters for its own special purposes. It is inevitable that capital should be made out of what has happened by the religious opponents of the Sisterhood. With that I am in no way concerned, the only interest that I have in the matter being to see that what is stated is true, whether it comes from the friends or the enemies of Kilburn. What passed at Shrewsbury I do not exactly know, but it led to the appearance of the following letter in the Birmingham Daily Gazette :—

The Kilburn Orphanage.

To the Editor of the Daily Gazette.

Sir,—I have just read an account of the proceedings of the Protestant Alliance at Shrewsbury, in which remarks were made with regard to the Kilburn Orphanage of a very misleading character. As I have paid frequent visits to the Orphanage (sometimes staying three weeks there), I have considerable knowledge of the subject, and I should be much obliged if you could make it known, by means of your valuable paper, that I should be very glad to give information to anybody who may desire it. I am, yours faithfully,

Oakly Park, Bromfield, Shropshire, October 28.

On the publication of this letter a gentleman named Howse, of King's Heath, wrote to the Hon. Henrietta Windsor Clive, referring to her offer to give information to anybody who might desire it, and putting the following question :—

I venture most respectfully to inquire whether, as reported in yesterday's Gazette, the Rev. A. Roger is accurate in stating that "children were locked in iron cages with brass spikes, and even young school mistresses have been caged up for weeks, because they would not admit in the confessional that they had been guilty of conduct of which they were perfectly innocent?

In the statement of Mr. Roger here quoted, the odium theologicum comes out. The reference to "the confessional" is accurate in a sense, but misleading in the interpretation which would generally be placed upon it. There was no question at Kilburn of "the confessional" in the technical religious sense of that word; on the other hand, of course, it is true that the girls were pressed by the Sisters to confess certain misconduct, and refused to make confession. This is the only sense in which it can be said that they refused to admit anything in "the confessional." Again, the expression "iron cages" is a somewhat sensational description of the cubicles in which the children are confined in their dormitories, although in one sense these apartments certainly are cages, and although there are very good grounds for objecting to the use of such contrivances. With these exceptions, however, the statements which Mr. Howse put to Miss Clive in the above letter are literally accurate, as readers of the Truth report will know.

Let us now look at the manner in which Miss Clive deals with the question thus put to her. It must be remembered that this lady had come forward in the Press as a champion of the Sisterhood, and had volunteered, on the strength of her "considerable knowledge of the subject," "to give information to anybody who may desire it." Her answer to Mr. Howse begins :—

In reply to your note received this morning, I have no hesitation in saying that the Rev. A. Roger's statements with regard to the Kilburn Orphanage must have been based on very unreliable information, and that he himself can have no personal knowlege of the subject. Some time ago it was discovered that a few girls in the Home were having a very bad influence on the others, and decided measures had to be taken to stop the evil. No girl was ever locked up, but a few had to be isolated, and in a very few cases it was found necessary to remove them from the Home, a course which is, I believe, invariably followed in all schools (industrial or otherwise) in such cases. Considering that most of the children in the Home come straight from the workhouse, it speaks well for the training and influence of the Sisters that, out of the hundreds educated by them, so very small a number have not turned out well. . . . .

The letter goes on to describe in detail the cubicles or "cages"; but this matter has already been so fully discussed in Truth that there is no occasion to go into it again now. In the main, Miss Clive's defence of the cubicles is fair enough, whether one agrees with her conclusions or not, although it must be remembered that the details of these contrivances have been considerably modified since the first outcry against them.

But in regard to the account above given of the trouble at the Orphanage in 1893, Miss Clive's statements bear no relation whatever to the truth. In saying this I impute no blame to this lady, beyond that which attaches to everybody who states as a fact something which he or she only knows at second-hand. It is not necessary to go again into the unpleasant story of the trouble at the Orphanage in 1893, which was so fully described in the first Truth Report. Every one who has read the Truth Report knows the nature of the evil, and also of the measures which were taken to deal with it. If any are not sufficiently informed upon the point, I must refer them to pages 8-12 of the Truth supplement for June 18 last. All that it seems necessary to say here is: (1) that Miss Clive's statement "that a few girls at the home were having a very bad influence on the others," is a ridiculously inadequate description of the wholesale demoralisation which was discovered, or which the Sisters allege that they discovered, in 1893; (2) that the statement that no girl was ever locked up has been already proved to be false; and (3) with regard to the statements that "a few had to be isolated, and in a very few cases it was found necessary to remove them from the home," that a more utterly misleading representation of the facts could hardly have been penned. Girls who were at different times isolated by being shut up alone in various apartments might be counted by the dozen, and those who were isolated in a gang might be counted by the score. The "very few" who were removed amounted to well over a hundred. What the precise number was nobody but the Mother Superior and those in her confidence can say for certain; but there is every reason to believe that it was nearer 150 than 100, and persons who were connected with Kilburn at the time have estimated the number even higher than this. I may say that so wholesale was the expulsion that some ladies who knew the facts, and had by this time lost all confidence in the Mother Superior, attributed her action to a deliberate policy of clearing out the Orphanage in order to make room for the extension of the baby-farm, which had then just been started, and promised to become a lucrative undertaking. I do not say that this theory was correct, but I do say that the fact that ladies who knew what was going on formed this opinion is a sufficient proof of the scale on which the process of expulsion was carried out.

With regard to the general facts respecting the treatment of the girls who were accused, and the number who were punished, the evidence is too clear to leave any possibility of doubt. I would remind the reader that in the course of the inquiry which I undertook last spring, I personally saw a large number of girls who had been punished and expelled. Their evidence, which I tested by every means that was possible, was precise, straightforward, and perfectly consistent. Every one of those that I saw is now in a respectable situation. Many of them were serving as pupil teachers in the public schools of the Church Extension Association at the time when charged and expelled. They all denied vehemently that they they had been guilty of any of the offences imputed to them, and I do not believe that any honest man who saw and heard them would have hesitated to accept their statements. Had I chosen, I could have seen thirty or forty more girls who had in writing given similar testimony, and I only refrain from doing so from a desire to avoid putting them to unnecessary pain and humiliation, and because I considered the evidence which I had already obtained to be amply sufficient for all practical purposes. Further, after I had seen these girls, I had a personal interview with the Mother Superior, at which I frankly told her of the impression which the evidence had left upon my mind, and invited her to let me see witnesses at Kilburn who might be in a position to contradict the girls' evidence, more particularly the Sister and the Matrons who had taken the leading part in the "inquisition" among the orphans. How did the Mother Superior meet that request? First, by putting forward excuses for the interview with these particular ladies, one of which excuses—I mean the excuse for not seeing Sister Kate—appears to have been a pure invention; secondly, by referring me to a solicitor, who, after inventing various pretexts for declining to go on with the inquiry, wound up by threatening me with an action for libel if I made any further references to his clients in TRUTH. If anything were needed to clench the effect created by the evidence of the girls themselves, it would have been supplied by these evasive and disingenuous tactics, to which the Mother Superior resorted when offered the opportunity of rebutting their evidence if she could. No reasonable being could avoid the conclusion which I formed that the evidence respecting their treatment given by the girls themselves was absolutely true.

Now, mark, everything which I have just stated was told, only with more completeness and detail, in TRUTH of June 18. Yet here on October 31 we have the Hon. Henrietta Windsor Clive coming forward as the apologist of the Sisters, and virtually giving the lie to everything that had been stated in TRUTH. I ask on what evidence did Miss Clive do this? Has she inquired into the facts herself? Has she seen any of the hundred or so of girls who were expelled? Has she compared the evidence given by these girls with any other evidence that can be adduced at Kilburn to rebut their statements? Has she, in a word, the slightest personal knowledge of the facts on which she claims to speak with authority, or is she merely accepting and reproducing statements made to her by the Kilburn Sisters. If the latter, what a fresh revelation we have here of the tactics of the Sisters, who first impose upon this lady with a gross misrepresentation of facts which are established by irresistible evidence, and then induce this lady to put herself forward through the Press as a witness to the innocence of the Sisters of the charges against them! That the Hon. Henrietta Windsor Clive honestly believed all that she says in the above letter I make no question; but it seems to me to be a lamentable thing that people in a position that entitles their words to some respect should, through their own silly credulity, allow themselves to become the mouthpieces of falsehood and the means of deceiving others.

Even this, however, is not the end of Miss Clive's indiscretion. In reply to her letter, which I have quoted above, Mr. Howse wrote again, expressing himself dissatisfied with the answer, and putting the question, "Why are the Sisters so slow to bring the threatened action for libel?" In a further letter dated November 3, Miss Clive (after remarking that she is "perhaps over-cautious in the matter of answering questions," but at the same time quite familiar with the main facts) replies as follows to Mr. Howse's questions:—

> As to your question with regard to a possible action for libel on the part of the Sisters, you cannot have much knowledge of life in a religious community, if you can imagine that they would bring their affairs before the secular law courts. I, for one, should be very sorry to see them resort to such means, neither do I believe it to be necessary.

It is difficult to believe, after this, that this lady has ever even looked at the report of the TRUTH inquiry. If she will now take the trouble to do so, she will find on page 4 a letter written to me by the Mother Superior on February 18 last informing me that possibly it might become the painful duty of the Sisters to "summon" their traducers. On the next page she will find that a week or two later, the Sisters, after having invited me to investigate for myself the allegations against them, placed themselves in the hands of a solicitor, who, after some weeks of desultory correspondence, wrote to me that, in the event of any repetition of my previous remarks, "or any attempt of a similar nature," his clients "would at once institute legal proceedings against me." When Miss Clive has referred to this passage, which I do her the justice to suppose she knows nothing about, I will ask her to explain, if she can, what she means by rejecting the possibility of the Sisters going to law as something apparently irreconcilable with "life in a religious community." It seems to me that she will have two alternatives before her. Either she must admit that in March and April last the Mother Superior was proposing to do something at variance with all the traditions of religious communities; or else the Mother Superior when she talked to me, in her letter of February 18, about the painful duty of summoning the libellers, and when, later on, she, through her solicitors, informed me of her intention to institute legal proceedings against me in certain eventualities, was endeavouring to intimidate me with an empty threat which she had no intention of carrying out. I leave Miss Clive her choice between these two alternatives.

It is worth while to note the last step of this correspondence. In answer to the lady's letter of November 3, Mr. Howse wrote again, mentioning, among other things, that he proposed submitting a copy of the correspondence to the Editor of TRUTH in order to hear what I had to say about it. Miss Clive replied that she must beg him to do nothing of the kind, and that if she had had any idea that he had intended to make this use of it, she would not have entered into a private correspondence with him. I must respectfully decline to admit that after what had previously passed, the lady had any right thus to veto publicity. She had volunteered publicly in the Press to correspond with any one who was in doubt about Kilburn. The question was a public one, and she publicly offered to answer and refute, on her own authority and responsibility, accusations which had been publicly made. Yet, when told that her answers are to be submitted to the person who has made these allegations, and whom she has undertaken to answer, she at once refuses her assent to this course. Her conduct can only be compared to that of Sister May at Plymouth. The Kilburn Sisters and their supporters are apparently prepared to say anything in answer to TRUTH, provided they can say it privately, in strict confidence, and without fear of its coming to the knowledge of TRUTH. Under these conditions we find them ready to make statements utterly at variance with the facts, and capable of disproof as soon as they are uttered. Naturally, therefore, when it is proposed to give publicity to what they have to say, they shrink with horror from the idea. The moral of Birmingham is very similar to that of Plymouth.

THE CASE OF SISTER KATE.

As I have referred above to the refusal of the Mother Superior to allow me to see Sister Kate in the course of my inquiry, this will be a convenient point for recapitulating the circumstances connecting this particular Sister with the Kilburn scandal. I will ask the reader to look in the first place at the letter from Sister Kate, which has already been referred to in TRUTH, and in part quoted. As stated at the outset of my remarks, it is the letter of which the authenticity has been denied, and which I have, therefore, had reproduced. I may remark that the original is written on Kilburn notepaper, stamped as in the facsimile. This letter has a double significance. It discloses, first, the gross dishonesty of the attempt which was made, while I was engaged in the Kilburn inquiry, to influence my judgment by turning on to me a flood of correspondence from friends of the Kilburn Sisters. In the second place, it has a most important bearing upon the allegations, made to me in January and February, that Sister Kate was in such a condition of health that for her to see me personally was a matter of impossibility. In order to follow on what I have been saying just above, I will deal with the second of these points first. This letter of Sister Kate's is dated from "The Elms." It is addressed to the then foreman of the printing works of the C.E.A.—a man who, I believe, was receiving about 35s. per week. Sister Kate herself was at this time in charge of this particular department, and it will be seen that the letter deals with, in the first place, current matters of business relating to the printing works. For convenience of reference, I give here the first part of the letter:—

"The Elms."

The Sisters of the Church,
Randolph-gardens,
Kilburn, N.W.

Dear Sir,—Do not post anything (you want me to get in a hurry) on Friday night as I am at the Home that night and Saturday morning, otherwise I am at "The Elms." I have writen to Spicer for work for a paper. Will you kindly let me have samples of all the type you have, with the name of same. I hope we shall not have to buy any, but the Mother wishes to see all the type we now have at the Works.—Yours faithfully, Sister Kate.

Then follows the P.S. to which I will come presently. This letter, it will be noticed, is not dated, but it is easy to fix the date approximately from the P.S., which shows that it was written at the time when the Sisters were requesting their friends and supporters to communicate their views to the Editor of Truth. The letters which were thus inspired reached me between March 7 and the end of the same month. The printer, to whom the letter was addressed, states that it was somewhere about the beginning of March that he received this letter from Sister Kate. If the letter was written any time in March, it is amply sufficient for my purpose. Now my first interview with the Kilburn Sisters at Truth Office took place on January 10, the second on January 22, and my interview with the Mother Superior at Kilburn on February 12. As has already been stated, I was desirous from the first of seeing Sister Kate. Allegations directly implicating that lady were made in evidence which had been before me long before my negotiations with the Sisters began, and if my inquiry was to be a genuine one, it was absolutely essential that I should see personally a witness who had played so important a part in the matters under investigation. From the Kilburn point of view, it might have been supposed that if Sister Kate was prepared to deny the allegations made against her personally, every possible effort would have been made to let me see her and satisfy myself of the credibility of her denial. It must be remembered that the two Sisters who had been deputed to wait upon me had little or no personal knowledge of that part of the case relating to the treatment of the orphans in 1893. From every point of view, therefore, it was desirable that I should have Sister Kate's evidence at first hand, instead of taking general denials from these two ladies on matters of which they could only know through Sister Kate herself.

Now, how was my suggestion that I should see Sister Kate met? Sisters May and Frances at once pronounced it to be impossible, on the ground that Sister Kate's health had broken down under the painful events of 1893-4, and that she had become a chronic invalid. Sister May, in tones the pathos of which I well remember, solemnly assured me that poor Sister Kate "had been on her back for months." She appealed to Sister Frances for confirmation, and Sister Frances agreed that in Sister Kate's sad condition it was out of the question for me to see her. This was in the middle of January. On February 12, when I saw the Mother Superior, I renewed my request to be allowed to see Sister Kate. The Mother Superior shook her head, and mournfully replied that it was out of the question. Poor Sister Kate, she said, was quite broken down. I said something to the effect that even if the lady was obliged to recline upon a couch, it might be possible for me to see her, and learn what she had to say to the very serious statements made respecting her own conduct. I also suggested that before a definite refusal was given, it might be desirable to ascertain whether Sister Kate's doctor would make any objection to my having an interview with her. I pressed the point, because in the interval between my interview with the Sisters and my interview with the Mother, I had seen personally several girls who made allegations against Sister Kate, and their evidence was such that I could not reject it without, at least, having heard what the lady implicated herself said in reply. The Mother Superior, however, seemed to think either that the matter was of no importance, or that Sister Kate was in such a desperate condition that any discussion of the events of 1893 might be attended with the most disastrous consequences, and I had to drop the subject.

With these facts in mind, let the reader look at Sister Kate's letter attached. Here, within three or four weeks of my interview with the Mother Superior, Sister Kate is giving her instructions, apparently in the ordinary course of business, to the foreman of the works of which she is in charge. She is evidently moving about between "The Elms" at Hampstead and one of the Homes, and she gives the printer instructions where he should write to her. The printer, whom I have seen, tells me that at this time Sister Kate was showing herself at the works, and attending to the business of the department as usual. He told me that he thought that she had been unwell and away for a few weeks some little time before this, but when I suggested to him that Sister Kate had "been on her back for months" down to the middle of January, and that in the middle of February she was still in a hopelessly prostrate condition, and unable to attend to business of any kind, the man simply laughed at the idea. I may add that, from what I have heard from other sources, I have reason to believe that Sister Kate was at the C.E.A. warehouse in Paternoster-row, in the interval between my interview with the Sisters and the writing of the above letter.

No one can shut his eyes to the effect of this evidence except with the deliberate desire to avoid seeing the truth. It is a disagreeable thing at any time to make an imputation of untruthfulness against ladies, and it becomes in the highest degree painful when the ladies concerned occupy such positions as those of the Mother Superior and the senior Sisters of a religious community. But that these ladies deliberately set themselves to deceive me about Sister Kate's condition during January and February, I cannot now doubt for a moment. If their statements were false, why were they put forward? It can only have been for the purpose of screening Sister Kate, and saving her from the painful position of being confronted with the statements of the girls whom she had ill-treated in 1893. As usually happens, the detection of one falsehood, uttered by the Sisters, supplies strong corroborative evidence of the truth of the allegations against them in other particulars.

Let the reader remember the nature of the allegations affecting Sister Kate. They will be found chiefly on pages 11-12 of the Truth Supplement of June 18. Sister Kate was the Sister who took charge of the girls against whom accusations were made. She examined and cross-examined them, and seems to have been generally responsible for their treatment while they were in disgrace. On every allegation that has been made, whether by the C.O.S. or by other parties, respecting the treatment of these girls, she was the one witness competent to speak on behalf of Kilburn from her own knowledge. Moreover, several girls whom I have seen deposed to the harshness, and even violence, with which Sister Kate had treated them. One of the worst cases is that of a girl, sixteen years of age, a pupil-teacher, who was sent away in company with her sister. This girl, after describing how she was kept in confinement for three or four days, and pressed daily to confess by Sister Kate and the matron who assisted her, states that on the day before she left, Sister Kate, after again pressing her for a confession, lost her temper, took the girl by the shoulders, and "thumped her against the wall," and then struck her in the face with her hand, giving her a black eye. This girl went home with her sister to her friends next morning, accompanied by a matron. Her black eye was at once noticed, and the matron explained that it was the result of knocking her head against the washstand. The case was subsequently inquired into by Lord Salisbury's Chaplain, and an offer was made from Kilburn to take both the girls back. There is no room for doubt that this girl did leave with a black eye, and that the matron gave a false explanation as to how it had been caused. This is the worst case in which physical violence is charged, but it is not the only one. Again, most of the girls whom I saw stated that they had been threatened either with removal to the workhouse, or with expulsion and disgrace in one shape or another, unless they made statements incriminating other girls; and there can be no question that the process of inquiry was conducted in this cruel and unjust manner—that is to say, by putting pressure on the girls separately, in order to force from them evidence incriminating their friends, and then using the evidence thus obtained from one girl as a means of intimidating and forcing similar statements from others.

These are the matters in regard to which I thought it most desirable that I should have the personal evidence both of Sister Kate and of the matrons who assisted her in this inquisition. With regard to the matrons the Mother Superior simply said that they had left, and that she could not cause them to attend; but she made no offer to give me the slightest assistance in finding them, which, I take it, could not be a matter of much difficulty. With regard to Sister Kate, I was put off with the story, above detailed, of the Sister's illness. Now I think that every reader will be in a position to judge for himself the full significance of the misrepresentations which were made respecting Sister Kate's condition.

THE BOGUS CORRESPONDENT OF "TRUTH."

It is necessary to add a word as to the P.S. to Sister Kate's letter to the printer for the information of those who may not have seen my remarks upon it in TRUTH of September 10. This is the text of the P.S. :—

The Mother thinks it would do more good if you wrote to The Editor,
TRUTH Buildings,
Carteret-street, S.W., as an outsider. Do not mention you know or work at any of our Homes, but write from your own address, and say you are surprised to hear of the disgraceful attack made against the Church Extension Association. Then mention its work amongst the unemployed, &c., &c , and say the Charity Organisation Society ought to be had up for libel, and that you and many more will be obliged to come forward and put a stop to the damaging reports, and will take strong measures to do so. Something of the sort might do great good if you take them with a high hand, asking TRUTH to do his best to put an end to false reports. It will be a great help if you will write ; will you also write to The Secretary,
Charity Organisation Society,
Buckingham-street, (?)
and threaten them well. Say anything you can to show how bad their conduct is. Could we have copies of letters?

As I explained when first publishing this letter, the significance of it is this: On February 12 I had seen the Mother Superior at Kilburn, and had expressed my wish to hear the evidence of certain witnesses on her side, in answer to those to whom I had been referred by the Charity Organisation Society. At the same time I had indicated to the Mother Superior that, in regard to the charges of cruelty, I thought there was a very strong case against the Sisterhood. My desire to see the witnesses who had been directly concerned in the matter under dispute was never complied with, for the reasons above explained. But within two or three weeks of my interview with Miss Ayckbowm, letters began to pour in upon me from all parts of the kingdom, written by people who had not the slightest personal knowledge of the facts in dispute, but who were all most positive in assuring me that I had been misinformed, and in impressing upon me the virtues and the wrongs of the Kilburn Sisters. It was perfectly clear that all these letters were inspired, if not in some cases actually dictated, from Kilburn, and that while the direct evidence for which I had asked was withheld on one pretext or another, a childish attempt was being made to influence my opinion by this mechanical chorus of testimony from people totally ignorant of the facts. The letter from Sister Kate to the printer is, in the first place, of interest as showing how these letters were inspired, and the amount of respect to which they were entitled. But it has a value over and above this, for it shows that, while the inquiry which I had undertaken at their request was still incomplete, and while the negotiations for its completion were still pending, the Sisters were making a deliberate attempt to impose upon me with the testimony of a bogus witness; and, what is worse, they actually condescend to the depth of inciting a man in their own service to write, if not to utter, a falsehood for this dishonourable purpose.

Look again at the terms of Sister Kate's letter, and the elaborate instructions given for perpetrating this piece of imposture. This man is a paid workman in the employ of the Sisters. He is instructed to write to me "as an outsider." He is to conceal the fact that he knows and works at the Homes. He is to express his surprise at a "disgraceful attack," about which he knew little or nothing, and he, a workingman on 35s. per week, is to inform me that he is contemplating taking strong measures "to have up" the Charity Organisation Society for libel. He is at the same time to write and threaten the Charity Organisation Society itself with the same desperate intention. Evidently the Mother Superior had at this juncture great faith in the efficacy of threats of libel actions. It was just about this time that she confided to me the possibility of her having "to summon the libellers," and it was only a few weeks later that her solicitor delivered his historical threat to commence proceedings against me upon the first unfavourable reference to the Sisterhood in TRUTH. Finally, note the concluding suggestion that the printer should let Sister Kate have copies of the letters which he proposed to write to TRUTH and the Charity Organisation Society. If they had tried, how could these ladies possibly have made themselves more direct parties to the fraud?

I offer no further comment on this document. To all who can read it speaks for itself as to the spirit in which the Mother Superior had entered upon the inquiry which she invited me to conduct, and as to the amount of honour and straightforwardness which may be expected from this lady and her colleagues by those who have dealings with them.

KILBURN LITERATURE.

It has been remarked above that one of the means of defence to which the Sisters have resorted has been the dissemination of general denials, seasoned with lavish innuendo, in the miscellaneous literature issued from Kilburn. To go through everything of this kind that has appeared during the last six months would be a work requiring a supplement of TRUTH to itself. It is necessary to give the reader some idea of what the Sisters have been saying, but I shall not attempt to do more than pick out for this purpose a few samples taken almost at random from the journals, leaflets, and other publications issued by the Sisterhood. To begin with, the reader must understand that never from the moment when the TRUTH Report appeared has this journal been referred to in any of the Kilburn publications, nor has any single charge, allegation, or suggestion made in the TRUTH Report been definitely answered. All that will be found in the Kilburn literature is vague references to the enemies and accusers of the Sisterhood, to the slanderous falsehoods that have been uttered against them, coupled with subtle suggestions that the Sisters are being persecuted on religious grounds, either by "Puritans" or "infidels." To which of these classes I myself am supposed to belong, I am not clear; but, so far as I can judge from the different passages in which the term is used, I fancy that I must be the infidel.

Here is one of the earliest samples of the tactics of the Sisterhood. It is a slip which has been inserted in the monthly issue of Our Work. I first came across it in the September number :—

NOTICE.

Donations and subscriptions for the work of the Church Extension Association, gifts of old and new clothing, boots, toys, fancy work, &c., should be sent to

Miss F. Ashdown,
27, Kilburn Park-road,
London, N.W.

The Managers of the C.E.A. regret deeply that it is necessary to warn their many friends and well-wishers against an unscrupulous and unjustifiable attempt now being made to deprive the Society of funds by circulating reports which have no foundation in fact. All who desire to know the truth about this attempt to deprive our 700 children of "Daily Bread" are requested to call at the Orphanage of Mercy, when full information will be gladly supplied.

Well-wishers are requested to send to the Secretary, 27, Kilburn Park-road, for "The Kilburn Sisters and their Accusers," by the Commissioners of Church Bells. Price Sevenpence. Post free.

Note the language here. The sisters had asked me to investigate their work, in order to test certain allegations which had been made against them. I investigate as far as they will permit me, and find that they appear to have no valid answer to any one of the allegations, and I learn, in the course of my investigation, a great deal more than had originally been alleged against them. I publish the result of my investigation, as the Sisters themselves had at the outset agreed that I should do. And the only answer which the Sisters attempt is to warn their friends and well-wishers "against the unscrupulous and unjustifiable attempts now being made to deprive the Society of funds by circulating reports which have no foundation in fact."

In the same number of Our Work (September) appears an interesting appeal to readers of the magazine to enlist themselves as "allies and referees." The "referees" are to offer themselves as vouchers for the integrity of the Church Extension Association :—

The late cowardly and utterly untruthful attacks on the society, the attempt to deprive the many hundreds of children, under its care, of daily bread, renders (sic) it more than ever imperative that, not only at Kilburn, but all over the United Kingdom, there should be persons of unimpeachable reputation who, from personal knowledge, can refute the calumnious statements so industriously circulated by the slanderers of the C.E.A.

Those, therefore, who are willing to act as referees in this sense are invited to come and see for themselves the different works being carried on, and "examine the system of accounts, &c.," in order that they may be "able to answer questions put to them by those who have been puzzled and distressed by all the contradictory and extraordinary statements they have heard, and the hard things said against Kilburn."

This explains, I take it, the appearance of ladies in different parts of the country who undertake to answer the questions about Kilburn, like the Hon. Henrietta Windsor Clive at Birmingham. Miss Clive's correspondence, dealt with above, is dated, it will be noted, some two months subsequently to this appeal for "allies and referees." The above appeal also explains, I think, the conspicuous failure of Miss Clive to satisfy one of the very first inquirers who responded to her offer. Any one who knows anything of the case can see at a glance that a visit to Kilburn at the end of 1896 cannot possibly put the visitor in a position to answer the allegations of the Charity Organisation Society and of Truth, many of which relate to matters that occurred two or three years ago, while others cannot be in any way disposed of by a visit to Kilburn. It is necessary to insist upon this, because again and again throughout the Kilburn literature one sees this plausible argument "come and see, and judge for yourselves." The motive is obvious. There is a vast philanthropic and religious work being conducted at Kilburn, and, in the main, it is a very good work indeed, as long as you only look upon the surface; and a casual visitor, who only sees what the Sisters choose to show, may easily be impressed with the idea that anything that is said against the work must be false and calumnious. The Sisters tried their hardest to impress me in this way; but when they found that I was not satisfied with this, but insisted on coming to the specific allegations that have been made against them, they very quickly changed their attitude, withdrew from the inquiry which they had invited, and threatened me, through their solicitor, with an action for libel if I made public the result of my investigation. So it will be, I take it, with any one who goes to Kilburn with the idea of thoroughly sifting the case against the Sisters for himself. I would ask whether it is not a transparent absurdity, that, after having come to me in the way they did, and treated my response in the way they did, the Sisters should now pretend to answer me by inviting any believer in their innocence to pay a visit to Kilburn, and then undertake to satisfy the public that my Report on my own inquiries is a "cowardly and utterly untruthful attack on the society?"

Again, there has been organised from Kilburn a body styled the "C.E.A. Defence League," an article upon which appears in the November number of Our Work, where it is referred to as "The Slander-Slaying Society." The operations of the Slander-Slaying Society are thus described :—

The weapons of the League are Truth, Love, and Light. Wherever false statements, circulated by false tongues, meet them, these champions of truth make it a point of honour to contradict them, and expose their falseness by testifying to what they really know to be the truth.

It is somewhat curious that the testimony of these slander-slayers "to what they really know to be the truth," has not resulted down to the present moment in the refutation of a single allegation that has been made against the Sisterhood. Again :—

All questions sent to Headquarters by members of the League are answered fully. The Sisters hardly knew, until this infidel attack was made upon the Society, how many thousands of friends they have in all parts of the world.

I should very much like to see some of the answers which have been returned from "Headquarters" to questions sent by members of the League. I doubt not that the members of this League are, according to their lights, honourable ladies and gentlemen. On that assumption I will make them an offer. If they will allow me to draw up a series of questions, to be sent to "Headquarters" for an answer, I will undertake to publish every answer in Truth, even if it should be necessary to issue another special supplement for the purpose. It will be noted, by the way, that in the above paragraph "the infidel" appears upon the scene as the author of the attack upon the Sisters.

I call special attention to the following summary of the results already achieved by the Slander-Slaying Society :—

What a maze of groundless insinuations, imputed motives, foregone conclusions, harsh judgments, impudent lies, and even forged letters have, thanks to the untiring efforts of our League and other friends, been unravelled and exposed.

Indeed! it is the first that I have heard about it, and it seems to me much to be regretted, that if the Sisterhood have achieved these results, they should have insisted on keeping them strictly private. One would have thought that if this sort of thing is to be done, in the interests of truth and justice, to say nothing of the interest of the Sisterhood, it had best be done publicly. But not so think the Sisters. I suppose that when Sister May went down to refute Truth at Plymouth, she was contemplating a little exposure of this kind; yet when the newspaper reporter presents himself he is refused admittance, and when the Sister, who is coming to expose impudent lies and forged letters, cannot have a strictly private meeting for the purpose, she declines to speak at all. It is just as well to announce that the weapons of defence are not only Truth and Love, but also Light. But for this notification, it might have been supposed that the Sisters chiefly believed in the advantages of darkness.

The above is the first public reference that I have seen to "forged letters." What letters are suggested to have been forged, or who has forged them, I do not know. It is characteristic of the tactics of Kilburn to utter insinuations of this kind in such a vague way that there is no possibility of grappling with them. But in view of this insinuation, I have taken the trouble, as the reader has seen, to reproduce in facsimile two of the more important of the letters of which I am making use in this article. I now challenge Miss Ayckbowm, the Mother Superior, who is, I understand, personally responsible for everything appearing in Our Work, to deny, if she can, the genuineness of either of these letters. They are letters which, if genuine, convict her and two of her senior Sisters of the grossest duplicity and falsehood. The letter of Sister May completely disproves the statement made from Kilburn to the Western Morning News, and subsequently repeated in Our Work, that the Plymouth meeting was organised without any sanction from Kilburn, and even without the knowledge of the Sisters. The letter of Sister Kate to the printer shows the Mother Superior herself, by the pen of one of the senior Sisters, inciting one of her employees to an attempt to impose upon me, in the course of an investigation which I had undertaken at the request of the Mother Superior herself. It also affords strong evidence that statements respecting the condition of Sister Kate, which had been made to me by the Mother Superior and by Sisters May and Frances, were, if not absolutely false, such gross exaggerations as to be morally indistinguishable from falsehoods. I venture to suggest to Miss Ayckbowm that while such documentary evidence exists of the gross disregard of truth of which she and her colleagues have been guilty, she would do better to keep silence than to impute in her magazine lying and forgery to those whom she cannot answer in any other way.

There is a great deal more in the Kilburn literature which I had contemplated dealing with, more especially certain shuffling misrepresentations and evasions of the truth which have been put forth in the form of "dialogues." But, after what I have quoted, is it worth while to go further? Such stuff as this can convince no one who has studied the controversy, or has any glimmering of the real facts at issue. It is addressed only to silly and deluded people, women for the most part, who are incapable of judging evidence, or following a controversy, and who are guided by sentiment rather than by reason. To any one else, a study of the utterances which have issued from Kilburn during the last few months can be nothing less than sickening. The Mother Superior, and her advisers in the disastrous policy which she has adopted, seem to think that definite and specific allegations against their own conduct can be best answered by the most extravagant laudation of their own work, their own self-devotion, and their own righteousness. Column after column of unrestrained eulogy of the Sisterhood, written, be it remembered, by the Sisters themselves, is every month offered to their supporters and admirers. Running through it all there is an incessant harping on religious motives, a lavish interjection of religious phrases and allusions, which, when read with what has happened at Kilburn, and with such revelations of the true character of the writers as I am offering to the reader to-day, can only cause any one who has any regard for the nobility of the religious life, or who even possesses a spark of religious sentiment in his own breast, to shut the page in disgust. If it were true, as the Sisters assert, that any infidel has made an attack upon them, I can only say that they are providing the infidel with a rich feast, and placing a store of deadly weapons at his disposal.

I have now shown—fully enough, I hope, to satisfy all—what the general attitude of the Sisterhood has been towards the exposure which inflicted so heavy a blow upon it six months ago. If only those who are interested in the question, and desire to arrive at the truth, will study the facts and arguments in the foregoing columns, they cannot fail to read the moral which I have drawn from it, namely, that the small "ring" of ladies now ruling this vast institution is totally unworthy of confidence in any shape. I will only add that I adhere to everything that I have said on former occasions both as to the merits and the possibilities of much of the work which the Sisters have undertaken, and as to the complete innocence of the greater number of the Sisters of all responsibility for the scandals that have arisen. Although I am compelled to speak in almost every line of the "Kilburn Sisters" or "the Sisterhood" as having done this, that, or the other, and although the Community as a body has to bear the reproach and disgrace of all that has been done in its name, yet the fact is that the initiative and active direction of the work, so far as the outside public see it, is absolutely in the hands of the Mother Superior and the small clique of Sisters who are admitted to her confidence. Upon these few alone rests the moral blame for every administrative mistake that has been made, and every artifice, subterfuge, and falsehood that has been resorted to for the purpose of concealing these mistakes and averting any reform of the Community. Now that the character of these proceedings is so plainly apparent, it seems incredible that those who appreciate the value of such religious associations should not unite with the ecclesiastical authorities in taking drastic measures to terminate what has become a scandal to the Church of England.

ENTRE NOUS.

It will be impossible to publish the Award of Prizes given in connection with the recent Truth Toy and Doll Show until next week. I regret the delay, for I know how eagerly many of my fair readers are expecting that list; but the fact is that the report of the Committee of Ladies who so kindly assist me by making the adjudication has not yet reached me. Last week, it will be remembered, was a very broken one, thanks to the Christmas festivities; and the non-arrival of the expected report is doubtless due more or less directly to that cause. Several letters which have been sent to me containing corrections of certain details in the published account of the Show at the Albert Hall will be also dealt with next week.

Just a word, however, in answer to the correspondents who write to express regret that a small charge for admission to the Toy and Doll Show was not levied at the doors of the Albert Hall. As I have explained before, it is impossible, under the conditions on which that building is placed at my disposal, to make any charge at the doors.

On the Wednesday before Christmas day the representatives of the London Workhouses, Workhouse Schools, and Workhouse Infirmaries attended at Truth Office in order to receive the proportion of the 11,000 new silver sixpences due to their respective institutions. The total number of coins thus distributed was only 10,777, owing to a miscalculation made at the last moment by one of the officials. The amount represented by the balance of 223 sixpences, viz., £5. 11s. 6d., has, therefore, with the approval of the generous donor of the 11,000 sixpences been carried to the credit of the Truth Toy Fund.

Since I last wrote about the state of that Fund, some further donations have been received, but the balance is still on the wrong side. I should like, before I publish the usual annual statement of accounts, to be able to report that this debit balance had been wiped out. The following are the sums received since the last list was published:—

Faith, £1; H. W. B., £5; Elmfield, 10s.; Anonymously from Orleans Club, £1; B. B., £1. 1s.; R. H., £1; R. S. B., £1; Ghena, £1; W. R. B., £1; X. Y. Z., 10s.; Rita, Concie, and Ernest, £1. 10s.; Benton House, £3. 3s.; R. G. M., 2s. 6d.; Miss Lilian Duffield, £2; R. H., 2s. 6d.; Mrs. K., £1; E. C. F. James, £1; Joseph Pulitzer, £20; Friends Abroad, £1; Mrs. Porcher, £2; A Schoolboy, 2s.; D. and E., New York, £3. 3s.; Mrs. Askew, £1. 1s.; M. W. C., 12s.

I have also received a box of dolls from "Birdie," a quantity of badges anonymously, and a box of toys and apples from Mrs. Lang.

There are one or two publications which make it their business to manufacture all kinds of romances about Royal personages. The readers of a certain magazine are informed, for example, that the Prince of Wales "is a very expert shoemaker," and that H.R.H. has worn "shoes of his own make which were the envy of every gentleman who saw them;" besides which, "he is an expert judge of other people's work." It is difficult to imagine where the people are to be found (outside of lunatic asylums) who take pleasure in reading such idiotic trash.

During the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland at Trentham next week they will take part in public functions at Fenton and at Longton.

Princess Beatrice is going to Italy at the end of January, and she will visit Rome and Naples, returning about the middle of March to Cimiez, where the Queen will by that time have arrived. Princess Louis of Battenberg (who has gone from Darmstadt to Malta for the winter) will probably meet Princess Beatrice at Naples, and accompany her during her tour.

The question of the origin of the practice of walking backwards before royalty, discussed some time back in these columns, has since been further ventilated on the other side of the world, in the columns of the Siam Free Press. Some new and interesting theories have thus been added to the literature of this important subject. One of the best is given by a learned writer calling himself "Historicus." He traces the origin of the custom to a sad accident which befell a somewhat corpulent subject of the Danish King Sweyn while kneeling before his sovereign. He gives as his authority the following passage, purporting to come from an ancient chronicler, and as the incident is one of some delicacy, perhaps the story had better be left in the chronicler's own words. The chronicler's Latin looks to me a little weak in one or two places, but that is nothing unusual, and, besides, this may have been a Siamese chronicler :—

Incola, vestitus pantalone angusto, appropinquavit regi, et coram eo genua flexit. In hac positione infelix pantalonis sedem splitavit. Statim, conditione cognita, ad regem spectans retrogressus est loco calamitatis, hoc modo ab visu regis latente et ab oculis vulgaris manibus ipsius tecto. Hinc dicitur consuetudo coram regibus retrogressus orta est.

The weather in Dublin did not keep up the Christmas tradition, but was bright, breezy, and mild. With the mildness of the temperature the Yule log, like the mistletoe, was rather for ornament than use. Christmas was kept in the old-fashioned way at the Viceregal Lodge, all the members of Lord and Lady Cadogan's family being assembled there on Christmas Day. On St. Stephen's Day the Lord Lieutenant and a large Viceregal party attended the Leopardstown race meeting. These races are a late institution; and whether an open-air social festivity of the kind can be classed as an amusement at this season is much to be doubted. Though the weather was mild and bright at times, at others a strong gale blew, with rain accompanying it.

Lord and Lady Dufferin with their family are spending Christmas at Clandeboye, their residence in the county Down, from which they have been so long absent, during Lord Dufferin's holding of office in so many parts of the world. Clandeboye is quite a museum of interesting objects presented to, and collected by, Lord Dufferin in the different countries in which his official lot has been cast. Lord Londonderry is expected to pay his usual visit to the county Down in January, when he will make a short stay at Mount Stewart. During the time he will entertain a succession of guests, and some evening parties will be given, at which the neighbourhood in general will be entertained.

A WORD OF WARNING.

Next year, all loyal Englishmen will join, with ardour keen,
To celebrate the record reign of their belovéd Queen.
Widespread will be the wish to mark in some appropriate way
The culminating point in her benign and glorious sway.

So far, so good; by all means let us fitly celebrate
What, in the annals of our land, will be so famed a date;
By all means let us to the world in joy and pride make known
That as our liberty 's increased our loyalty has grown.

But let us one and all beware of those whose selfish aim
'Twill surely be to make our zeal redound to their own fame;
Of those whose purpose it will be, persistent and adroit,
The loyal feeling of the land to shamelessly exploit.

Already they have set to work, already we can see How bold in their self-seeking aims 'tis their intent to be;
By modesty they are unchecked, by scruples unrestrained
They'll stop at nothing if thereby their ends can be attained.

Beware, then, of this fussy crew, who never, never miss
Their chance for pushing to the front at such a time as this!
Beware these wily sycophants! Beware the crawling group
Of those who, socially to rise, care nothing how they stoop!

Beware the plans they organise! Beware the schemes they float!
Beware of the subscriptions they will speciously promote!
And should they dun you for your help, refuse to give your aid
To those who would your loyalty to their base ends degrade.

Already they are hard at work; already there are signs
They mean to "boom" the "record reign" on their own selfish lines;
Take, then, to heart this warning note, and let these toadies see
That you are wiser now than when they worked the "Jubilee!"

Lord Normanton was a genial and hospitable man, fond of pictures and books, a very good talker, an excellent whist player, and a capital rider. His death is sincerely regretted by a very large circle of friends and neighbours, and notably by his numerous tenants, to whom he was always very liberal. Lord Normanton lived a great deal at Somerley, his beautiful place on the Avon, above Ringwood, which is let for the shooting season to Baron Erlanger. He was a distinguished dandy in early life, and he was one of the founders of the once famous Coventry Club, which is now represented by the St. James's.

Lord Normanton had no taste for political affairs, and he never took any active part in public life, but for eleven years he represented Wilton as a Conservative and a supporter of Sir Robert Peel, having been returned for that borough in 1841 by the interest of his friend, Sydney Herbert.

Sir Arthur Sullivan, who went direct to Nice when he left London, has taken a villa at Beaulieu until the end of April.

The French are evidently determined to deserve success at Henley, even if they cannot command it. A rowing man, wintering in Paris, tells me that the French eight for the Grand Challenge Cup is already rowing twice a week, and is to be out every day after February next. Staleness evidently has no terrors for French trainers and coaches.

Have they in Aberdeen a police des mœurs, charged with the duty of looking after all the crews of the ships lying in port? Apropos of the recent case of the Norwegian skipper, whose cabin was entered by the police in order to ascertain whether the lady occupying it was his wife, I hear a precisely similar story from a gentleman who was yachting in that part of the world some little time back. The yacht stayed at Aberdeen for a couple of days, and the owner went on shore with his wife one night to dine at an hotel. As the party returned on board, they were followed by the police, who were anxious to know the precise status of the lady. They seem to have behaved quite respectfully, and accepted the owner's assurance without actually insisting on seeing the lady's marriage lines. The fact, however, of the duty being discharged with delicacy does not make it the less offensive.

"You would be doing a kindness," wrote an unknown correspondent to me the other day, "if you would persuade people at this time of year to pay their doctors' bills within a reasonable time of their becoming due." Although it comes anonymously, I venture to break through my usual rule by giving this suggestion publicity. Perhaps, while I am about it, I may as well suggest that people should pay all their bills as promptly as possible. There are many, however, who, while perfectly regular in paying other debts, habitually neglect the unfortunate doctor. There seems to be a sort of idea that a doctor's fees are not a legal debt, and that it is quite a favour to pay them any time within a year or two of the date of the attendance for which they are charged. This is an entire delusion, and it puts many a struggling practitioner to great inconvenience and loss, and, what is more, I believe it drives not a few into the toils of the advertising moneylender.

One of these gentry, referred to in a recent issue of Truth, is at the present moment particularly active in his pursuit of the needy medico. He calls himself Richard Pelham. According to his own account, he has "for many years past made considerable advances to the medical profession upon simple note of hand alone, without"—so guileless and generous is he—"inquiries, fees, or routine whatever." Who would let his doctor's bill stand when he reflects that the result may be to drive the medico into the clutches of harpies of this class?

I have intercepted the following letter, and publish it to show once again the degree of guileless simplicity that flourishes among us, and the utter futility of all attempts to enlighten it. Without boasting, I suppose I may say that Truth has done more than most papers to warn people of the folly of putting faith in "systems" of gambling, whether on the turf or elsewhere. Yet this simpleton actually singles out Truth as the paper to assist him in raising a little capital to start himself in business by means of a judicious system of betting. It would serve him right if I published his name:—

To the Sporting Editor of Truth.

Dear Sir,—Would you mind telling me whether there is more than one favourite at each race? (I mean a horse on which the betting odds are lowest. Is there more than one horse, say, "even on," or "2 to 1 on," &c.?)

I must raise some capital to start myself in business, and it is evident from a careful study of the evening papers that by betting for one profit a day of, say, £10 on the favourite in each race is a safe venture.

By results, there is nearly always one favourite won—quite six out of seven days—so what you lose on one race you put on the next, plus ten, for your profit.

It is not my intention to get a living at this, but I must get some capital.

Hope you will be able to oblige.

A country reader of Truth recently sent me a cutting from his local paper as evidence that the remarks in these columns on the practice of publishing advertisements in the guise of news have not been heeded by this particular offender. Evil habits, I fear, are not so easily eradicated, especially when there is a question of pounds, shillings, and pence at the bottom of them. But my friend in the West was wrong in imputing special blame in this respect to one particular journal. It is a vice that has crept into journalism of recent years, and, with the multiplication of newspapers and the increase of competition among them, it has spread of late with alarming rapidity. It is not confined to the provinces; one sees examples of it occasionally in London of an evening, and very frequently in the Sunday papers. The trick is sometimes performed so cleverly as to deceive the very elect. Only a few Sundays ago I commenced to read an article, headed like those preceding and following it, and imitating the style of the distinguished editor so closely, that I had got to the end of the first paragraph before I discovered that I was reading, not the outpouring of my distinguished friend's mellifluous pen, but that of the proprietor of a famous quack remedy.

This sort of thing is a discredit to journalism, and tends to lower the character and influence of the whole Press. I would seriously suggest to my brother journalists that they should make a united effort to purge themselves of this sin. Individual editors are, for the most part, powerless to make a stand. The evil began, I suppose, with some impecunious proprietor of a small paper, who found he could only obtain advertisements by allowing them to masquerade as editorial matter. The example once set, one paper after another has been compelled, under stress of competition, to give way, and every time an editor falls, the position of those who hold out becomes weaker, and the demands of advertisers become stronger. Those of us who are still holding the fort may now be counted on your fingers. It behoves us to rally our beaten comrades.

What I would point out to my contemporaries is that their subserviency to advertising agents does them, in the long run, no more good with advertisers than it does with the public. The truth which newspaper proprietors and managers overlook is that by converting a journal into an advertising sheet you destroy its value as an advertising medium, just in proportion as you degrade it as a journal. From my own experience, I should say that by keeping a tight hand on the advertising element, and laying down certain limits which are not to be overstepped at any price, you will in the end be able to do better business than by conveying the impression that you are ready to sell yourself, columns, cover, and contents-bill, to the advertising agent who offers the highest price. This I say, not in a boasting spirit, but in the hope that my experience may encourage my contemporaries to make themselves a little less cheap.

Look at the lady who graces the front page of TRUTH. No one but myself knows the price at which that spotless female might have been sold. I might have put her into a corset which would have been worth many times its weight in gold. Her chaste gown I could let out at a fabulous sum per inch. During the "Trilby" boom a couple of small fortunes might have been obtained for the use of her classical feet. Her mirror, as an advertising agent once told me, looks as if it had been made to proclaim the virtues of Somebody's Pills, and her lamp to illustrate the latest thing in incandescent light; while the spotless background behind her might easily be filled with cigarettes, tea, tooth-powder, soap, and bicycles, until the lady herself had become a mere item in a commercial catalogue, like poor old Punch on his front page. But should I have profited in the end by this desecration? I fancy not. At any rate, I have too much respect for the lady to put her up for auction. My readers may rest assured that she is safe. I would sooner walk about with an advertisement on my hat.

I see it is announced that the collection of Carlyle relics at the house in Cheyne-row has received a valuable addition in the shape of the bed in which Mrs. Carlyle was born It would be interesting to learn how the piece of furniture can possibly be identified after the lapse of nearly a century, especially as it appears to be an ordinary bedstead of the huge old-fashioned style. When Sir David Brewster's "Life of Newton" was published he expressed doubts as to the story of the falling apple having given to Sir Isaac his first ideas of gravity. Mr. Folkes, President of the Royal Society, confirmed the legend by stating that "he saw the apple tree in 1814, and brought away a portion of one of its roots." As Newton's apple is supposed to have fallen in 1665, a famous critic observed that the evidence of Mr. Folkes reminded him of the story of Washington Irving's hero, who boasted of having parried a musket bullet with a small sword, in proof of which he exhibited the sword in question, a little bent in the hilt! I dare say that the identity of Mrs. Carlyle's natal bed would be established by evidence of much the same skimble-skamble kind.

The overcrowding of the Bodleian Library is a question which will demand the serious attention of the University authorities at Oxford before many months have elapsed. The Radcliffe, the basement of the Sheldonian Theatre, and the basement of the Ashmolean Museum are all crammed with books belonging to the Bodleian; and what is to become of the shoals of volumes which are daily arriving at the library, and for which there is no sort of accommodation? Things have now come to such a pass that it will be absolutely necessary for the University authorities to make up their minds whether the Bodleian is to continue to be a receptacle for every description of literature, like the British Museum, or if it is to be a library for the use of bonâ fide scholars, which is what its founder unquestionably intended it to be. There is really no object in making the Bodleian a second permanent storehouse for all the ephemeral rubbish which is now being daily printed.

of Schools in the Principality. The late Chief Inspector was a thorough Welshman, and the Education Department has for a long time past recognised the importance, if not the necessity, of having Welsh-speaking Inspectors, if the duties are to be performed satisfactorily. The present appointment is a retrograde step, and cannot fail to have a bad effect on educational administration in Wales; while it is absolutely without excuse, there being several Welsh-speaking Inspectors fully qualified by scholarship and experience for the post. The present Government seems fated to discredit itself in every matter relating to public education.

The papers, in reporting the confirmation of Archbishop Temple's "election" to the See of Canterbury, state that "all patronage that accrues to the Archbishopric now passes from the Crown to the new Primate." This is quite wrong, for the patronage of the See remains with the Crown until after the Archbishop has done homage to the Queen for his temporalities. This ceremony, which occupies about five minutes, will take place at Osborne, under the supervision of the Bishop of Winchester, the Clerk of the Closet.

Archdeacon Furse is to be the Canon in residence at Westminster Abbey during January, and he will preach on Sunday afternoons throughout the month. Canon Gore is to occupy the pulpit next Sunday, at the first of the special evening services in the choir.

Canon Taylor Smith, who has been appointed Honorary Chaplain to the Queen (preliminary to his becoming Chaplain-in-Ordinary), is the clergyman who attended Prince Henry of Battenberg during his last illness, and he came back to England with the Prince's body. Canon Smith has returned to his missionary work in Africa for the present by his own wish, but I hear that the Queen intends soon to offer him some desirable preferment, and a good living would have been placed at his disposal some time ago, if he had desired to remain at home.

Canon Scott-Holland is to be in residence at St. Paul's Cathedral during January, and he will preach on Sunday afternoons throughout the month.

The rectory of Long Marton, near Penrith, which is the most valuable living in Westmoreland, being worth about £800 a year, with residence, has been placed at the disposal of Lord Hothfield by the death of the Rev. H. M. Erskine, who had held the benefice since 1874, and had been more than sixty years in orders.

Much regret has been excited in Scotland by the death, after only three days' illness, of Dr. Anderson, who had been for forty-three years the popular, zealous, and successful "minister" of Kinnoull Church, Perth. Dr. Anderson, who was a man of wide sympathies, was a most admirable preacher and writer. He was for many years a regular contributor to Fraser's Magazine in its great days, and he wrote frequently for the Field. Dr. Anderson was several times offered some of the most important churches in Edinburgh and Glasgow, but he had no taste for a town life.

For a vicar to dismiss a schoolmistress because she is the friend of another teacher whom the vicar's curate has determined to marry surely marks the culminating point of clerical tyranny. Incredible as it may seem, this was indicated by Mr. Yoxall, M.P., in a speech at Grimsby the other day, as the real reason for the dismissal of Miss Middleton, the mistress of the St. Andrew's Girls' School in that town. According to Mr. Yoxall, the curate of the parish was engaged to be married to the mistress of the infants' school, but the vicar disapproved of the match. In consequence of his disapproval, not only had the curate and his fiancée to leave, but when Miss Middleton showed her sympathy for her fellow-teacher she was also dismissed. It is only right to say that the vicar altogether denies this, and alleges that Miss Middleton was dismissed because she was "not equal to the advancing requirements of the code, particularly in regard to pupil teachers." On the other hand, the crowded public indignation meeting at which Mr. Yoxall spoke appears to have accepted his version of the affair, and a resolution was unanimously carried condemning the vicar for dismissing Miss Middleton "capriciously and without reasonable cause."

From another point of view the meeting at Grimsby was full of interest. It brought out an effective proof of the rottenness of the pretence that the so-called voluntary schools are supported by voluntary contributions. The last balance-sheet of the St. Andrew's School shows that the total income for the year was £1,025 odd. Of this sum no less than £911. 18s. came from Government, £103. 13s. 6d. was received from parents in school pence, and the remaining £10, paid as "rent" by the Sunday school, was actually the only sum received from a private source. What is more, the managers of this Church school cannot even plead that they provide the building and fittings free, for the items on the other side of the account include £124. 14s. 3d. for rent, £39. 7s. 8d. for replacement of furniture and repairs, and £70. 10s. 4d. for fuel, light, and cleaning. I fancy it would puzzle Mr. Balfour to say where the "intolerable strain" on the "supporters" of voluntary schools comes in here.

Here is a little rider to the history of the Shrewsbury church spire and the Darwin memorial. I am told that while it is undoubtedly true that the steeple was damaged by the storm, and also that the Darwin memorial was then in contemplation, it is also true that the parson of the damaged church was the only one in Shrewsbury who had not subscribed to the memorial. I cannot say whether this is true, but it ought to be.

Champions of the Scottish "Sawbath" have indulged in many fearful and wonderful ebullitions of bitterness and fanaticism, but never have I seen anything quite equal to the outpouring of a correspondent at Gartcosh, near Coatbridge, which was published last week in the Glasgow Herald. This individual, who signs his letter "Sixth Commandment," has been indescribably shocked by the fact that crowds of people were skating on the lochs in his neighbourhood on the previous Sunday. He traces this desecration of the Lord's Day to the evil influence exercised by the recent action of "a Godless Town Council (Glasgow)" in permitting Sunday bathing. The letter proceeds:—

During the great frost of two winters ago I do not remember on a single occasion having seen Sunday skaters on any of these lochs; and yet, after a lapse of barely twenty-four months, we have a sight calculated, I say, if the present frosty weather continues, to warm not a few hearts in Hell. Fortunately or unfortunately, the ice proved to be of more than ordinary Sabbath endurance, and the country has been spared the harrowing details of an awful disaster, which yet, if looked at from another standpoint, might have proved to be a salutary example and warning. Verb. sap.

I should like to think that these amiable and truly Christian remarks were not meant seriously, but, unfortunately, the tone of the whole letter, coupled with what I know of the extreme lengths to which Sabbatarian bigotry carries some of the "unco' guid," precludes that charitable idea.

On the question of the legal right of a beneficed clergyman of the Established Church to refuse to marry a couple on the ground that one of them is unbaptised, a legal correspondent writes:—

I have searched "Blunt's Church Law" and "Hook's Church Dictionary" (two works both very unlikely not to mention the High Church view of the question, if there be any), and can find no trace of baptism being considered a condition precedent to marriage; nor is there any trace of such a consideration to be found in the Canons, much less in the Marriage Acts.

The proper legal conclusion appears to be that it is an ecclesiastical-offence for a clergyman to refuse to marry an unbaptised person; and that for this offence he could be proceeded against under the Church Discipline Act, 1840, though not under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892.

If there is any doubt on this point it ought to be settled one way or another, as in a country like this there may be many unbaptised persons—whether or not professing Christians—who may desire to get married, and who ought not to be thwarted in that desire, if they have been fully advised of the many risks attaching to the step which they propose to take.

In a letter that he has addressed to an Abingdon paper, the Rev. Wentworth Watson, who has raised this question, declares that even if "the law" requires him to celebrate such a marriage, he is sure the law of the Gospel and the Church is on his side, and that he cannot do violence to his conscience and his sense of duty. With all respect to the reverend gentleman's conscientious scruples, in his capacity of minister of a Church which is established and regulated by law, he is in a sense a public official, and if he cannot obey the law in discharging his official functions, his duty is clearly to resign his office and his emoluments. Such a sacrifice to conscience will greatly increase the respect felt for his scruples.

My correspondents will not, I hope, be surprised at finding a great many communications received this week unattended to in this number of TRUTH. The fact is that I have been taking a holiday, and so have my staff—a very well earned holiday, too, I venture to think. The result of this is a large accumulation of correspondence, which I shall do my best to wipe off in the course of the next week or two.

I would specially ask my Army correspondents to note the foregoing remarks, and extend to me their kind indulgence under the unprecedented flood of communications with which they have favoured me during the last two or three weeks. To deal with the whole of the military matters which I now have on hand will, I fear, be out of the question; still, I can assure my military friends that each letter as it arrives is numbered and placed in a box marked "urgent," and that each one will receive my best attention in its turn.

A good deal of interest seems to be felt among military men in the question how far the efficiency of the British officer is affected by his possessing artificial teeth. I gave the other day an alarming picture, sent to me by a correspondent, of the rout and destruction of a British Army through the General having, so to speak, put his teeth out to wash before turning in for the night. In view of this suggestion, it is reassuring to find a retired officer pronouncing that a man may find artificial teeth a distinct advantage on active service. It is perfectly possible, says this officer, to munch the Service biscuit with artificial teeth, and they are better adapted than the natural molars for negotiating tinned beef, especially when it has become dry and stringy in a hot climate. Speaking from personal experience, this officer asserts that he has found tinned beef in Egypt and the Soudan most disastrous in its effects upon natural teeth, whereas artificial grinders were not in any way affected by it.

This is one of those questions upon which, sitting in an armchair at home, I do not feel qualified to speak very positively; but I have known men who had not a sound tooth in their heads at five-and-twenty who have yet managed to acquit themselves successfully in all sorts of walks in life, and in all parts of the world; and I see nothing in military service which would place such men under any special disadvantage as soldiers. Anyhow, it is quite certain that a man may have a fairly good set of teeth at twenty, and have lost the best part of them by five-and-thirty. If, therefore, sound natural teeth are indispensable to an officer in the Army, it is certainly not enough to reject candidates for defective teeth at their entrance examinations. Every Colonel and General ought to have his mouth inspected annually, and to be placed on the retired list at once, if the dental officer's report is not satisfactory.

Among all sections of the Army there is a growing feeling of disgust at the incessant chopping and changing of uniforms and accoutrements, and the unnecessary expense thereby imposed upon officers. The public little consider what these changes mean to officers, or public opinion would peremptorily stop all this fooling. I was talking the other day to a friend who had to provide himself with a new busby, or some such article of head-gear, and he told me that from beginning to end, including two journeys to London in connection with it, his new hat had cost him £15. This was not the fault of the War Office, but it gives an idea of the extent of the expenditure involved in every change in an officer's uniform. A major recently wrote to me from India, growling over the fact that he had had to discard his brass scabbard and brass spurs as a field officer, and provide himself with steel spurs and the new pattern regulation sword. The complainant pointed out various objections to these fiddle-faddling changes, but of course the pecuniary grievance is the worst one. The evil will never be stopped as long as each new comer at the War Office is left free to alter and re-alter the dress of the Army according to his own caprice. Parliament ought to take the matter in hand, and make some regulations to ensure continuity and permanence in these matters.

The latest thing that the Army Pay Corps has come to TRUTH for is a new uniform. It is rather a large order, but I recognise that I have brought it on myself by a rash expression which I used the other day, and which indicated that I thought I had got to the end of the A.P.C. grievances. The fault found with the uniform is that it is "too conspicuous." "We cannot walk out," writes an N.C.O. of this unhappy corps, "without being stared at, and, what is worse, insulted by the remarks of outsiders." Before expressing any opinion on this matter I should like to know whether all the members of the corps have the same objection to being stared at. A soldier's clothes are usually somewhat "conspicuous," but hitherto there has been an idea that soldiers rather liked this than otherwise. Perhaps, however, the A.P.C. do not wish to be regarded as soldiers. Anyhow, I feel confident that representations on this subject at headquarters will meet with all possible attention. It would be a great day for some of our military administrators if they had the chance of designing a new set of uniforms for a whole corps.

There is some dissatisfaction among the unmarried sergeants on the Permanent Staff of the 3rd Gordon Highlanders at the way the quarters are allotted. As I understand the case, two unmarried men are lodged in each set of married apartments. The one who gets the sitting-room is all right; but the man who gets the kitchen does not get a scrap of furniture, and has to warm himself during the winter at a closed range or kitchener. No doubt any gallant warrior could put up with worse discomfort than this if there were a necessity for it; but the point in this case seems to be that there is no necessity. The married quarters are half vacant and shut up. The single men were distributed among them until a few weeks back, and there seems to have been no reason but red tape for removing them.

Is it necessary to send out a regimental football team like a party of schoolboys in charge of an usher? Such seems to be the view of some exalted authority at Aldershot, and, in accordance with it, a team from the Seaforth Highlanders, who went to play a match at Andover on Christmas-day, were sent off in charge of a subaltern, although there were three sergeants of irreproachable character in the team. Probably the officer disliked the job as much as his men, and possibly he may have vented his disgust at the men's expense. At any rate, he kept them as close under his eye all day as if he had been a chaperon convoying a party of flighty maidens; and when, having to wait three-quarters of an hour at the station on their return journey, the men took refuge in the refreshment-room, he promptly fetched them out and made them stand on the platform till the train came up. In addition to this, he seems to have reported the senior sergeant for entering the refreshment-room, and on the following morning this man was brought before the Commanding Officer and "severely reprimanded." As an ignorant civilian, all this strikes me as very childish, and not exactly the way to manage grown men. If three sergeants cannot be trusted to keep ten or a dozen men in hand on an excursion of this kind, discipline must be rather slack in the Seaforth Highlanders.

A paragraph in a local paper the other day stated that out of 691 tramps relieved at Winchester Workhouse in eight weeks 163 were discharged soldiers. It would be difficult to find a more striking proof of the necessity of doing something to put Tommy in the way of earning his living when he takes his discharge. In connection with this matter, I should like to know whether more encouragement cannot be given to pensioners to take up grants of land from those Colonial Governments which offer them, either free or on very easy terms. For instance, a retired quartermaster-sergeant complains to me very bitterly that he has been refused permission to commute his pension in order to emigrate to Canada, where he could have got a free grant of land sufficient to provide a very good living for himself and his family. I perfectly understand the difficulty in the way of commuting pensions, where a man has not an offer of permanent employment which will preclude the probability of his relapse into pauperism, and his possible return to England in that condition. But if a man has a wife and family, and they are all strong and active, there is hardly any direction in which you can more securely settle him for life than by giving him a few acres of land, with sufficient capital to keep him on his legs until he has made a start. There are risks about it, of course, but so there are about every possible employment which a man may take up in the colonies.

On what principle are a master shoemaker, and a cook and baker, when employed as instructors at the Gordon Boys' Home, required to belong to the Church of England? Such is the condition prescribed in an advertisement of these posts in Aldershot District Orders. Is the shoemaker concerned with the souls of the boys as well as the soles of their boots? Or is it feared that a Nonconformist baker might surreptitiously introduce the leaven of Dissent into their bread? It seems a childish and misplaced ebullition of sectarianism, any way.

"A rumour has reached us," writes a correspondent from Cairo, "that no English medals are to be given to the troops engaged in the recent Dongola expedition," and the writer goes on to express incredulity at such "extraordinary meanness." Under ordinary circumstances there would not be any legitimate ground for issuing a British medal in connection with the Dongola operations. It was not, nominally at any rate, a British expedition. The troops taking part in it were not for the time in the service of the British Government. Whatever decoration is given ought, therefore, to come from the Egyptian Government, in whose service the troops were. At the same time, the reckless profusion with which honours and rewards have been distributed by the British Government among the higher ranks of officers who took part in the expedition, will naturally cause a feeling throughout the whole force that every Briton engaged has a claim on his native land for some recognition of his services. With this feeling I entirely sympathise, and, as the Government distributed honours wholesale to the upper ranks, they had better follow it up by giving a medal to everybody who took part in the expedition. Though why on earth any soldier should covet a reward of this kind after the Ashantee star tomfoolery I am at a loss to understand.

If any decoration should be distributed in connection with the Soudan operations, I would put in a word on behalf of the officers and crew of H.M.S. Melita, which was stationed at Suakim from March 22 to July 4, and during that time rendered very considerable services. At the time when she arrived the Dervishes were threatening the town, and the presence of the Melita kept them at a distance, and enabled the Egyptian garrison of Suakim to be sent to the front; and, in addition to this, the Melita's men had a long spell of very hard work, day and night, in disembarking the Indian contingent and its stores. Here is an excellent opportunity for breaking the bad tradition which excludes the Navy and Marines from any recognition for the services they render on occasions like this.

At a State Ball representatives of the Army and Navy appear in uniform, and I daresay that many ladies would consider it an attractive feature in their entertainments if their Service guests would always come in their full war paint. This feeling, however, does not extend to the lower strata of society, for a soldier has just sent me an indignant protest against his exclusion from a dancing academy in the Edgware-road, solely on account of his presenting himself in uniform. As it is hardly practicable to interfere with the discretions of dancing-masters in admitting whom they please to their academies, I can only recommend my military friends to look upon the proceeding as a genuine compliment to the Army. No doubt, if Tommies in uniform were admitted to dancing academies, the civilian element would be very much at a discount; and I expect that, in turning away soldiers, the proprietor was only protecting the interests of his black-coated patrons.

Tommy's walking-stick again! The men of the 1st Bedfordshire Regiment complain forcibly about a regimental order requiring every man to furnish himself with a cane from the armourer's shop at the price of 12 annas, when a perfectly serviceable article can be obtained in the bazaar for 2 annas. The difference between the two articles seems to be that the regimental cane has a crest on the knob. What on earth does it matter whether Tommy has the regimental crest on his walking-stick or not? Clearly it doesn't matter to him. If it matters to somebody else, then that somebody else ought to pay for the decoration—not Tommy.

Apropos of Tommy's wardrobe, here is a growl from the Royal Artillery. A forage cap, which is only worn for "walking out," is served out every year; while a field-service cap, which is worn every day for fatigues and drill, is only renewed once in three years. Here, at any rate, is an anomaly which can be put right without any addition to the Army Estimates.

In a battalion now at Aldershot (the 1st South Staffordshire) there are about 600 N.C.O.s and men contributing 2d. per month to the library—say £5 per month, altogether. more than 16s. per month. What becomes of the balance of the library subscriptions? It is natural that the men should ask this question, and a proper account ought certainly to be published, if only to preclude unfavourable suspicions.

In spite of protests from every quarter, the stupid project of building a Naval Cadets' College at Dartmouth is to be persisted in. Not content with this blunder, the Admiralty, instead of inviting some of the leading architects to send in designs for the building, have had plans prepared by their own Works Department, and they are so scandalously bad that they have been unhesitatingly condemned by every one who has seen them. It may be hoped that these wretched productions will be thrown away, in order that more suitable plans may be adopted. If, however, the hideous Admiralty design is carried out, the hill above Dartmouth Harbour will be crowned by a building which appears to be a combination of a workhouse and a stable. And even this building is certain not to serve its purpose for long, for before many years are past there will be an irresistible demand for the removal of the College to some more suitable site.

I am told that non-executive officers in the Navy have a serious grievance in regard to the allotment of cabins, though in some respects the grievance seems to be shared by executive officers. There appears to be a very large number, in fact whole classes, of men habitally occupying cabins to the exclusion of others who have a much better right to them; for instance, Admirals' stewards and cooks, Captains' and ward-room stewards, and signal boatswains. Cabins are also allotted to Lieutenants of Marines and Naval Sub-Lieutenants, in preference to Assistant Engineers and Assistant Paymasters who are senior in rank. It is a further complaint that, owing to the discretion given to Captains in allotting cabins, the practice in different ships varies very much. A grievance is also caused very frequently by additional or supernumerary Lieutenants being given cabins, to the exclusion of officers of the ship. It seems very clear, from a long list of facts that I have before me, that this must be a matter of very general complaint, and I should think that there would be little difficulty in putting it right. There ought to be a regular and properly defined system for the allotment of cabins among all officers, in order of seniority, regardless of what branch they belong to.

A notorious and pestilent quack, whose noxious business is almost daily brought under my notice, has lately directed a raking fire of his filthy literature at the Channel Squadron. Several officers have written to me from Vigo, complaining of his unwelcome attentions, from which not even the chaplains have been spared. To add injury to insult, he only puts a penny stamp on the envelope containing his loathsome pamphlet, with the consequence that the recipients have had to pay eightpence extra postage. "Are there no means," asks one of his victims, "by which such an unprincipled scoundrel can be brought to book?" There are, at any rate, means by which he could be prevented from inflicting this annoyance on people. Nothing could be easier than for the Postmaster-General to refuse to circulate objectionable and mischievous stuff of this kind. But unfortunately the Postmaster-General seems to think that, so long as money can be earned by carrying these packets, it matters not to him what disgust or harm the contents may cause.

One of the wants of our age is a museum of Post-Office curiosities. When such an institution is founded, I shall have pleasure in presenting to it the wrapper of a parcel of newspapers lately forwarded from London to the Wardroom Officers of H.M.S. Northampton. At the time in question the ship was on a cruise round the British Isles, calling at various ports. By some error on the part of the forwarding agents, one parcel was sent to a port at which the ship had already touched. Instead of returning it, or obtaining the address of the ship from the G.P.O. (where they are all notified by the Admiralty), the local postal authorities seem to have redirected the parcel to the next port for which the Northampton had sailed. She had left that port also before the parcel arrived, and again the parcel was redirected, with the same result. It seems to have followed the ship in this way to five successive ports before it caught her, and by the time it did so a bill of 1s. had been run up for reposting. However, the cover as it stands is well worth that sum, if only as a monument of Post Office intelligence.

It used to be a point of honour with the Post Office that no letter should ever be returned to the sender on the plea of inability to find the addressee, until every effort to discover him had been exhausted. But this is evidently among the extinct traditions at St. Martin's-le-Grand. The other day a letter was addressed to a firm in Old-street, E.C., without giving the number of the premises. The firm in question is one of the largest in the neighbourhood, and its premises extend over about eight consecutive numbers of the street. The letter, however, was returned to the sender marked "insufficiently addressed." Everybody knows from experience that the Post Office does occasionally manage to deliver letters correctly without being furnished with the number of the house, and it would be interesting to know on what principle some are delivered while others are returned. There ought, of course, to be no question about returning the letter as insufficiently addressed until at least the postmen of the district have reported themselves unable to discover the addressee.

Here is another example of Post Office indolence—or ignorance. A gentleman in the neighbourhood of Plymouth had occasion to make a remittance to Finland, and applied to the Post Office for an order for the requisite amount in marks—the mark, value 10d., being the standard coin of Finland. The Post Office supplied him with a form which stated the amount payable in "kroners," the standard coin in the Norwegian and Swedish currency. Representations that the coinage of Norway and Sweden is not current in a Russian province failed to have any effect upon the autocrats of the Post Office, and, being unable to get an order which would have been of any use in Finland, the debtor had to leave the amount unpaid until he himself made a journey to Russia some time later. He does not seem to have brought the matter under the notice of St. Martin's-le-Grand, which is a pity, for it would have been interesting to hear what apology officialism is able to offer for this piece of perversity.

A question was asked of me the other day respecting the legality, or desirability, of admitting unnaturalised foreigners to the Civil Service, Home or Indian, to say nothing of the Army and Navy. I gather that there are at present several gentlemen of Italian extraction in different branches of the public service. If they are naturalised British subjects, no legitimate objection can be taken to their position; but except on this assumption, I think that they should be excluded from such positions. I am a free trader, but free trade rests upon regard for the interests of the consumer, who gains if he can procure from a foreign market a better or cheaper article than he can buy home-made. An Italian admitted to our Civil Service, or to the Army or Navy, costs the taxpayer as much as a British subject. Is there any evidence that he is a better article for the money? I doubt it.

This reminds me of a letter I had some months ago from a Signor Radice, of Naples, who has a son in the Indian Civil Service. This son had come in for some unkind criticism in the Indian Press, which was noticed in TRUTH. Signor Radice, who is a member of the Italian Legislature, wrote to tell me that I was wrong, and that he was writing to his son to ascertain the facts. I replied that I thought it would have been better had he ascertained the facts first and told me I was wrong afterwards. Since then I have been waiting to hear the result of his praiseworthy, though tardy, effort to ascertain the facts; but nothing has come. May I now ask the Signor whether he has heard from his son yet?

A postmaster has recently been removed from an important town to another berth with a slightly lower salary, under circumstances which have occasioned a good deal of surprise in the Service. The official in question went away on leave some little time ago, and handed over to his subordinate, among the cash in hand, a cheque of his own for £150, with instructions that it was not to be presented for payment. The subordinate, feeling uneasy on the subject, and not wishing to become an accomplice in any irregularity, reported the circumstance. A Surveyor was sent down to investigate, with the result that the cheque was presented and dishonoured. The postmaster was reprimanded, and his removal is the consequence. He suffers a loss of £55 per year by the change, but is still in a better berth than he occupied a couple of years ago. I am no advocate for Draconic punishment, especially in the case of first offenders; but when an official in a highly responsible position misconducts himself, it is desirable, on every ground, that his punishment should be severe enough to act as an example to others. Besides, it is the rule to punish dishonesty in the lower grades of the Postal Service with the most vindictive severity—witness the long terms of penal servitude continually passed upon postmen for trifling acts of dishonesty. Offences of this character increase in gravity with the rank of the offender, but the Post Office authorities seem to judge them by the inverse rule. The above is not the first example of extravagant leniency towards an offender of high rank.

The pettifogging trickery, described in a recent issue of TRUTH as practised in connection with payments to the Widows' Pension Fund of the Ceylon Civil Service, appears to be repeated, in almost exactly the same form, in connection with the public services of Mauritius, the Straits Settlements, and probably other Eastern colonies where the difference between the official and the current exchange value of silver gives an opening for such fraud. For instance, a retired servant of the Government of Mauritius is entitled under an ordinance of 1871, the date when the currency was changed from gold into silver, to draw his retiring allowance in sterling at the rate of 2s. per rupee. His contribution to the Widows' Pension Fund is fixed by another local ordinance at a certain sum in rupees. The Crown Agents deduct this contribution, not in rupees, but in sterling, whereas only rupees are paid into the Fund. Taking the contributions all round in the different Eastern settlements, there must be an enormous profit made out of this trick. I again ask what becomes of it?

It was remarked in last week's TRUTH that Mr. Malcolm M'Neill, the present Secretary to the Scottish Local Government Board, and a possible candidate for the office of Vice-President and Chairman, has only held his place for five years. It is only fair to Mr. M'Neill, however, to mention that he has been in the Department for close on thirty years, which is undoubtedly a point to be considered in estimating any claim he may have.

Judging from an address put forward by one Dr. Alfred Mattei, as a candidate for a vacancy on the Malta Council, British rule, more especially as personified in the present Chief Secretary, has not commended itself to all sections of the Maltese community. The Chief Secretary is referred to in the address as "the tyrant of Malta," and, speaking generally, the attitude of the Doctor towards him is that of a nineteenth-century William Tell towards a British Gessler. The doctor is apprehensive that the "hired assassins" of Gessler may impute to him a desire of obtaining office under the British Government, and he registers a self-denying ordinance which is worth reproducing, for the use of independent candidates at English elections :—

> In any case I solemnly declare to my electors that it is not my intention to accept any Government situation, and I authorise any one—short of spitting in my face, which is not allowed by law—to call me the basest villain on earth, should I ever fail to fulfil the solemn pledge I give, that I shall not accept any Government situation.

The worthy Mattei is welcome to abuse the Chief Secretary as much as he pleases. For anything I know to the contrary, that functionary may have deserved it. It is a different matter, however, when the Doctor goes on to express his contempt for the British garrison, and to speak of the British soldier as being "recruited, as the Duke of Wellington himself stated, from the most despicable scum of the Seven Dials of London." Before this fire-eating doctor is elected, I trust he will learn that the Duke of Wellington has been dead for close on half a century, and that his knowledge of the British Army of to-day is, therefore, a trifle out of date. If the Maltese have any grievances against their present rulers, they will not get them redressed by talking offensive nonsense of this character.

Since the bubonic plague has been raging at Bombay, all the infected districts have been placed out of bounds for the troops of the garrison, which is perfectly right and proper. A certain number of men of the Royal Artillery, however, have two or three times a week to pass through these infected districts on their way to man a couple of forts six or seven miles off. This journey is performed by train, and the soldiers travel third-class, with an indiscriminate company of native passengers. The utility of placing the infected districts out of bounds under these circumstances is not very clear. The troops ought at least to be conveyed in special carriages, and carriages which have been disinfected; but, as the officers do not travel by train at all, it is not very clear why the men need. The correspondent from whom I have these facts, and who wrote on December 5, states that at that time the plague was undoubtedly increasing, although attempts have been made to represent the contrary; and just as I am going to press I see a telegram from Bombay in the papers which fully endorses the statement.

I was asked the other day by a correspondent in the country why detailed statements showing the expenditure of the local rates should not be published in the local papers. The idea strikes me as a very good one, and likely to prove quite as useful in towns as in the country. Although information on this point is accessible to all ratepayers, they must go in search of it before they can get it; and few know where to find it, or would take the trouble to look for it if they did. Companies have to furnish their shareholders with statements of account; I have at all times insisted upon the duty of private individuals, when collecting money for any purpose, to do the same thing; and it seems absurd that the various public authorities, who exact payments from us compulsorily, should not also be compelled to place the fullest possible financial statements within easy reach of every member of the public. If something of this kind were done, it would probably lead, among other things, to a much more intelligent criticism of the expenditure of the rates than we get the benefit of at present.

We have now arrived at the period of the year when Boards of Guardians are enabled to exhibit their dunderheaded bigotry by preventing pauper children from attending pantomimes. The Christchurch Guardians have been the first to distinguish themselves in this line. By the kindness of the managers of the Bournemouth Theatre, the children in charge of these worthies received an invitation to attend the Bournemouth pantomime free, while sundry benevolent people of the district offered to provide carriages to take them. The flinty-hearted pedants, however, who are facetiously styled the "Guardians of the Poor," would not hear of a pauper child enjoying a treat provided for children whose parents are not on the rates, so the invitation was declined. It is lucky for the Christchurch Bumbles that their lot has not been cast in London. What pangs of misery it would cause them to see their workhouse children receiving toys at Christmas from the TRUTH Show!

The Canterbury Guardians do not set themselves up as censors of the Press, like some of their brethren. When they want to keep anything out of the papers, their ingenious practice is to defer the discussion until the reporters leave the room, which they do when the routine business of going through the relief lists, and so on, is begun. In this way the Board have managed to prevent the publication of reports of various matters, including the recent summary dismissal of a head nurse. At a meeting, the other day, however, one of the Guardians insisted upon a series of complaints against the porter being considered while the reporters were present. These complaints were the result of a surprise visit to the tramps' quarters; but instead of making a proper inquiry into the alleged irregularities, the Board chiefly devoted its energies to discussing the conduct of the complaining Guardian. Some of these intelligent Bumbles actually seemed to think that a surprise visit was unfair to the workhouse officials, as though the fact that no inspection was expected was an excuse for neglect of duty. If this is a fair specimen of their methods of disposing of such matters, it is no wonder the Canterbury Guardians dislike publicity.

A dispute concerning a right of way over Smithill Moor, near Bolton, has been attracting a good deal of attention in that district. From the particulars sent to me by the Honorary Secretary of the Defence Committee it seems that the attempt of the landowner to close the footpath in question was so keenly resented that on two occasions a crowd about 10,000 strong went to the Moor to vindicate the right of way. Proceedings in Chancery have been commenced by the landowner against a number of working men who took part in the assertion of what they claim to be their right; and a large sum will be required for the defence. For this purpose a fund is being raised, and it is to be hoped the Committee will obtain the amount they require, towards which about £200 has been subscribed almost entirely by the working men of the district. I think myself, however, that the success or failure of a movement of this kind ought not to be left dependent upon voluntary efforts and voluntary subscriptions. If there is primâ facie evidence of the existence of a public right of way—and there is said to be an abundance of such evidence in this instance—it should be defended by a public body with public money. Cannot the Bolton Town Council, at least, give some assistance in the matter?

A section of the Skibbereen Town Commissioners indulged in a disgraceful piece of sharp practice the other day, on the occasion of the co-option of a member in the place of one who had resigned. The legally appointed hour for the meetings of the Board is noon, but to suit the convenience of the Chairman (Dr. Jennings) it has been the custom not to commence the business till 12.30. Taking advantage of this arrangement, the Chairman, and a clique acting with him, assembled half an hour earlier than usual, and rushed through the election of their nominee for the vacancy on the Board before those of the Commissioners who would have opposed him, and who received no notice of what was to be done, put in an appearance. The individual thus appointed a Commissioner has been co-opted on two former occasions, and each time on offering himself for re-election at the expiration of his term of office he was ignominiously rejected by the burgesses. Apart from the dishonourable trick by which the business was managed, it is a scandal that such a man should be placed on the Board in opposition to the wishes of the people whom the Board is supposed to represent.

There is a fine display of red-tapism in some documents which have been sent to me from Manchester. A merchant in that city applied to the Trade Marks Branch of the Patent Office for the registration of a trade mark, and, in compliance with a marginal note on the official form of application, requiring the insertion of "the full name, address, and description of the individual, firm, or Company," he added the word "merchants" as the "description" of his firm. He also filled in the space for "essential particulars" with a brief description of the trade mark. On previous occasions similar forms had been returned for various ridiculous alterations or additions, but these two items had always been passed without objection. On the present occasion, by way of change, the authorities at the Patent Office approved of everything else, but returned the form with instructions that the word "merchants" and the "essential particulars" should be struck out. On the next occasion they will, doubtless, once more insist upon the insertion of what they have now ordered to be deleted. Were they not able to waste the time of the public with correspondence upon such childish and meaningless quibbles, some of these official geniuses would probably find themselves without anything whatever to do.

In connection with the late earthquake, a funny story is told of a well-known Conservative M.P. He lives in an ancient and rat-infested mansion near what seems to have been the centre of the disturbance. When the earthquake disturbed his slumbers, he jumped out of bed, exclaiming that he would stand this sort of thing no longer. With the resolution of a desperate man, he then procured and set two large rat traps, and retired to rest, feeling that he was prepared for the worst. Traps have been set before now to catch sunbeams; but this is the first time on record of their being employed against earthquakes.

In response to my request for enlightenment respecting the case of a ferocious dog condemned to execution in Belfast and then exported to England, a learned gentleman in the Temple tells me that the Dogs' Act, 1871 (which applies to Ireland), affixes a maximum penalty of £1 for every day's disobedience to an order for the destruction of a dog. The injured citizen of Belfast may therefore comfort himself by having the owner's money (in a figurative sense), if he cannot get the dog's blood, for which he is thirsting. I must mention, however, that my legal adviser questions the right of the magistrates to order the dog's execution except as an alternative to the owner failing to control it. In this case it might perhaps be contended that the dog had been sufficiently "controlled" for Belfast purposes by sending it to England. On the other hand, it might be plausibly urged that an owner in Belfast cannot possibly control a dog in London. As an Englishman and a Home Ruler, I uphold the latter view. To send an Irish dog, after his first bite in his own country, over to England, in order that he may enjoy another first bite over here, is open to all the objections urged against allowing Irish members a seat in Parliament at Westminster as well as at Dublin.

The Public Analyst for Shropshire, Mr. T. B. Blunt, has, somewhat tardily, written to me in reference to a note concerning a prosecution for alleged adulteration of ground ginger which appeared in TRUTH on September 24. Mr. Blunt gave evidence in support of the summons, another public analyst for the defence certified that the ginger in question was absolutely genuine, and the magistrates dismissed the case. My comments dealt chiefly with the statements in the newspaper reports that Mr. Blunt had previously made only three analyses of ground ginger, and that, according to the expert evidence on the other side, he had omitted the microscopical test which was described as "by far the best." Since then Mr. Blunt has brought the matter forward at a meeting of the Society of Public Analysts, with the result that several well-known analysts expressed the opinion that the method he adopted in the case was correct, and that the microscopical examination was not the most important or the truest test. I am now asked to mention this, and in fairness to Mr. Blunt I am glad to do so. Heaven forbid though that I should express any opinion of my own on the subject. It is one on which there would seem to be some differences among analysts—there was in the Police-court at any rate—and what has occurred only shows once more how cautious judges and magistrates should always be in acting upon the testimony of scientific witnesses.

During the hearing of a summons at Alcester Petty Sessions the other day, a defendant from Stock Green, named Oliver Harris, a youth of fifteen, pleaded that he was unable to read or write. Considering the number of years the Education Act has been in operation, such a confession of ignorance is as astonishing as it is lamentable; and one would like to know how it is explained. Is not attendance at school compulsory in this bumpkin's native village? Or is the school one where reading and writing are not taught?

Some astounding revelations have been made during the prosecution of a man named Taylor at Manchester on a charge of keeping three disorderly houses. To quote the words of the presiding magistrate, in sentencing Taylor to six months' imprisonment, it was shown that this man had not only kept these houses in the very centre of the city without being in any way interfered with, but "he did it in the light of day, conversed freely with the police on the matter, and even dared the officers to touch him." The explanation of this was that Taylor was sheltered by Superintendent Bannister, who was in command of the police in this division of the city. According to the magistrate, this officer was, at one time at least, a joint proprietor of the houses referred to in the summons; he frequently visited there himself, and he "ordered raids to be made on other houses because those he was interested in were being deprived of their customers." Some weeks ago a constable revealed the fact that a warrant for Taylor's arrest was being kept back by Bannister, and the latter thereupon resigned his position in the Force. But it is obvious that the matter cannot be allowed to end here; and, from all that I know of the Chief Constable of Manchester, I feel sure he will be the first to recognise this. There should be a searching inquiry, and such changes should be effected in the management of the police divisions as will prevent the possibility of a recurrence of the scandal.

A case which was heard in Norwich County Court the week before Christmas affords conclusive proof of the true nature of the "Grandfather's Clock" trade, carried on by the man Reeves, of Norwich, and others more or less intimately associated with him. A gentleman living at Putney paid Reeves £3 for a clock, and another 6s. for packing and carriage, the transaction being the result of an advertisement in the Daily Mail. On delivery, the clock proved to be utterly worthless; a clockmaker valued it at 3s., and was prepared to support his valuation on oath in the witness-box. The clock was accordingly returned, and proceedings commenced in the County Court to recover the price. Reeves did not defend, and in due course judgment was obtained for the amount of the claim and costs. Before the hearing, Reeves actually wrote to the plaintiff, warning him that he would only incur useless expense by going into court, as he (Reeves) had secured all his goods against execution, and was in no fear of committal, as he had already "done time." By this letter the man virtually writes himself down a swindler, and there will be a general feeling that he ought to be "doing time" again. I trust that this feeling will communicate itself to the police. Meanwhile, there ought to be no delay in excluding the Grandfather's Clock advertisements from all respectable newspapers.

Owing to the holidays my Legal Pillory for the present week is shorter than usual. I am sorry it could not be dispensed with altogether during this season of peace and goodwill. At such a time one might perhaps have been inclined to overlook any excess of lenity in dealing with the wife-beater and the animal-torturer if the magistrates had also softened their hearts for once in a way towards other offenders. Unfortunately, however, it is only in cases of brutality and cruelty that the quality of mercy has been strained, and while ruffians who richly merited a term of hard labour have been let off with more or less inadequate pecuniary penalties, the customary sentences of imprisonment have been meted out to persons guilty of trumpery thefts or the heinous crime of sleeping out. The sentence of the Ross Bench on the youth Sherwood, a first offender, is especially reprehensible:—

Preston Police-court. Robert and Mary Wignall, charged with assaulting their daughter, aged 15. The girl was thrown to the ground and brutally kicked by the father, while the mother seized her by the hair and struck her several times in the face. She became unconscious, after which the man again kicked her, and would have further assaulted her but for the interference of some bystanders. The father fined 40s., the mother 10s., and costs.

Harrogate Police-court. Before Mr. C. Kirby and other magistrates. William Henry Carrell and William Slater, charged with cruelty to a horse, which was being worked whilst in an unfit state. The horse was very old and ruptured, and totally unfit for work. Carrell brutally beat it with a thick-thonged whip. Fined £1 each and costs.

Burton-on-Trent Police-court. Three brothers, named Thomas, Martin, and John Towey, charged with being drunk and riotous and with committing unprovoked assaults. Prisoners created a disturbance outside a public-house and attacked passers-by. One man who had given no provocation whatever was knocked on the head and rendered unconscious, another had to receive attention at the infirmary, and a third was "kicked about like a football." Thomas and Martin Towey fined £5 each, John Towey 15s. 6d.

Blackburn Police-court. Before Messrs. A. H. Cottam and T. P. Ritzema. John Kitchen, charged with assaulting his wife. He went home drunk and dealt her a severe blow on the head. He was of very drunken habits, and for the past two years he had done little or no work and given her no money. Fined 20s. and costs.

Bideford Police-court. Wm. Henry Luxton, labourer, convicted of assaulting David Squance, aged 70, by knocking him down. The Bench commented strongly upon the cowardly conduct of a young man like defendant in seriously assaulting an old man of 70. Fined £1 and costs.

Preston Police-court. Before Mr. J. S. Sidgreaves, Alderman Bibby. Mary M'Nanus, an old offender, charged with being drunk and disorderly. One month.

Sleaford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. H. Smith, C. Kirk, and J. A. Cole. Charles Haines, charged with begging. Three weeks.

Lewes Petty Sessions. Before Major-General Fitzhugh, Captain J. Shiffner, Messrs. C. R. Kemp, W. S. Beard, R. M. Beard, and A. Hillman. Wm. Joseph Baker, charged with stealing some cabbages, value 1s. 6d. Seven days.

Ross Police-court. Before the Rev. Prebendary E. B. Hawkshaw, Captain E. M. Allen, and other magistrates. Herbert Sherwood, aged 16, and Henry Williams, aged 18, charged with stealing a quantity of Indian corn, value 3s. 6d., from a truck at the goods station where they were working. There was a conviction against Williams for stealing cider in 1893, but this was Sherwood's first offence. Williams six weeks, Sherwood one month.

Mark Cross Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. Ashburnham, A. G. Dixon, and A. G. Watson. Jane Brook, charged with sleeping in Warren Wood and having no visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Spittlegate Petty Sessions. Before Sir Hugh A. H. Cholmeley, Lieut.-Colonel Parker, and other magistrates. Alfred Palmer, charged with using snares for the purpose of taking game upon land belonging to the Duke of Rutland. Fined £3. 7s.; in default, one month.

A man named Charles Bannister is awaiting his trial at Nottingham under circumstances which constitute a gross public scandal. The magistrates committed B. ni er on October 10 to take his trial at the then next ensuing Quarter Sessions, on a charge of stealing a horse. As there were only two cases to hear, however, the Recorder did not hold the usual Sessions, thinking, it is supposed, that the Judge would deal with those two cases at the Assizes, which were about to be held. But the Judge refused to do the Recorder's work, and as Bannister has been unable to obtain bail, he is left to lie in prison until the next Sessions, which will be held in February. This is in effect the statement of the facts which was placed before the magistrates the other week when they were asked to release the prisoner on his own recognisances; and if it is correct, a more monstrous state of things could scarcely be imagined. It means that a man has to undergo four months' imprisonment before he is brought to trial simply because the Recorder of Nottingham is too lazy to do the duty for which he is paid.

The Blyth Justices showed very undeserved and misguided lenity last week in dealing with Mr. Charles Brown, farmer, of Cambois. Brown was convicted of a long-continued course of cruelty towards a little girl of twelve whom he had "adopted" three years ago. This poor child, it was proved, was compelled to rise at 4.30 in the morning, and kept at work in the house and in the farmyard till eleven o'clock at night; her meals, mainly consisting of cold potatoes with a few bones to pick, were given to her in the coalhouse; her sleeping-place was a dark passage underneath some stairs; and a thrashing or kicking by the defendant was her almost daily experience. For all this and many more specific acts of brutality, which were detailed in the evidence, the Blyth Bench merely called upon Brown to pay a fine of £10. He ought to have been sent to gaol for six months, and it is astonishing that the magistrates should have been so muddy-minded as to think that a pecuniary penalty would meet the case.

With all desire to protect my fellow-creatures against being swindled, there are some cases at which I must draw the line. This is one of them:—A gentleman walking down a street in London sees the magic words, "Genuine sale" in the window of a portmanteau shop. He walks in and picks up for two guineas a portmanteau for which he was first asked £2. 10s., and which the shopman assured him had been reduced from £4. He was told that the material and labour in the portmanteau alone cost 39s., and he went away quite happy. This happiness was disturbed by the portmanteau getting staved in on its first journey; and, on being submitted to an expert, the article was found to be worth something less than 25s. Now, the rule of English law on all sales of goods is caveat emptor, and a very good rule too. If a purchaser is taken in by some novel and elaborate trick, he has my sympathy, and I will do my best to expose the fraud. But the "genuine sale" trick ought to be known by this time to every one whose friends allow him to go about with money in his pocket. It is, as I understand it, simply a dodge by which shoddy goods are unloaded upon the public as unequalled bargains, in what is at other times a respectable shop. If I began showing up all the tricks that are perpetrated under this head, I don't know where or when I should stop.

The notorious Isaac Gordon is evidently a sweater as well as a usurer. In an action at Leeds County Court, the other day, he paid £2 into Court in satisfaction of a claim for services rendered by a man named Noble, who had spent eight weeks in making inquiries with a view to securing suitable premises and starting a branch of Isaac's nefarious business in that town. Noble undertook this work at Gordon's request, and in the expectation that he was to be engaged as manager of the branch; but at the end of the eight weeks he was told that he would not be wanted, and it was apparently not until he was sued that Isaac made his munificent offer of five shillings a week for what he had done. Shylock coolly submitted that this was "ample payment," but the judge did not think so, and Noble was awarded £10s. 10s. Whether Gordon has yet set up his new office in Leeds did not transpire, but if he has, people there will do well to keep away from it. This Polish Jew is about the most unscrupulous rascal on my list of usurers, and that is saying a good deal.

I suppose it is idle to expect a touting usurer to have any regard for the feelings of those whom he pesters with his circulars. But I would suggest to Mr. "H. T. Brook," who practises in this line at Ipswich and Colchester, that he must really do himself more harm than good by addressing strangers through the halfpenny post in a strain like this:—

> Dear Sir,—I still continue to make advances on note of hand alone from £10 to £1,000. . . . Should you require an advance at any time, I shall be pleased to negotiate, &c.

What inference would an inquisitive servant draw from this? In all probability that "master" was an old customer of Brook's. If "master" happened to be a little short of cash at the same moment, this impertinence, so far from inclining his heart towards Brook, would, I imagine, only increase his desire to punch Brook's head.

Missing-word swindlers may be shown up in the Press, run in by the police, convicted by juries, and sent to gaol by judges, but the inexhaustible stock of fools ever waiting to be parted from their money, remains as ready as ever to keep the game going. One of the practitioners in this line still at large calls himself "Richard Bots," probably with the view of conveying an impression that he is a foreigner and not a British exile, and carries on his trade at Ghent, undoubtedly with the view of avoiding the kind attentions of the British police. In two of his recent circulars, "Bots" set for competition a word taken from an extract from a book, security for the genuineness of the competition being offered in the usual way by giving the page from which the extract was taken and the position of the word in the page. When the prize was awarded, competitors were referred in one case to a book, called "'The Beggarly Nobleman,' by Henry Conscience, published by Janssens & Sons, Antwerp," and in the other case to "'A Life's Adventure,' published by Hayward Bros., London." In point of fact, the extract in the first case was taken (with the exception of the missing word) from Disraeli's "Henrietta Temple," and in the other case from "Queechy;" but in both instances the word eventually declared to be the missing word was not the word which occurred in these books.

A disappointed competitor, who has taken the trouble to hunt up the original passages, has called Mr. "Bots'" attention to the coincidence, and, needless to say, he has got no satisfaction in either case—beyond a promise from Bots to look into the matter as soon as pressure of business will allow him to do so. Of course, I am sorry for this disappointed competitor. At the same time he is to be congratulated on having had his eyes opened, while so many hundreds of the idiots who support the Bots fraternity still remain in darkness.

In Truth of the 17th an account was given of an impudent trick by which a canvasser, working for Messrs. Blackie & Son, Limited, of Liverpool and Glasgow, obtained an order for an Encyclopædia from a gentleman at Crewe. On discovering the trick, the customer repudiated the order, when a letter was written from 19, Islington, Liverpool, in the name of Messrs. Blackie & Son, stating, in effect, that as the victim had allowed himself to be deceived in spite of certain precautions taken by the firm, the contract could not be cancelled. It seems, however, that the writer of this letter was merely an agent at Liverpool for Messrs. Blackie & Son; and when the heads of the firm in Glasgow became aware of his letter through Truth, they at once put themselves in communication with the customer at Crewe, expressing the strongest displeasure at the action of their Liverpool agent, and cancelling the contract. They have also dismissed the canvasser who obtained the order. This is, of course, all that could be expected, and I trust it will have the effect of enlightening the Liverpool representative of the firm as to the precise moral and legal position of a principal who ratifies and accepts the consequences of a fraud committed by an agent. It is due to Messrs. Blackie & Son to mention that their decision in the matter was telegraphed to me on Tuesday last (December 22), but unfortunately too late to be noticed in last week's TRUTH.

In reference to the letter in last week's TRUTH from the gentleman at Edinburgh who is going to Monte Carlo on account of a relaxed throat, and who wants some one with £50 to come and help him work his infallible system of earning £10 a day at roulette, I have been favoured with the following extract from the "Edinburgh Directory":—

Bucherer, Dr. C. W., Teacher of Languages, 51, Lothian-road.

Although the surname was given in TRUTH as "Bucheren," on looking at the signature again, I think it will equally pass as "Bucherer." The initials in the Directory are the same, and the address is the same. But if this is the writer of the letter, the mystery only becomes more mysterious. Why does a man with enough money at command to spend two or three months at Monte Carlo, and who can earn £10 a day by playing roulette, adopt the modest vocation of a teacher of languages?

Mr. John Thompson, of Broughton House, South Cliff, Scarborough, about whose circular I had some remarks in a recent issue, takes exception to my references to his "religious cant," and to the remark that the moral elevation which he offers in his books appears from the titles to be of the kind for which one would generally look in Holywell-street. He justly observes that the question of cant may be a matter of taste. It is; and to my taste the outpouring of religious claptrap for commercial purposes in Mr. Thompson's circular was as offensive a piece of religious cant as I have ever come across. On the question of Holywell-street, Mr. Thompson claims to be inspired by the highest motives, and sends me testimonials received from individuals who profess to have perused his works with profit. They are of precisely the same character as those issued by every quack doctor whose circulars pass through the Post Office, and, judging by such light as they throw on the character of the books, I should say that if there was injustice to anybody in my reference to Holywell street, it was not to Mr. Thompson, but to Holywell-street.

I have been asked by Mr. Ernest Day, of 379, Strand, to repeat an intimation which I gave some three years back, that he is not the notorious Ernest Day, of 439, Old Kent-road, whose portrait trick has been so frequently mentioned in these columns. I cannot, of course, refuse to comply with a request of this kind; but when Mr. Ernest Day, of the Strand (and formerly of Berners-street), goes on to tell me that he has been seriously injured in business through being confused with Ernest Day, of the Old Kent-road, I suspect that he must be attributing to me results which are really due to some other cause. At any rate, it is beyond my power, or that of any journalist, to absolutely prevent mistakes of identity such as this one. These are misfortunes beyond human control. Mr. W. S. Gilbert describes the sad fate of the man who was like Shakespeare. If that is a misfortune to a man, what must it be to have the same name as Ernest Day, and yet not be Ernest Day?

The following amusing document was recently received by the manager of one of the largest London hotels. It is to be hoped that the applicant got the situation he was in search of, for if his knowledge of all other modern languages is on a par with his command of our own, he will be an acquisition to any hotel, and should prove a real blessing to foreigners in distress:—

To the Sir, Manager, of Hôtel ——

DEAR SIR!—I have the honour of you to write some signs.

I am really very sorry to write to you, Dear Sir; and inform my occasion, I have been to you some times, but never a fortune to see you.

My occasion is, Dear Sir, to you, as: "Waiter"—; I speak, possess all modern languages, for instance: french, russian, german, and, that you see it,—reading—english; and, I have, had wrought at all capitals of Europe, and also worked, only in the Hôtels, First Class, and by forsake my businesses, I have received the best certificates.

To rely upon my prayer, Very Dear Sir, I hope yet, that you will reflect it.

Hoping to receive your favourable reply; and kindly acknowledge receipt of this, by the honour to remain, Your Very Obedient Servant, ——

Those who share the disgust, expressed by my correspondent "Madge" in last week's TRUTH, at the detestable practice of exhibiting live sheep or oxen, as part of the "Christmas show," in butchers' shops, would do well to forward a note of the circumstances to the Secretary of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, in Jermyn-street. I am told that a memo of the name of the shop and the time of the occurrence will be sufficient, and that the Society will, if it is so

There is no question as to the cruelty inflicted on living animals by keeping them in immediate proximity to the butchered remains of their fellow-creatures, and those who appreciate this will do even better by taking the above step than by writing to TRUTH.

The proprietor of a laundry who has been unable to obtain payment of his little bill, sends me the following account (unsettled) which he found in the pocket of a garment sent to the wash. His argument is that a person who can afford 7s. 6d. for ice-pudding, or 6s. for lobster croquettes at one sitting, ought to be able to pay his washing-bill, but unfortunately this argument fails, if the confectioner also is waiting for his money. The moral which I draw from the case is that you should make a point of turning out your pockets before sending clothes to the wash :—

A correspondent at Yeovil wishes me to air a little grievance respecting a Sick Benefit Society, which is carried on in connection with a local newspaper office. He says that some time ago he and some friends attended a concert in aid of this society, under the impression that they were thereby supporting a deserving charity. From the balance-sheet which has just been published, however, it now appears that this affair is really carried on for the benefit of the healthy as well as of the sick employees of the establishment referred to, a balance in hand of £31. 17s. 8½d. out of the £50. 3s. 3d. received during the past year having just been divided amongst the members. Of course, those who form the society are at liberty to run it on what lines they please; but it seems very questionable taste for a newspaper establishment to ask the public to support a sick fund which at the end of the year is simply distributed in this way.

To anybody desirous of understanding what the advancement of civilisation in Africa means, I would recommend a perusal of the statement concerning the Congo Free State which has recently been printed by the Aborigines' Protection Society. It is a crushing exposure of the spoliation and oppression of native populations by a Government whose chief object was to have been the protection and promotion of their interests and well-being. The whole system of administration in these regions has been, as the Society shows, "in flagrant opposition to the intentions and requirements of the Berlin General Act, and to the undertaking given by its founders when the Congo State was allowed to assume its present shape." What was to have been a philanthropic and civilising agency has become, in fact, a greedy and unscrupulous trading organisation. A sickening feature of the story is that almost every fresh act of tyranny towards the natives—including even the establishment of what is practically a form of slavery for the benefit of their white masters—has been done under a cloak of humane regard for their interests. In the practice of this hypocritical trick the Belgian administration vies with our own Chartered Companies.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING, &c.

Science for years has done her best
  Our souls to fill with vague disquiet
By hinting at the deadly germs
  Which in our food and drink run riot;
Week after week she's roused new fears
  By details gruesomely unpleasant,
Until it seemed to us at last
  The microbe everywhere was present.

But, happily, this Christmastide
  Science, this policy repenting,
Shows of compunction some small sign,
  And is, all tardily, relenting;
For now, forsooth, we are assured
  That, though of most things she's bereft us,
We still on one safe dish can count—
  Christmas plum-pudding still is left us!

For though within its uncooked mass
  A million microbes may be coiling,
There's never one that can survive
  The ordeal of its lengthened boiling.
Yes, Science—as a rule not prone
  To make one favourable admission—
Declares that Christmas pudding is Undoubtedly above suspicion!

Yet, when we think the matter out,
  This somewhat tardy declaration
Fails to arouse within our breast
  A glow of grateful jubilation;
For surely we might just as well
  Fall victims to the dread bacillus,
As eat plum-pudding every day
  And let confirmed dyspepsia kill us!

BANNERMAN'S GAUNTLET.

IT is all very well for ex-Liberal Ministers to make speeches in which they prove to their own satisfaction that, never was the Liberal Party more strong, more flourishing, and more united. These gentlemen would have it, that the last General Election was a mere Tory cloud in the blue sky of Liberalism—an April shower, welcome because it will produce a plentiful crop of May flowers. This robust faith appears to be based upon the abiding conviction that they themselves are so much more fitted to rule than their Conservative opponents, that it is hardly within the bounds of possibility that this will not very soon be realised by every man within the four seas; coupled with a sure and certain faith in the swing of the pendulum, by which, like the flies on that weight, they are to come back to official pastures without any effort of their own. With regard to the first, the history of the world has shown that the wisest and the best of human kind have not always received the approbation of their fellow creatures; with regard to the second, the pendulum doctrine hardly holds good in politics, because politics are not a mechanical clock, moving the weight attached to it backwards and forwards under certain fixed conditions of time and swing.

What we have as practical men to deal with is that, whereas some fifty years ago, tenure of power by the Liberal Party was the normal condition of things, occasionally broken by tenure of office by the Conservatives for a year or two, the respective positions of the two Parties have gradually been reversed. To a very large extent this has been due to one Benjamin Disraeli putting his hand on the pendulum. If he had merely gazed at it with open mouth, like a child gaping for sugar-plums, this change would not have taken place. Mr. Disraeli found his Party a mere remnant, and as Mr. Stuart Mill termed it, a stupid remnant. It became under his skilful manipulation an intelligent Party. We managed to make head against it so long as we had on our side Mr. Gladstone's commanding personality. Since we have lost this force, the Conservatives, in the most stupid phase of their existence, never equalled the hopeless, helpless, imbecility that has characterised us. Until we realise what utter fools we are, we shall remain in the quagmire into which our folly has precipitated us, and deservedly remain there. People are too apt to imagine that a cause which is good must succeed. They might as well believe that a ship which is filled with a good cargo will safely reach its port with a blind idiot at the wheel.

We must begin by not ignoring the strength of the enemy, any more than their tactical ability in making the best use of that strength. Their object has been to perpetuate the rule of an oligarchy, and to reduce the popular element in the Constitution to a minimum, not by denying votes to the masses, but by rendering these votes of no avail. At the head of this oligarchy are men who deem that it is their birthright to rule, but they have had the sense to perceive that they must have soldiers. We are no longer faced with a mere landed oligarchy of nobles of long descent and broad acres, claiming a monopoly of power. All wealthy men, all who derive profit or benefit from privileges at variance with equality, and the vast herd of sycophants who imagine that they raise themselves in the social scale by siding with the aristocracy, now serve in the Tory Army. The "I am of the Party of the Gentlemen of England" has gained the Conservatives many a vote. We may rail at the influence of rank and money, but in a country like this, where money is a sign of respectability, and where the worship of rank is a positive disease, we cannot afford to forget their influence. Thus a powerful array has been brought into line, well equipped with the sinews of war, and ably commanded. Its commanders keep watch and guard over the portals of the House of Commons, to prevent poor men passing through them. Their first aim is to bring that House into ridicule and contempt by maintaining a mode of transacting business in it which renders it well-nigh impossible that business can be transacted. Their second aim is to involve us in Imperial ventures abroad, in order to draw off attention from reforms at home. At the same time, the Executive has been packed with Peers with a view to weaken the hold of the People's House over it, and to throw rule rather into the hands of the Executive than of the Legislature. What have we done to counteract all this? Have we, when we have had a majority, sought to reduce the costs of elections? Have we so altered the rules of the House of Commons as to render it able to cope with its business? Have we insisted that Ministers shall be selected from the elected members of the Legislature? Have we endeavoured to strike at the contemptible social servitude which is the bane of all Democratic independence? Have we insisted upon home reforms taking the place of schemes to bring subject races under our rule abroad? Far from this, we have in all these matters played the Tory game. And with what result? The Radicals, who are the backbone of the popular cause, see little difference between Conservatives and Liberals. Many have already withdrawn in disgust from our Party, and formed themselves into new Parties; many vote for the Conservatives as a protest against our half-hearted policy. In the meanwhile, the Tory organs never lose an opportunity to scoff and sneer at the People's House, and to compare it disadvantageously with the House of Lords. Unless a reaction takes place, we shall soon be told that popular rule is not fitted for an intelligent nation; and the House of Commons will become little more than the sham that the French Parliaments were under the old French Kings.

Seeing these things, I would have Radicals not waste their energies in proposing this or that measure, however useful these measures may be, but all unite together to wage war against the hosts of reaction. We are told that we ought to have no policy, and no Leader. This is the plan of campaign seriously suggested to us by those who call themselves our Leaders. Anything more utterly weak and flabby never was imagined by men who would lead others. I do not believe in defensive war; I would always carry it into the enemy's country. If we are really to achieve victory, we must storm the entrenchments of class and privilege. Let us definitely and clearly state that we intend to sweep away every privilege, political and religious, but that, with this object in view, we are determined to make it our first business to establish such an elected Legislature as will be absolute and uncontrolled master in the State, and to which all, rich or poor, will be equally eligible. To fight successfully we must have before us something that we hope to gain by fighting Our aim must be clear and definite, not vague and shadowy. No one will labour to roll a stone up hill, when he knows that if it does reach the summit, it will at once be kicked back down hill. If a sensible man, his first step would be to eject the mountaineers from their post of vantage, and then alone to push the stone upward.

The other day Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman proposed that half a dozen Radicals should be selected from the front bench below the gangway, and that he, on his part, should produce half-a-dozen men from the late Liberal Cabinet, the Peers being duly represented among them. He would, he said, back his half-dozen against the other half-dozen on every one of the public topics of the day in point of sound, genuine, bold, unflinching, Radical opinion. In order to make this interesting competition possible, it would be necessary first to define what is "Radical opinion," and, secondly, to select an umpire to decide between the rival half-dozens. Even if these preliminary difficulties were got over, I should take exception to the words "Radical opinions," for my complaint against the Leaders of the Liberal Party is not that, so far as opinions go, they are not ready to profess the soundest, but that when opinion is to be followed by action, they invariably find some excellent cause to hang back. Tacitus relates that the ancient Germans discussed sober, and decided drunk. I am an advocate of temperance, but if arguing when sober our Leaders can only theorise, I would advise them to pass the bottle round, and then to decide upon some practical action. "The Liberals," says Sir Henry in the speech in which this challenge was thrown down, "are not called upon to produce their plans or schemes of reform; their part consists in criticising the measures of the Government." It is precisely this negation of all forward policy which paralyzes the Party. Why should any one vote for the Liberals because the Conservatives make mistakes? Naturally, he would hesitate to substitute for them an alternative Administration, that kept its plans and its contemplated reforms a dark secret; all the more if this alternative Administration had, when entrusted with office, merely ploughed the sands of the seashore, and called on Heaven and earth to bear witness to the excellence of the Radical opinions which led only to political inaction. This sort of pawky caution is hardly likely to create such enthusiasm amongst the masses that they will rally to the Liberal banner. Nor will Radicals, outside the charmed circle of officialdom, care to place men in office without distinctly knowing on what they are prepared to stand or fall. Nevertheless, the discussions which would take place between the two half-dozens would be interesting. When, therefore, Sir Henry has settled on his half-dozen official Peers and official Commons, it might be well to submit to him half-a-dozen of the rank and file in the unofficial Radical army, ready to try a fall with these august beings, who, as Sir Henry modestly says, are "not rash and unguarded in the expression of their opinions," but are men who "have some experience of affairs, some knowledge of administration, and some sense of responsibility." Such is their knowledge of administration, in truth, that they have ceased to be statesmen and lapsed into mere administrators; so cautious are they in the expression of their opinions that they express no opinion beyond the vaguest of generalities; so guarded are they in action that they do not act; so strong is their sense of responsibility that they never venture to accept any responsibility. There are few men for whose intelligence I have a greater admiration than for Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and he is as amiable as he is intelligent; but I am bound to tell him that we never can hope to regain the public confidence that the Liberal Party has lost, or to make head against the Conservatives, if we are not prepared to adopt bolder counsels than those which he recommends. Let him remember the de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace, of Danton, which may be translated by the proverb, "nothing venture, nothing have."

THE PROMOTER AND HIS PREY.

It is easier to make money than to keep it. So far as the State, in its financial entity is concerned, it signifies little whether a pound which has been accumulated remains in the pocket of the accumulator, or passes into that of some one else. But a State ought to recognise a broader duty to its citizens than this, and to see that all is fair and above board in the transfer. When I was a boy, notices were affixed along roads, near private woods, warning trespassers that they might, if they strayed, be killed or wounded by spring guns. I believe that this is now illegal. It ought to be equally illegal to lay traps for the unwary, into which, if they fall, they will emerge relieved of their money. When the Limited Liability Acts were passed, the State professed to ensure to all those who took shares in them safety against fraud and deception. In the main these Acts have been useful. They provide the machinery by means of which all, according to their means, can profit by industrial undertakings without risking more than their actual investments in them. But experience has abundantly shown that their objects have not been satisfactorily attained. Almost every day cases are reported in the Law Courts in which promoting wolves get the better of investing lambs. The law is either openly defied or cleverly evaded. Matters have now reached such a pass that the Legislature ought to take action in the public interests. It is said that the Press is at fault, because it does not warn its readers against this or that prospectus which is advertised. But the Press cannot always do this, for in the prospectus all seems fair and above board, and it is only later on that the fraudulent character of the scheme is made clear. In a great many cases, therefore, the Press can only point to the empty stable after the steed is stolen. I fully admit that, do what the law may, fools and their money will always part; nor do I think that it is the business of the State to assume the responsibility of telling the public what is a good and what is a bad investment. Still, if the Law's aim is to ensure, so far as it can, fair dealings between man and man, and to punish those who deal unfairly, it must be obvious to all that there is great room for improvement in the Limited Liability Acts. One of the chief difficulties in the way of such a reform is that the promoting and the guinea-pigging interests are so largely represented in both branches of the Legislature. The changes needed will, therefore, never be made unless they are demanded by so strong an expression of public opinion that it will crush out all personal opposition. The simplest plan would be to lay hands on half-a-dozen of the shadiest promoters and guinea-pigs, and to hang them on the nearest lamp-posts. But this practical mode of dealing with an abuse is hardly in accordance with the spirit of the age.

Apart from the loopholes for fraud in the law, the public are in many cases themselves to blame for the loss of their money. Take, for instance, some claim to a portion of a reef where there are traces of gold. The promoter buys the claim for some small and reasonable sum. The next step is to obtain reports from experts, in which it is assumed that every ton of ore will contain a certain amount of gold, and that this gold-bearing rock may be extracted in unlimited amount. On this a glowing estimate of prospective profits is worked out, and on this estimate the amount at which the promoter sells to the Company is based. One would suppose that the proverb that warns people against counting chickens before they are hatched would act as a warning. But, far from this, investors rush in as though these eggs that may prove to be addled were already full grown and fatted fowls. Take another instance. A person starts some business, which returns him a net profit per annum. The promoter generally buys the business himself at an excessive price, and then sells it to the Company that he forms at a still more excessive price. Here the goodwill of the business is the x in the problem. The business may have been founded only a few years ago. Suppose that the capital actually invested in it is £10,000, but that it has made £10,000 in the last year of its short career. Assume further that the original owner had no monopoly of the business by virtue of a holding patent, without which the business could not be carried on. What would be the real value of the goodwill? At the highest reasonable computation, £50,000. This would make the price properly paid by the Company £60,000. But the price figures in the prospectus as £150,000. £50,000 is issued in Debentures bearing 4 per cent. interest; £50,000 as Preference shares entitled to 5 per cent. interest; and £50,000 as Ordinary shares. Thus, these Ordinary shares are shown to produce £5,500 per annum, i.e., a dividend of 11 per cent. In this way the obvious absurdity of giving fifteen years' purchase is concealed. But assuredly investors ought to perceive that all this division of profits between diverse categories of securities does not alter the fact that the goodwill is charged an excessive price. By very able management the £10,000 per annum profit may, perhaps, be maintained. But the probabilities are that it will not be maintained for many years, because—(1) Companies are never so well managed as undertakings in private hands; (2) if £10,000 per annum can be made by an initial outlay of £10,000, i.e., with a return of cent. per cent., competition at once follows, and this brings down the profit to the average return on all capital in industrial undertakings.

One would naturally suppose that the names of the Directors would influence applications for shares, and in a certain sense this is the case, but only in that one sense. Not many weeks ago a dispute that was brought before the Committee of the Stock Exchange showed that £5,000 was paid by a promoter for two noblemen as Directors of the Company that he was promoting. Neither of the noblemen had any knowledge of business. Their names were valuable simply and solely because they were noblemen. Can anything more clearly show the abnormal stupidity of the investing public? It is as though, wanting to learn to dance, they were to take as a dancing master a banker, because he understands the money market. Speaking generally, Company Directors are men who are without any business knowledge, and who desire an accession to their incomes in the shape of Directorial fees. Theoretically they show their belief in the undertaking to which they give their names by paying for the shares they are obliged to hold as a qualification. Practically, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the promoter gives them these shares, and, of course, sells to the Company at a price to cover, not only his profit, but the cost of these shares.

There is yet another mode in which the public is humbugged. The promoter states that, so confident is he in the genuineness of his Company, that he takes a large portion of the purchase price in shares. What he really takes is a portion of his profit, because he doubts whether he can at once float its entire share capital. His implication is that the price is reduced because he does this. But if he asks the public to take shares against payment of cash, it ought to be manifest to all that, assuming the price that they are asked to pay for the shares to be a legitimate one, the shares taken by the promoter represent share for share the amount paid by applicants.

I do not know that I am in any special way a purist, nor have I an ideal standard of public life, esteeming those who take to it neither better nor worse than others, except that they are rather more given to affect a virtue somewhat in excess of actual reality. I have no particular objection to an M.P. being the Director of some great Company in which he is largely interested, but I certainly do hold that an M.P. should neither be a promoter of Companies, nor be advertised as the Director of a dozen Companies of a speculative—not to say of a questionable—character. As an elector, whether I were a Radical or a Conservative, I would not have, if I could avoid it, such a man as my candidate. That they are often selected by both Parties as candidates is due to constituencies being too much inclined to accept any one who is ready to part with money. This is one of the reasons why I have always been in favour of the community taking on itself the cost involved in elections, and M.P.'s being paid for their services. This would, I am convinced, lead to constituencies having a wider choice of good candidates, and to their being, if elected, more independent than is now the case. Judging from the applications from promoters to M.P.s to be on the Boards of their Companies, I should say that any M.P. might easily make £1,000 per annum as a Director by the mere fact of his being in Parliament. Therefore do I all the more respect those who, being poor men, do not yield to the temptation.

BROOKS'S MILCH-COWS.

I can only express generally my thanks to innumerable correspondents for their congratulations on the result of the Brooks case. It is no conventional phrase to say that it is impossible to thank each correspondent individually, for they are counted by hundreds; and, indeed, I think that hardly a letter has reached me during the last ten days without some allusion to the subject. For some reason the case of the Rev. George Brooks seems to have made more impression upon the public than almost any libel action that has ever been brought against TRUTH. I am glad to know that my humble efforts to expose humbug, in whatever shape, are appreciated, and I value this appreciation the more, because it is the only compensation that a journalist can look for in such a case. There is an idea, I believe, in some quarters that I rather rejoice in libel actions. Mr. Brooks endeavoured to make capital out of that idea, but, like other ideas out of which he made capital (and income), it is quite a delusion. Even a comparatively simple action like Brooks's means months of worry and anxiety, a big bill (without any disparagement to my friend, Sir George Lewis) to pay, and very little to show on the other side of the account for any journal which has once made its position.

Among the hundreds, however, who have sent their congratulations on the result of the case I do not find Earl Percy, Lord Egerton of Tatton, Mr. H. S. Foster, M.P., Mr. J. H. Tritton, or any of those patrons of Brooks, who only saw in the first exposure of their protégé an occasion for indicting abuse of TRUTH, and a fresh ground for subscribing to the Brooks' "sustentation fund." This is disappointing. Some of these gentlemen were extremely unreserved in their remarks. Earl Percy, not content with observing that it would be waste of time to bring a libel action against TRUTH (which was true enough, though not in the sense his lordship intended), was good enough to add that "Nobody who knows anything about the paper believes anything that is said in it." I can assure the noble lord that he is mistaken. Not only do many people believe what they read in TRUTH, but those who believe occasionally look wiser than those who have refused instruction. The attitude, indeed, of some of Brooks's victims can only be compared to that of swine before whom pearls have been cast. They trampled my offering under their feet, and turned again and rent me. Lord Egerton of Tatton was of opinion that I was desirous of being sued for libel, though what I was to gain by it, if I had really made a mistake about Brooks, it would puzzle his lordship to explain. The same view was expressed by Mr. C. B. Longstaffe, L.C.C., who really ought to know better, and it was also conveyed in much more offensive terms by a Mr. C. A. Swan, who for some reason is the High Sheriff of Lincolnshire, and who has derived (I suppose) from his able instructor, Mr. Brooks, the idea that I am a Socialist. Mr. Evelyn Ashley was in one sense the most confident of all the party. He took upon himself to pronounce the whole TRUTH indictment to be unfounded, and gave Brooks the following testimonial—to be used of course in the next issue of appeals for cash:—

> You have never used any false pretences whatever in the appeals which you have made. You have stated your needs and your objects, and those who have given have given with a full knowledge of and sympathy with your circumstances. Why then should outsiders interfere?

This would have been invaluable testimony if it could have been given on Brooks's behalf at his trial. If a gentleman in Mr. Evelyn Ashley's position could have sworn that he had supported Brooks with full knowledge of his circumstances, I think the jury might have taken a different view of the case. If he could have proved, what Mr. Ashley confidently asserts, that all who assisted Brooks from 1890 to 1895 did so with full knowledge of his circumstances, he would have gained for Brooks a handsome sum in damages. Why was he not called?

The gentleman, however, whose utterance interests me most is Mr. Harry S. Foster, M.P. This statesman wrote to Brooks on the TRUTH exposure:—

> I needed no enlightenment as to the methods of either Labouchere or the C.O.S., nor did I need any defence on your part, for as the Member for the division in which you reside, as one who knew you in Dulwich, and as one who has helped you to a very small extent in your work, I have long known the sterling stuff of which you are made. Nevertheless, your defence is highly interesting reading, and its tone is manly, straightforward, and worthy of your work. [More pointless fustian was never printed.—Ed. Truth.] . . . . If you decide to sue for libel, I will add my quota to the guarantee fund . . . . Balfour's timely and gracious grant to you has made your enemies gnash their teeth with a vengeance. But I am sure your courage and high purpose are equal to the task.

So this worthy gentleman, strong in his knowledge of "the methods of Labouchere and the C.O.S.," was ready to subscribe to the expenses of Brooks's action. Did he subscribe? Is he going to contribute anything to the costs? I shall be glad to hear it. And who is Mr. Foster that he should boast of his "enlightenment" about other people's "methods"? Mr. Foster, it will be remembered, is no stranger to the libel laws. He, like Brooks, commenced a crusade against the Press, which had given the public a little enlightenment about Mr. Foster's "methods," more especially in regard to company finance, and having come off second best in his first encounter—that with the Westminster Gazette—he abandoned the rest of his actions. That after this experience he should have incited Brooks to a similar enterprise, is somewhat surprising, especially if he were going to bear a share of the costs himself. However, as the result in Brooks's case has been so similar to that in his own, he will no doubt have a fellow feeling for the sufferer. Probably by this time he has forwarded Brooks a cheque, with an assurance that "I needed no enlightenment as to the methods of either judges or juries." . . . .

I can imagine that it has been rather a surprise to the writers of these Brooks' testimonials to see them all in print. The documents hardly read to me as if they had been intended for publication. But that is what makes the thing so enjoyable. It was Brooks himself who gave away his own backers, by publishing their testimonials as the basis of a fresh appeal for funds. When a sufficient number of luminous-minded gentlemen had declared their contempt for Truth, and their unabated confidence in Brooks, out came the type-writer, and off went a fresh batch of appeals, with all those opinions of wise and eminent persons appended as proofs of the writer's bona fides. Several copies of this circular in due course made their way to Truth Office, one of the first coming from the late Archbishop of Canterbury. Archbishop Benson I may mention, had at one time been misled into giving Brooks a subscription, but it was not long before he saw through the man—helped, doubtless, to that result by the remorseless pertinacity with which Brooks dunned him—and eventually he forwarded the whole of his Brooks correspondence to me. Among the rest was the appeal backed by the imposing body of opinions above referred to. This method of using the testimonials from his patrons is another proof of Brooks's command of all the tricks of the begging-letter writer. The humbler practitioner in that line, when he has obtained a sovereign and a letter of sympathy from one victim, instantly uses it to bait the trap for the next one, and if the first victim happens to be a peer or a cleric, his example never fails to bring imitators. "One fool makes many," and never has this truth been more splendidly illustrated than by the victims of George Brooks. These milch-cows deserve no sympathy, and had they alone been milked for the "sustentation" of Brooks and his family, it would never have been necessary to deal with Brooks's dairy farm in more than a playful spirit. "Truth never libelled me," said Brooks at the trial, "until Mr. Balfour gave me the £200 grant." Precisely. As long as Brooks only fooled private individuals, his performances were a good joke; when he fooled the guardians of the public purse, it became a serious matter. For aught I care, he may fool his old patrons again; but I am happy to think he has had his last grant from the Treasury.

A MINOR BEGGING-LETTER WRITER.

If the Rev. George Brooks had never lived, a very high place in the begging-letter profession would have been awarded to an individual named George Richardson. For the present, the performances of George Brooks have thrown the efforts of all competitors into the shade. It is a case of Brooks first and the rest nowhere. Still, if you can forget Brooks, Richardson is a very interesting study. I call him "Richardson" because that is the title under which he is known to the criminal courts of his native land; but the man has passed during the last few years under so many aliases, that what his true name may be would puzzle anybody but himself to say for certain. The last of these aliases is "Horace Vivian Enright," and here is one of Richardson's characteristic performances under that name:—

5, New Turnstile, Lincoln's Inn-Fields,
London, W.C., September 29, 1896.

Madam,—I only venture to write to you because you were kind enough to help me when in great difficulties some few years ago, and when I repaid you you were pleased to say that if I ever was in need again to apply to you. I regret to state that I am at present in very great need indeed, having since last April been laid up with rheumatic fever, and only for first time last week have left my room, and to add to my trouble, and overwhelm me with grief, my dear wife, to whose tender and unremitting care I am indebted, under Providence, for my recovery, herself succumbed, after a short illness, to an attack of pneumonia, following influenza, last Tuesday. The expenses of my long illness, and of my wife's funeral, having absorbed all my resources, I am at present absolutely without any means whatever. You, madam, are the only friend I have in England on whom I can rely on in this emergency. Will you kindly aid me with a small loan, which I will repay as soon as I receive remittance from my uncle at Brisbane, and which I expect in five weeks' time?

I trust, madam, that sad and urgent circumstances under which I write, the friendship which existed between my father and late Captain —— for so many years, and which terminated only on my father's death, and your own kind promise, will pardon me again troubling you. I may add I had misfortune two months ago of losing nearly all I possessed in fire which took place in my chambers at Lincoln's Inn.—Yours ever gratefully, Horace Vivian Enright.

In view of what follows it is scarcely necessary to say here that the principal statements in the above letter are all pure inventions, and simply the ordinary tricks of the begging-letter trade. The lady to whom this letter was addressed had never assisted "Enright" or "Richardson," nor heard of him in her life before.

Here are a few particulars of the man's history. He has been twice convicted in the name of George Richardson, on both occasions for obtaining money under false pretences by begging-letters. The first conviction was in August, 1893, and the second in 1895. In both cases he represented himself as a clergyman, and in the second he made free with the name of a Manchester cleric, and gave an address at a London hotel. On the second conviction he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. He has been busily engaged in the begging-letter business for years past, telling all sorts of stories in support of his appeals to the benevolent. In one letter, written in the name of Finlan, he was an enthusiastic adherent of the Unionist cause, stranded in London, and desirous, if he could obtain the wherewithal to pay his fare, of returning to his native town, which happened, by a remarkable coincidence, to be Oldham, the latest abode of the Master, George Brooks. In support of this appeal he enclosed a beautifully-forged testimonial, purporting to be written by the Secretary of the Oldham Conservative Club. On another occasion he was "Henry Barnes," a Devonshire tradesman involved in a most pathetic series of misfortunes. While Henry Barnes had been attending the death-bed of his brother, Mrs. Henry Barnes had taken advantage of his absence to sell up his home and elope. The unfortunate husband had followed her to London, where he was knocked down by a cab in Holborn, and taken to the hospital with a broken leg. On coming out, he had obtained an offer of employment at Newcastle, which he was only prevented from accepting by the impossibility of raising the railway fare. In this case the begging-letter was accompanied by a testimonial purporting to be written by the Vicar of his Devonshire parish, corroborating Barnes's history of his misfortunes, and commending him to the sympathy of Christians at large. In another letter this same rascal became Mr. "Gerald Herbert O'Hara," a youth of twenty, whose father had brought him from the Cape of Good Hope to London, and had there inconsiderately died, leaving his son penniless. All that the youthful O'Hara needed was a passage back to the Cape, where he could secure his inheritance, and at once wipe out the obligation. More often Richardson assumes the feminine sex, and in this character he brought off one peculiarly clever coup. By some means he seems to have become acquainted with the history of an American family named Upham. He then assumed the name of Maud E. Upham, and wrote to a lady of the same name in England, representing himself to be her niece. Miss Maud's story was that she had come to England with her father, who had died, leaving her absolutely without means. The plot was so successful that the lady actually sent £10 to her supposed niece, and proceeded to London to look after her, which led to the discovery of the fraud.

The indefatigable Richardson has rung every conceivable change upon the possible deaths of relatives. He has been a "Maud E. Whitbread," who had been left penniless by the death of her father, and a "Maud E. Marshall," who had experienced the same consequences from the death of her mother. Maud is his favourite female name. As Maud Riviere he has lost his son, a boy of fourteen. As M. Edith Deer (Maud Edith, no doubt), he has lost his daughter, and is anxious to return to his home at Kobat in the Punjab. He has also figured as Mabel Charlotte Cressingham, widow of a medical man from Canada. By a hard struggle this lady had succeeded in educating her son until he had obtained an appointment in Jamaica, where, unfortunately, all the fond mother's efforts were rendered futile by the impossibility of paying for the lad's passage and outfit. Among other aliases under which his begging-letters have been written are the following:—Terence O'Callaghan, Arthur O'Callaghan, C. H. Seymour, Terence O'Brien, Charles H. Maunsell, Henry Stanley, and Chas. Worthington.

A special feature in all this rascal's appeals is the introduction of forged testimonials, or other credentials. A favourite trick is to enclose a letter from some employer of labour, promising him a berth, or even fixing some day for him to come to work. The North Metropolitan Tramway Company has been his favourite stalking-horse for this purpose, and in every case in which inquiries have been made these letters have proved to be forgeries. In order to put my readers further on their guard against Mr. Richardson, and in the hope of securing his identification for the purpose of a further vindication of the law, I have had the following facsimile of his handwriting executed. The handwriting of his various letters is not always precisely the same, but there are certain marked peculiarities running through all his letters, and the following sample ought to be sufficient to enable any person receiving his letters to identify the writer —

5 New Turnstile
Lincolns Inn Fields
London W C
24 Sept 1896

Madam
I only venture to write to you because you were kind enough to help me when in great difficulties some few years ago and when I repaid you, you were pleased to say that

There is one point in regard to this incorrigible rogue's operations which enforces a moral that I have more than once drawn. In nearly every case his letters have been dated from "accommodation addresses," that is to say, from shops where answers to letters are taken in for a trifling fee. For instance, the address, 5, New Turnstile, Lincoln's Inn Fields, is a stationer's shop, where this sort of accommodation is afforded, and Richardson is not the first swindler who has operated from the same address. Readers of Truth will scarcely need to be told of the extent to which all classes of rogues and impostors avail themselves of the facilities thus afforded for carrying on clandestine correspondence. The "accommodation address" secures to every swindler operating through the Post Office complete immunity from detection, unless with the assistance of the shopkeeper who receives his letters for him; and it is sad, but true, that not a few of the tradesmen who receive letters in this way evince reluctance to give away their customers by assisting in their identification when they are "wanted." If the shopkeeper refuses to assist, it stands to reason that to identify the party who calls at the shop and takes away letters in any particular name is practically impossible. The remedy which I have suggested for this evil is that all persons receiving letters indiscriminately, as a matter of business, should be required to take out a licence from the police. On principle there can be no objection to such a regulation, for the great majority of persons who use these "accommodation addresses" do so for illegitimate purposes of one kind or another. Were shopkeepers licensed, the police would always have a hold on them, through the power of withdrawing the licences if the holders showed any disposition to screen customers who have used their addresses for illegal or immoral purposes; and the mere fact that the licences would only be held during good behaviour would make shopkeepers careful to satisfy themselves as to the character of individuals desirous of using their premises in this way. Few of them, I regret to say, seem to exercise such care at present, or to appreciate that in deliberately allowing their addresses to be used for improper purposes they make themselves participes criminis. The mere introduction of such a regulation as I propose would probably be sufficient to put a stop to the operations of Mr. George Richardson and all others of his tribe.

"ALADDIN."

The new entertainment so gorgeously presented at Drury Lane is far more than what in the olden days was called a pantomime. Every year the "new introductions" seem to take a more and more elaborate form. Mr. Oscar Barrett has to a very great extent exercised the same kind of judgment that so distinguished the never-to-be-forgotten management of the late Sir Augustus Harris, who understood so well every beat and pulse of his audience, and who received the admiration and gratitude of the public in return. The latest version of "Aladdin," by Arthur Sturgess and Horace Lennard, relies more on the superb mounting than the well-known story for attraction, but this is not a very serious matter, in fact it has proved quite the contrary. Besides, it is fashionable nowadays to substitute brocade and passementerie for talent and indifferent acting, not that I mean this to be the case at Drury Lane—oh, dear no!—but I would rather a little more attention had been bestowed upon the characters in the pantomime, and a little less on the juggling department and the "variety show" introductions. However, be that as it may, "Aladdin" is truly magnificent, and it is highly creditable to Mr. Oscar Barrett that he has succeeded so admirably in his enterprise. It was no very easy task to attempt, but the present management has proved itself in every way both a worthy and experienced successor to the late one. Ada Blanche is clever both as a singer and a dancer; she is unquestionably a boy to the very life, with plenty of fun, go, and just the right amount of mischief. But how I screamed over the eccentricities of Dan Leno as the Widow Twankay, and what a lesson he gives in stage dancing! He is simply inimitable. I never heard anything more comical than the scene when Herbert Campbell, disguised as a newspaper reporter, calls on Leno to "interview" him for one of the dailies. How marvellously well these two artists play together! There is no tendency to under-act here: they start off neck to neck, and keep up the pace right away to the finish. Decima Moore is all that is delightful and fragile as the Princess Badroulbadour; and Clara Jecks, who knows every inch of her business, makes Sau-See a quaintly comic little person. Fitz Rimma, who impersonated a "bit of rare old China," recently seen and made much of both in this country and elsewhere, spoke quite as incomprehensibly as the original must have done; but, then, I own I am somewhat feeble when it comes to a question of the Chinese language. The interior of Aladdin's Palace just before the wedding takes place is most exquisitely beautiful and dazzling, and it certainly does ample justice to the wonderful skill and taste of Auguste & Cie, Miss Fisher, and those two popular artists, M. and Mme. Alias. Ladies will simply revel in the delights of the marvellous costumes, and the wedding procession is one glittering mass of gorgeous stuffs, so thickly embroidered and embossed with gold, silver, diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and millions of precious stones that the wealth of colour and wonderful scintillation become absolutely blinding. I must not forget to tell you how gracefully little Miss Somerset dances as the Genius of the Ring, how the beautiful Grigolati troupe float about the stage—they are perfect marvels of grace and loveliness, or how Paul Cinquevalli, as the Slave of the Lamp, fairly brings down the house with his extraordinary feats of jugglery. Altogether the pantomime at Old Drury is full of interest, charm, and freshness; and as a magnificent spectacle there are few stages in Europe that could show a more striking entertainment.

"BLACK-EY'D SUSAN."

We certainly live in wonderful times. A few years ago theatrical managers looked rather askance at Shakespeare, but they would certainly have pooh-poohed Douglas Jerrold and laughed to scorn the idea of Bunyan. But within the last week or so have actually seen two Shakespearean revivals, a play written by Jerrold, and an adaptation from Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." How delighted the author of "Black-Ey'd Susan" would be if he could only come to life again for a few hours and pop in at the Adelphi to see how tenderly his favourite child must have been put away in lavender in order to come out as fresh and bright again! Old-fashioned clap-trap, the pessimists and blasé portion of the public will say. Not a bit of it! There is a vast difference between popular sentiment and stage bunkum. The dialogue, I grant you, is a little quaint and out of date; but what on earth does that matter? Does not our own William appear as the hero? Where will you find another like him? Who can "chew a quid," "shiver his timbers," "spin a yarn," dance a hornpipe and, above all, look as fine a fellow as "Breezy Bill?" I have been introduced to several Williams in my time, and I can safely say not one of them impressed me half or nearly half as much as Terriss did the other evening. Had time allowed and the actor's strength withstood the strain, his hornpipe would have been danced over and over again, so good was it, and the St. Domingo Billy yarn was spun with a dash and a go that sent the people into fits of laughter. Again, in the court-martial scene I cannot conceive anything better timed or more artistically delivered than William's dramatic appeal to his officers before the verdict was given. The dresses, I confess, reminded me somewhat of the "penny plain and twopence coloured" delights of early life, and I quite expected to see a pirate rush on and say, "Once aboard the lugger and the girl is mine;" but I was disappointed. Jessie Millward turns on a pathetic stop in the farewell scene which is absolutely heartrending. I was told the other day that a certain "weeping heroine" invariably smeared her pretty countenance with vaseline just before going on in her big scene, to give the appearance to the audience of being bathed in tears. Whether Jessie is up to this trick I don't know; at any rate her face was a perfect study in "water colours." I always thought Gnatbrain was a funny man, until Nicholls informed me he was nothing of the kind; he might have been a little more cheerful, though, with such a pretty and bright Dolly Mayflower as Vane Featherston. But there, it is worth going to the Adelphi for the sake of seeing "Breezy Bill," though I shouldn't advise any one to hurry over his evening meal to get there in time for "All That Glitters is Not Gold." This play is a mistake altogether, and had better by far have been left to moulder quietly away in the dramatic cupboard of the late Thomas and Maddison Morton's forgotten works.

THE MARTYRED CHRISTIAN.

How history does repeat itself, to be sure! Years ago the Olympic Theatre in Wych-street, Strand, was the home of fun, laughter, and merriment. It was at this very playhouse that Robson delighted an admiring world with "Jim Baggs" in the "Wandering Minstrel," and his exquisitely ludicrous burlesque on Medea. It was at the Olympic that the brilliant comedian Charles Mathews played in "Used Up" and the "Liar." Alas! from that time the theatre—which, by the way, is now wholly reconstructed and rebuilt—has fallen upon evil days. It was therefore little short of a stroke of genius to hit upon the idea of giving this year a musical, melodious, and melodramatic pantomime. Dear me, how I laughed, and how the people laughed, too, from one end of the performance right away to the other! Clown, columbine, harlequin, sprites, the terrible demon of the deepest depths, and a wonderful sort of electric-lighted saint, whose appearance puzzled me somewhat, were there. The dresses were perfect dreams of loveliness. Then there were beautiful celestial visitants, singing, oh so sweetly, out of tune, and being wheeled about the stage on perambulating platforms of paradise. There, too, was the "Sign of the Red Cross Knight," wandering upstairs and downstairs, and, whisper it not, in my lady's chamber — gracefully tumbling over his sword, and peristently tying himself into knots with his draperies. There he met an old man who distinctly did not say his prayers, but babbled through one whole act incoherent curses, which were presumably addressed to some glittering things that looked uncommonly like Christmas Tree decorations, but which were intended, I think, to represent gold and silver coins of the realm. Then there were celestial staircases, and a gorgeous transformation scene that would have done infinite credit to old Drury Lane itself, and it was all so intensely amusing, and the gods were so jolly, that when the prompter blew his assertive whistle for the "gauzes to come down" after an ethereal-looking angel had been indulging in a hymn of praise more emphatically out of tune than ever, the gallery boys shouted out "Four-wheeler! whoa!" By a strange freak, instead of calling the pantomime hero Prince Charming or otherwise, they named him Christian, and he somehow missed his cue in the last act and didn't turn up at the celestial gate "on time," and I distinctly heard some one say "Where is Christian? Why is not Christian here?" and then "The Bells" began to ring, and somebody else in the gallery said "Order, order," and his companion replied "Order what you like." The last I saw of the pantomime was the tardy Christian scuttling up the marble staircase to get at the celestial gate before it was closed, and the funny sort of electric-lighted saint, still wearing a remnant of a discarded halo on his head, was urging him up the steps rather as if he were coaxing chickens into a coop. And then what do you think? When I got home and was telling some friends to go to the Olympic Theatre if they wanted to enjoy a good laugh, they exclaimed, "O shade of Bunyan, you have been to see the 'Pilgrim's Progress'!"

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE CHILD'S KINGDOM.

THE Child's Kingdom has this season the Grand Duchess Olga for a sovereign. Her wax effigy figures in the toy departments of the Universal Providers. She is seated in a tall baby's chair with a front rail to prevent her falling forward, and a gorgeous pillow to prop her up behind. That emblem of insatiable voracity, the double-headed eagle (just as if one beak were not enough for the devourer), is spread out above her. The wax image is copied from the one prepared for Grévin's show, and was taken both from a sketch from life and from photos of her youthful Imperial Highness. Toys are piled up round the infantine throne; the costlier toys are nearest, and the cheapest furthest off. Thus hierarchical distinctions are typified in the Child's Kingdom, as in the Empire of the Russian autocrat. To the Parisian fillette her consœur, the infant Grand Duchess, is the outward and visible sign of the Russian Alliance. I heard a little lassie—a youthful Parisienne, of course—say to her governess as both gazed at the effigy, "I want so much to know why the Grand Duchess's top hair is brushed into a tuft or crest? Is she to be married to Prince Victor, since they are at the trouble to make her look like Napoleon and the King of Rome?" The governess opined that perhaps it was to accustom people to the idea that the Imperial Sceptre of Russia may hereafter descend to the baby hand now stretched forth (in effigy) to clutch a toy.

One is otherwise reminded in the Child's Kingdom of the Russian Alliance. "Le Tsar et la Tsarine en France" is a splendid volume, with thick, gilt-edged leaves and glorious chromo-lithographs. It only costs 7 fr. 50 c. One has for that sum portraits of grand Russian personages in outlandish Court dresses; barbarously magnificent coronation scenes at Moscow; and, lastly, Nicholas and Alexandra's triumphs in Paris. One almost has too many ovations and fêtes. After turning over pages filled with grand ceremonies, ovations, and illuminations, one would like a little of the grime of every-day life. The binding is in Russian style. Cunning chemistry has imparted to it a Russian leather smell. To a child's eye the whole thing must be delightful as a Christmas extravaganza. The volume is meant also for provincial adults. What I most complain of, as an adult, is that it has no touch of nature or of humour.

Another magnificent volume is an Album of Hymns set to easy music. The publisher dedicates this work to her Infantine Imperial Highness. Whatever in the Catholic hymnology might jar with Greek Orthodoxy has been excluded. The contents table has "Ave Maria," a hymn dear to the late Czar, who was a devout Mariolator; "Prière du Soir" (nothing to do with Bishop Ken's "Evening Hymn"); "Noël," a simple antique melody, with quaint words; "Agnus Dei;" and "Le Ciel a Visité la Terre." The Grand Duchess shows a precocious love of music. If Lombroso and Galton are sound on heredity, she ought to. Her English, Danish and Hessian great-grand parents were extremely musical. Nicholas I. and Alexander II. were not. The former had no more ear than Louis Philippe, who sang horribly out of tune. The reigning Czar is a delicious tenorino, and the Czarina, had it been her destiny to struggle for a livelihood, might been a great professional pianist. By the way, tiny pianos that have a few tiny octaves on the keyboard, and are made to be played, are among the toys forming the inner circle round H.I.'s waxen image.

Nicholas and Alexandra are brought into the Child's Kingdom. We generally see them bolt upright and passive as Egyptian gods. When they are got up in an expensive pictorial style, they have a Byzantine background. We have them on the lids of toy-boxes, work-boxes, bonbon-boxes, on needle-books, on carton-pâte letter-racks, and on the curtains of puppet shows. The Troika in the Child's Kingdom is another visible sign of the Russian Alliance, or fad, or craze, or whatever it may be. A lady wrapped in furs, and wearing an Astrakan Nicksa cap, drives three horses abreast. The middle horse rests on a stake, like the war steed of Louis XIV. in the Place de la Victoire. On the lower end of the stake is a wheel. The seat on which the lady sits contains a mechanism which can be set going by a push-button at the back. The button pressed, off starts the Troika, the lady leaning forward with elbows high in air. One can buy a Troika at any of the Universal Providers—all of which are States of the Child's Kingdom—for 9 fr. 50 c. Does not this seem cheap? The highly-finished eye-deceiving Troika costs 250 fr. Eye-deceiving toys are heaped round the effigies of the Grand Duchess Olga. Children of the rich French are fastidious, and expect perfect toys. They do not seem to have the imagination that transforms a roughly-hewn piece of deal into a horse, a cow, a sheep, and finds poetry in a "tree" stiff as a chess pawn.

Let us hope that gambling instincts are not fostered by toy "games." Le Jeu du Nain Jaune is a favourite of the young. We have the new Dutch top à crémaillère, with nickel fittings, le nursery (sic) roulette, and the new nursery game of marbles, or le Jeu de Billes, which is livelier than les Petits Chevaux. Le Jeu de Jacquet is a variety of back-gammon; in le Nouveau Jeu du Massacre are six naughty boys, knocked over by an individual resembling the Shadow. La Loterie Parisienne is a wheel of fortune with an assortment of lots, and the wheel can be had for 5 fr. 90 c or 8 fr. 75 c. There are lots for every infantine taste; for boys, for girls, for Nou nou (nurse) and Bobonne (nursery maid). Le Jeu du Clown claims to be mouvementé and exciting. So does the Pagode Japonnais, or game of skill. Le Jeu d'adresse is in the nature of Aunt Sally, but more complicated. Prince Bismarck has gone clean out of Toyland. Eleven years ago he was a great subject for those puzzles known as "questions." He always ended in being covered with confusion. The artificer of the puzzles had no idea what good prophets they were going to prove. Toy makers take no notice of the Kaiser, unless in a sputtering and eccentric rocket on wheels. His Imperial Majesty wears a crown. He rides on a tin cannon which you set on the ground, and press with a rod a push-button in the top of the crown. An explosion ensues. The Kaiser is seen to ignite, and off he goes on wheels, zigzagging, fizzing, sparkling, blazing, crackling, until quite used up. "Irreverent," you say. So it is; but reverence is not to be expected in the toy world of Paris. I fancy the numerous "massacres" were suggested by the rare echoes that reached the French public of the Armenian atrocities.

The question toys want fun. They were better when Bismarck was a butt for spite. "La Chèvre du Petit Bergé" shows how caterers for the Child's Kingdom look alive. Le Petit Bergé is the one grandchild of President and Madame Faure. The doting grandmother provided him with a goat carriage to draw him up and down the Elysée gardens. This draft animal was housed with some foxhounds—in a specially built chalet. They seemed to get on pleasantly with the goat before they were taken to Rambouillet to be trained. The training may have stimulated carnivorous appetite. However, one morning little Bergé wanted to go out driving in the palace garden. When the goat was sought in the chalet its horns only were found. The dogs had devoured it in the course of the night. The "question" is où est la chèvre? The answer is given on an illustrated card. It gives a tree, a chalet, a statue, some shrubs. In looking closely one sees a Madame fair, beating dogs with her parasol handle, and a mutilated goat.

The cinématographe has been the lion of most Christmas entertainments. It was sent to children's and incurables' hospitals by President Faure. Of course, the personages and scenes were Russian, or culled from the streets of Paris and the gardens of Versailles during the Czar's and Czarina's visit. It must have all seemed wonderful to aged gammers and gaffers. Very old people here are classed by the Department of Public Charity as "incurables." The President last week was received by five hundred men, whose ages ranged from seventy to ninety-eight, and by eight-hundred women of the same ages. The poor things appeared to him so greatly behind the time, that he sent a cinématographic artist to bring them up to date somewhat. An old woman, weak in the head, nearly died of fright. She was thrown into a shiver by the sight of action at once violent and silent in its operation as a fall of snow. The first day the Czar and Czarina were in Paris the silence of the multitude was almost cinématographic. It was the only time in my life when I saw a vast and noiseless multitude.

Have you ever thought that there is more than meets the ear in the hackneyed couplet,

> Souvent femme varie,
> Bien fol qui s'y fie?

When reading it the other day in the Hugo correspondence a new light fell on it. Francis I. surely had no experience of feminine inconstancy in the bright Chambord days. It was at Chambord that he wrote with a diamond the couplet on a window pane. Might he not have wanted to slip from the toils of a designing beauty, who vowed eternal devotion in order to obtain a corresponding answer? If she were to be his eternally, why should he not be hers for evermore? She declared love that could only end with life—if so soon. No lover's oath, but a knight's promise, would be what she wanted. Francis had the long, dipping nose of a cunning person. He was not a man to strike a woman so much as with a rose. So he sought escape in finessing. I thus read the couplet:—"I doubt not, fair lady, your sincerity; but doubt your self-knowledge." "I leave you full liberty to be inconstant; be as good, I pray, to me." The couplet was playful, polite, delicately turned. As it was impersonal, nobody could take offence. It was also an answer in full to a crampon.

Fine gentlemen sometimes stoop low to conquer money. An instance has been furnished by the suit of Mlle. Caroline Letessier v. Baron Georges Heckeren. The fair suitor is one of les disparues de l'Empire. She ranked with Anna Deslions, Cora, Skittles, and Mme. Musard among the beauties of Imperial France, and was supposed to have sucked as much out of Turkish loans as Mlle. Léonide Leblanc. Khalil Pasha was one of her open admirers. Baron Georges Heckeren ranked among the devoted ones. He apparently rolled in wealth, as did also his father, the hero of the fatal Pouschkine duel, and the fire-eating defender of the Emperor in the Senate. There was no family fortune. But the Emperor was a source of wealth to every one who could establish a claim to his gratitude. As Baron Heckeren père rallied to him before the Coup d'Etat, he was able to make good such a claim. The Empire down, evil times had to be faced. M. Vandal, the late Baron's son-in-law, was deprived of the situation of Postmaster-General. The sensational salary of £30,000, of course, dropped, and other perquisites with it. But after the Duc Decazes became Foreign Minister, and Bonapartists entered the secret counsels of Marshal MacMahon, there were fine opportunities for the Heckerens to make money on the Bourse. From the documents read by Mlle. Letessier's counsel, it appeared that she and M. Georges Heckeren entered into a speculative partnership. The lady stood more than well at the Bank of France, and was able to pay up heavy differences when things did not go well. But things went very well in the early days of the Moral Order Government. The war scare of 1875, got up by Bismarck's reptiles, his favourite Berlin banker, and a French Minister, brought the Heckeren-Letessier firm a clear gain of £80,000. Luck, however, changed, because there was a new deal for the great political offices. The Heckeren-Letessier partners had heavy losses. Caroline then lent £13,000 to her associate. He gave her a receipt, which showed that he intended to play on the Bourse with the money. Did she know that judges could not trouble themselves with a debt of this kind? The Baron said she did, her counsel said she did not, and, as what was written was written, the Court washed its hands of the matter. He could only tell her of losses when she claimed the heavy sum. They quarrelled and made up, quarrelled again, were reconciled, and at last fell out for good. In one of the intervals between the tiffs, she entrusted him with railway shares and Egyptian bonds, valued by her notary at £16,000. The stock was to be made use of by him as a gage for a loan which Oppenheim and Alberty had agreed on. It is needless to say what steps were taken to prevent the fair creditor being barred by limitations. She was a claimant for the £16,000 during twenty years, and at last had to appear as plaintiff in a hotly defended action to enforce repayment. It was pleaded that the loan was contracted at Oppenheim's to facilitate gambling transactions. This did not appear, however, and the Baron finds himself obliged to restore to Caroline her bonds and shares or their equivalent.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE following letter, Dear Lady Betty, has been delivered to me by mistake:—

"Eaton-square, Monday, December 28, 1896.

"Beloved Belinda,—We have been spending Christmas quietly in London, for since father became interested in financial stock he cares nothing for the farm stock, which formerly monopolised his attention. He has invested his soul, his heart, and his intelligence in the City. We are expecting the dividends with anxiety.

"On Christmas morning we all went to church, where Mr. Latimer preached an admirable sermon, founded upon the text, "Peace on earth and goodwill toward men." As the text pointedly omits to mention goodwill toward women, I felt free to indulge in uncharitable thoughts concerning those of my sex who formed part of the congregation. How unhappy Eve must have been when there was no other woman upon the earth to criticise! To make the matter worse, there was only one man for Eve, and that man was her husband!

"Christmas is, indeed, a glorious and devotional festival! It is most pleasant to see that even the very poorest enter into the spirit of the feast. For several days it has been impossible to leave the house, as the streets have been crowded with staggering, shouting, and swearing men, women, and children. And there are those who pretend that the English take their pleasures sadly! Either dinner disagreed with dear papa, or his devotional emotions had upset him, for he became quarrelsome, and hurried away to the club. This and the sudden illness of my brother Bertie slightly disturbed an otherwise especially happy Christmas. Bertie was taken ill on Sunday. The doctor says that he is suffering from a severe attack of D.T., but how he can have caught it we cannot conceive, for Bertie always reads the Sportsman, never the Telegraph.

"In a modest manner I have striven to assist the necessitous. My dressmaker, Madame Giraudin, sent her account, and wrote assuring me that she was being terribly pressed by her creditors. Poor woman, it pained me very much to be unable to discharge the debt; but I sent her three new customers, the Garrenden girls, and told Madame Giraudin to charge them double the usual prices, as they are very rich. Thus, my dear, by taking a little trouble, and with a little ingenuity, each one of us can do much good—by proxy! Ah! Belinda, I do wish you would give more of your time to charitable objects and less of it to the pursuit of pleasure! No doubt you require the whole of your allowance to dress in a manner befitting the position in life which you have been called upon to occupy. But money is not everything. Why not organise occasional concerts for the entertainment of the villagers upon the estate? It may be practically impossible for you to feed the hungry or to clothe the naked, but you can sing to them.

"Good-bye, my darling. I wish for you a most happy New Year, and I hope that 1897 will bring you much spiritual profit, much personal pleasure, and much temporal prosperity.—Your ever affectionate friend,

"Genevieve.

"P.S.—By the way, did you not tell me when we met last that your dear father had invested the greater part of his fortune in the Cleopatra Valley Consolidated Mines? They tell me the whole affair is a fraud, and that criminal proceedings are to be taken against the promoters. Good-bye again, dearest, and a Happy New Year to you."

On Wednesday there were forty-seven deaths announced in the obituary column in the Times. In eight instances the age of the dead was omitted. In twelve, those who had died were under seventy. The remaining twenty-seven had died at the age of seventy or beyond it. The united ages of the twenty-seven amounted to 2,117 years, so that if they had lived consecutively instead of contemporaneously, they would have in twenty-seven generations united us to a period two centuries prior to the Christian era.

There is room for a book to be called "True Fairy Tales." One of these stories has excited much interest upon the Continent. Some years ago a young and very rich American woman married a foreign Prince. They did not "live for ever happy afterwards." Recently the youthful Princess fell in love with a Tzigane—otherwise a gipsy. The lady has left her husband, and, with the Tzigane, and wearing £200,000 of jewellery, has gone to live in the mud hovel which is his home! Mr. Olney might find a means of extending the elastic Monroe Doctrine so as to make it a national matter for a gipsy to interfere with an American Princess—and with two hundred thousand pounds' worth of American jewellery! Anything may be done with the miraculous Monroe Doctrine—with the exercise of a little ingenuity.

The Prince of Wales was anxious to organise a Naval Exhibition at the Imperial Institute to commemorate the completion by her Majesty of the longest reign upon record in the history of this country. Those who have to advise the Prince in the matter, however, have opposed the proposal, and the Prince has reluctantly abandoned the scheme. It is possible that there are many serious objections to now repeating an exhibition which some years ago was especially successful, and was a source of much entertainment to millions of people. But these objections are not obvious to those who are not behind the scenes in the matter. The modified Naval Exhibition which the authorities are organising at the Imperial Institute, and which is to be opened in the spring, must prove a poor substitute for the magnificent entertainment that the Prince desired to promote. It is difficult to perceive how a "Yachting Exhibition" can be made to commemorate seriously a reign which has been marked by such momentous changes as have occurred in the build and fortification of our men-of-war. The appointment of Sir Alfred Jephson to a position of power at the Imperial Institute has given general satisfaction. It would be a pity, therefore, if Sir Alfred were to fail in his first undertaking at the Institute. The British public is resolved to give in 1897 a loose rein to its appetite for amusement, a circumstance which is not to be wondered at, seeing that it will then commemorate an event unparalleled in the history of the nation. The authorities might consider this with the view of meeting the legitimate wishes of the public.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE National Hunt Committee ought to prohibit any races whatever of less value than £50 (£100 would be greatly preferable), and whenever the entrance fees produce a surplus, the amount should go either to the winner or to the second and third horses. It is a proof of the scandalous apathy and stupid unconcern of this ridiculous tribunal that such surpluses are still allowed to be grabbed by race managers, whose cupidity, as a rule, is notoriously insatiable. This abuse was rectified by the Jockey Club, so far as meetings under Newmarket rules are concerned, several years back, thanks to the repeated protests of Truth against the iniquitous system which had so long prevailed on the turf, and a similar reform ought years ago to have been carried out by the National Hunt Committee. The fact is that when an alteration of this description, which deals with the general laws of the turf, is passed by the Jockey Club, it ought, ipso facto, to be adopted by the National Hunt Committee. It would be an enormous benefit to every one who is in any way concerned with either flat racing or cross-country sport if the laws of the turf in both departments of sport could be once for all fixed, defined, arranged, and lucidly codified. At present in many respects there is the most perplexing confusion and uncertainty, the said laws being as much hidden in darkness as those of Nature before the days of Newton.

The first Tuesday in January is the principal nomination day of the year, so far as concerns the number of races which then close. There are all the Spring Handicaps, as usual, and the Chester Cup will be far and away the most valuable of them, for there is £2,550 of added money, and the sweepstakes goes also to the winner, whereas the City and Suburban of £2,000, the Lincolnshire Handicap of £2,000, and the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap of £3,000 are all subscription races. Owners should be encouraged to enter their horses for the next Chester Cup, as it was a very easy race to win this year. At the time the field was supposed to be a good one, and The Rush, who won, was extolled to the skies, but of the three placed horses not one has since been successful in any race whatever, and it has become clear that the starters were all a very bad lot. The Rush, however, has since been preposterously overweighted by the handicapper, who may, perhaps, entertain a more just estimate of his racing capacity next season. He has been put to hurdle racing, which is a wise policy on the part of his owner, as the horse is evidently not good enough for any of the valuable weight-for-age races, while he is overweighted in handicaps. He will, no doubt, go for the £3,000 hurdle race at Auteuil next June, which event was won this year by Count Schomberg, who is a very fine jumper. The Grand National Steeplechase will next year be worth £2,500, of which sum £500 is to be divided between the second and third horses. If there are thirty entries for the Liverpool Spring Cup, the race will be worth £1,000.

People have gone wild about long-distance races, and every one has been thrown into paroxysms of enthusiasm by the decision of the Ascot managers to add £3,000 to the Gold Cup, besides giving a piece of plate value £1,000. It is one thing to establish rich Cup races, but it is quite another matter to get respectable fields to contest them. The fact is, if there were a number of races of this kind they would be simply farmed by one or two animals, as was the case with the old Queen's Plates, for the number of horses in training which could certainly stay two miles and a half in a fast run race can be counted on the fingers of one hand. Up to the present time, the experiment of increasing the value of the Ascot Cup has not been brilliantly successful, and it is still more foolish and absurd to waste £1,500 on the Alexandra Plate. If it is desired to multiply the number of stayers on the Turf some more practical measures will have to be taken in the direction of very largely reducing the number of two-year-old races. So long as horses are so outrageously and recklessly over-worked as two-year-olds and three-year-olds, it is fatuous to expect to see a lot of stout stayers going about. The notion that stayers will be established in the land because long-distance races are being increased in value reminds me of the story of the German gentleman who jumped over chairs and sofas in order to acquire vivacity, or of Milton's country squire, who raised his park wall in order to keep out the crows. There may be a fairly large entry for the Ascot Cup, but three-fourths of the horses in the race will be no more capable of staying the course, supposing there to be a decent pace, than of flying in the air. Crackbrained enthusiasts are already proclaiming Persimmon as the winner of next year's Gold Cup, but we have yet to learn that the Prince of Wales's horse can stay this course, and many a Derby and Leger winner has utterly failed to do so. Omnium II. is the only animal likely to be entered which has conclusively proved its stamina. I observe, by the way, that one writer announces that although St. Simon will next season have no good three-year-olds to run for him, so far as can at present be seen, yet his place in the 1897 list of winning sires is assured if Persimmon keeps well, as that horse will be certain to follow in the steps of Isinglass, and win all three £10,000 races. This is all vastly fine, but it so happens that Persimmon is entered for only one of these races, the Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park.

There are some twenty races closing at Newmarket next week, and most unattractive indeed are their pecuniary conditions. There are several events which have already failed to fill, and how the Stewards can be so infatuated as to suppose that they will now obtain the desired amount of patronage it is impossible to understand, as there is no real improvement in the conditions. At Ascot, besides the events already mentioned, there are the Coventry Stakes (£1,000 added), the All Aged Stakes (£300 added), and the Windsor Castle Stakes (£300 added), all to be run next year; the Triennial (£400 added), for 1898-99-1900, and the Rous Memorial (£1,000 added) for 1898. By the way, how long is the practice to be continued of giving the forfeits in this and other races of the same name to the Rous Memorial Fund, which must have received a huge sum in this way during the last eighteen years? At Goodwood there are the Cup for next year, value £800, the Ham Stakes for 1899, and the Gratwicke Stakes for 1900. Among the events closing at Liverpool are the St. George's Stakes of £2,500 (to run in July, 1899, at three years old), and the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes of £2,000, at the same meeting, to run at two years old. The Gimcrack Stakes, at York, closes on Tuesday, but it is nonsense to give the forfeits to the fund, and it would be much better for the race if there were an entrance of £5, to be the only liability if struck out by the Tuesday after Epsom, and a sweepstake of £20 each for animals left in after that date, the entrance-money to go to the fund.

An event well worthy of the attention of English owners is the Grand Prize of Berlin of £4,000, a weight-for-age stake for yearlings and upwards, to run in July, 1899, as three-year-olds and upwards, distance one mile and three furlongs. The chances are that it will not take a flyer to win this race.

The Sporting Times wishes to raise £20,000 by increasing the charge of admission (now £1) to the so-called Royal Enclosure at Ascot, and would give this sum to the Cup, which would be a thoroughly idiotic waste of money, for no larger or better field would be attracted than now goes to the post for that event. If £20,000 were raised in this or any other way it may be hoped that it would be devoted to a general strengthening of the programme, and, above all, the Hardwicke Stakes should be made a £10,000 race. The sale of the Royal Enclosure tickets is, however, a perquisite of the Master of the Buckhounds. It would be a salutary change at Ascot and other great meetings to charge £5 for paddock tickets.

Whittier has been relegated to the stud. He was a very speedy horse, but could not stay, an easy mile being the length of his tether. His career on the turf was not brilliantly successful, and it was lucky for the speculative public that he was not engaged in last year's Two Thousand and Derby. His great misfortune was his defeat for the Eclipse Stakes by Le Justicier, who got well away, and fairly "slipped" the field. If the French horse had ever been caught he would have been beaten.

The case of Mr. Jackson and the Football Association still continues to agitate the sporting press. The attitude of several correspondents in the papers is very peculiar. Nearly all of them clearly give vent to personal spleen against Mr. Jackson, while not one ventures to suggest that the Council can give to its resolutions the force of laws. The action of the Council has their full approval, in fact, simply because Mr. Jackson has, they believe, been given a smack in the eye. Besides, did not the team of Old Internationals in which Lord Kinnaird, the President of the Association, was playing, get permission to play against Charterhouse School? This is an argument that one hears. Well, it proves nothing more than this, that, for some reason or another, the President saw fit to get a permit that he was not legally compellable to get. If the Council and its supporters would show by what authority, other than their own inherent greatness they have acted, then one could appreciate the position they have taken up. This has not been done. I am quite ready to admit that some rules to regulate scratch teams may be necessary. But such rules should not be passed unless the circumstances they are intended to meet render them absolutely necessary. At present the Council can inquire into cases of alleged professionalism, and can compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of the documents in the case of affiliated clubs. The circumstances which it is said call for new rules are that scratch teams play such clubs, and the promoter gets a part of the gate. If he does so he ceases to be an amateur, and the ordinary methods of inquiry are open to the Council. But the fact that Brown or Jones have acted in this way would not necessitate the imposition of a stringent set of rules to regulate scratch teams. If, however, the practice is prevalent, then other considerations arise, and the first point to be determined will be whether or not men who can get others to play for nothing are to be entitled to make money for themselves out of the gate. The highest interests of football are, in the minds of the majority of the Council, centred in professionalism, and those who run professional teams do not work for nothing. They, like the players, get paid for their efforts. Surely, it might be argued, the true commercial spirit demands that when a man is so clever that he can get players together who will draw a gate and yet ask nothing, then this man should reap the reward of his enterprise by pocketing his share of the gate. I can quite understand the misguided individual who still retains some vague notions that nobody connected with amateur sport should make anything out of the game feebly protesting. But if professionalism is the be-all and the end-all of Association football then the closer the amateur is brought into touch with this system the better for the true interests of the game as conceived by the Council. The conclusions, then, to be arrived at on this portion of the case are that no set of circumstances calling for a limitation on scratch matches has been shown to exist, and if the circumstances alleged do exist, then the Council ought to foster them instead of attempting to suppress them, this second conclusion being, of course, the logical outcome of the Council's attitude to amateurism. It would be idle to pretend that such results would be really in the interests of unpaid players. Those who organise these teams should be as much amateurs as the teams themselves. Only it does not rest with the Council, by a crude and ill-considered resolution, to endeavour to legislate in an unconstitutional manner.

Apart from certain Christmas and New Year's handicaps, foot-racing on the path has in past winters been chiefly confined to University runners. This winter, however, a change has come over the scene. The recent change of status of Downer, Watkins, Bacon, and others has resulted in these men racing during the months when, as amateurs, one was always told it was impossible for them to get fit. Mullen, the Irishman, had a brilliant race with Watkins, who made the pace, and was then easily beaten at the end of four miles. There is no doubt there is now a fine prospect in view for professional running. It is vain to hope for a series of matches at Stamford Bridge. A few events between these champions would well recoup the L.A.C. if it offered the stakes; besides, it would be a graceful recognition of the merits of old club-men.

The Southern Counties Amateur Cross Country Association is one of those bodies for whose crass stupidity one has a profound respect. That Association was the hero of the rule that forbade a club training within the four mile radius competing in its championships. Having repealed that rule, it has to do something else foolish. It has now retired from the National Cross Country Championships, because the Northern and Midland men declined to let the race be always held in the South; and southern clubs are not to be allowed to compete. It is quite true that the arrangements in the North and Midlands have not been all that could be desired. Neither have they always been so very good in the South. It certainly seems utterly absurd to forbid a club, which may not object to insufficient dressing accommodation, going for the championship if it desires to do so. However, this is how the case stands at present, and one can only suppose that the actual athletes are quite satisfied with the state of affairs which their representatives have brought to pass. The South alleges that in the North and Midlands the authorities are incompetent to manage a National Championship. The South therefore leaves these inferior bodies to arrange the meeting, and confer the championship title, but declines to compete itself. A pack of idiots would not behave more foolishly.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—In a few days we shall enter upon the New Year, and my first wish to-day, therefore, is a Happy and Prosperous New Year to you and all friends, and readers of my letters. We enter upon 1897 with hopes that it may bring us greater prosperity than has been the case with the expiring year.

The Outlook for 1897.

Few people will, in fact, be sorry to see the end of 1896, which was ushered in by storm clouds, notably the ill-fated Jameson raid, the effects of which have acted as a wet blanket upon the markets all the year through, while President Cleveland's bellicose message concerning Venezuela had a year ago just sent a cold shiver through all the Stock Exchanges and Bourses. It is true that the United States Congress has this time supplied a Cuban sensation, but that is already fast fizzling out, thanks to the good sense of those of our Yankee cousins who are not politicians. It cannot, however, be said that bright spots have been wanting during the past year. Has not the Home Railway market braced up to a remarkable extent? Have not Home Industries come into general favour? and have not trade and commerce in this country taken a fresh start? It is to be hoped that the general improvement in trade will further continue, and there is, in fact, no reason why this should not be so, for the catalogue of misfortunes and lying rumours has been pretty well exhausted of late. International politics, moreover, look exceptionally hopeful just now, and even the ever-recurring Eastern Question does not give rise to the usual fears, as the Concert of Europe is fully maintained as regards the attitude to be assumed against Turkey. I am not going to tell you much on the subject of Home Rails to-day beyond saying that any continuance of the excellent trade conditions would promise further traffic increases and still higher dividends. Money of course has been scarce at the fag-end of the year, but, with the release of the dividends and probably of some Japanese money, rates may be expected to ease off, and thus encourage investment and speculation in Home Rails. I give herewith, in tabular form, the dividends for 1895, the first half of 1896, and the estimated dividends for the whole year of 1896, also the approximate yield on the basis of present prices after deducting the dividend from the quotations:—

—	Actual Dividend in 1895.	Actual Dividend First Half of 1896.	Estimated Dividend Second Half 1896.	Estimated Total Dividend for 1896.	Estimated Yield for 1896.
Brighton Ordinary	6 %	4¾ %	8¾ %	6¾ %	3⅜ %
" "A"	6	—	7½	7½ %	4¼ %
Chatham First Prefs	4 1/10	4½	4½	4½	3½
Great Eastern	2⅜	1½	4¾	3⅛	3½
Great Northern Deferred	1¼	—	2	2	3¾
Great Western	5⅛	4¾	7½	6⅛	3 9/16
Lancashire and Yorkshire	4½	5	5¾	5⅜	3⅝
London and North-Western	6⅜	6¼	8	7⅛	3⅝
London and South-Western	6⅜	5	8¼	6⅛	3 5/16
Midland	5⅛	5	6¾	5⅞	3½
North-Eastern	5⅜	5½	7¼	6⅜	3⅞
Sheffield	⅞	1	1¾	1⅜	2⅝
South-Eastern	4⅛	3	6½	4¾	3¼
Dover "A"	2¼	—	3½	3½	3½

It will be seen that there are still good opportunities for profitable investment to be found in the above list, Brighton "A" being a notable feature, although it is just possible that the dividend might not prove so good as estimated. Dover "A" also deserve attention, owing to the progressiveness of the line. One of the cheapest stocks is Metropolitan Districts, which, in view of the various schemes that are likely to benefit the line, ought to stand considerably higher than 27½. Not included in the above are the Scotch stocks. These promise exceedingly well, and both Caledonian Deferred Ordinary and North British are good purchases at present prices. Foreigners have kept up remarkably well, even Spanish having further recovered from the effect of the Cuban sensation. An important improvement has come about in South American stocks during the past year, which promises to continue; and the mining market has during the past week shown such marked strength that it is pretty safe to conclude that the protracted slump has come to an end. There is every prospect, in fact, that the Kaffir Circus will enter upon a period of important recoveries, while West Australians, too, look more hopeful. The patience of holders of mining shares has been severely tried during the year 1896 by an almost endless series of misfortunes, but the very extent of the fall in prices which has been established should be a guarantee of an all-round rise now that work at the mines is being prosecuted with renewed energy, and political conditions in the Transvaal have greatly altered for the better.

The South American Market.

The year 1896 may be called one of resurrection in the South American market, and more particularly in Argentines, for advances have occurred all along the line, and business in this department has become much more active. A year ago the Argentine 1886 Loan stood at 71. It is now quoted 84¼. The Funding Loan stood at 74, and has since risen to 82¾, while Buenos Ayres Water and Drainage bonds at 67¾ compare with 62 a year ago. Still more important has been the recovery in Argentine Railway stocks, and more particularly in the Debenture stocks of the guaranteed lines. Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Debenture stock was quoted 84 a year ago, and now stands at 95½, while the Income Debenture stock at 62¾ compares with 48 a year ago, but then, as I explained last week, this Income Debenture stock is expected to receive a minimum dividend of 4½ per cent. for the past year, and may therefore still be considered an excellent purchase at 62¾. Cordoba and Rosario stocks have also experienced an important upward movement, the Six per Cent. Debenture stock standing at 95 against 76 a year ago. Then, again, look at Buenos Ayres and Pacific First Debenture stock at 108½ against 95 a year ago, at Buenos Ayres and Rosario Ordinary at 71 against 58 at the commencement of the year, and at Central Argentine at 84½ against 67 a year ago! Readers of Truth are aware that all these have been favourite stocks of mine, that many of my correspondents have bought them at the bottom prices, and that I consistently advised holders to stick to them when other scribes did their best to frighten them out of their holdings at the very lowest points. Latest advices from Buenos Ayres are to the effect that Dr. Romero, the Minister of Finance, had resigned. This probably means that, after all, the earlier resumption of the full service of the debt will take place. It is very praiseworthy that the Argentines should have a sudden attack of honesty, and they will undoubtedly raise their credit considerably by acting on it. Should the proposed step be taken, we may look for an all-round advance. Personally, I should prefer such stocks as Cordoba Central (C.N.S.) Income Debenture stock at 62¾, and Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. Perpetual Debenture stock at 108½. But the improvement has not stopped at Argentines. Mexican Sixes, for instance, have risen from 90 to 95½. Brazilians, at 67¼ for the 1889 Loan, are but little better for the year, which they commenced at 66; and Chilians have actually declined three points to 90½ for the 1886 Loan, owing to the difficulties under which the country is labouring in connection with its financial troubles and its currency system. Costa Rica "B" bonds at 25 compare with 23 a year ago, and Colombians at 23 are considerably higher in comparison with the price of 14 a year ago; but in the case of Ecuador, a relapse of 10 has to be recorded, owing to renewed default. Uruguay bonds stand at only 44½ as compared with 46 a year ago, but they had touched 53 at one time, and the fall is due in part to the very mistaken secrecy which the Uruguayan Government has observed with regard to recent events in that country. The attempt to muzzle the Press in Monte Video was most injudicious and reprehensible. There is, however, not the slightest indication that the Government of Uruguay will not fulfil all its obligations, including the service of the Debt.

Yankees Irregular.

The view which I took of the Cuban sensation as likely to fizzle out quickly has been fully confirmed by events. The Senate has adjourned without discussing the famous resolution adopted by the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Relations, and the American people are speaking out very plainly against this ill-timed agitation. What they want is peace and a respite from political unrest, so as to be able to pursue their avocations, and work to retrieve the disasters of the past few years. It is evident, therefore, that the Jingoist senators will not be allowed to again disturb the country with their inflammatory speeches. Although quotations have not altogether recovered from the shock, they are distinctly improving, and with an abundance of money seeking investment in the States and excellent crop prospects, the outlook for American Railroad stocks is satisfactory. One of the leading American crop experts says that the crop in the entire wheat belt goes into winter quarters in much better shape than it did last year, and that the plants are well rooted, strong, healthy, and vigorous. Railroad earnings are beginning to compare favourably with last year, but too much should not be made of this. As a Wall-street contemporary says, the average stock trader operates on surface indications, and seldom if ever cares to delve for facts. It is for this reason that he rushes to sell when he finds that railroad earnings, compared with some corresponding period either more or less recent or remote, show a decrease, or reverses the operation should they reflect increases. It is a matter of indifference to him as to what caused the change; all he cares to know, and know early, is the extent of the difference, and on what side of the accounts it is. One is moved to make these observations through the fact that the Venezuela panic culminated in the third week of December, 1895, so far as low prices for stocks were concerned. The effect of the Venezuelan message on general trade and railroad earnings began almost immediately, and from December 20 may be dated the sharp falling off in railroad earnings in all sections of the States. It therefore follows that comparisons will soon be made with these poorer railroad earnings, and with anything like the revival of trade expected next year, comparisons should, and undoubtedly will, soon begin to be favourable. When it is considered that nearly the whole of the rise caused by the election of McKinley as President has been lost, it must be conceded that Yankee Rails are again at a very promising level, and any one buying Milwaukee at or near 75, Louisville at 59, Atchison Prefs. at 22½, Erie at 15, Denver Prefs. at 43, Denver Ordinary at 12, Southern Ordinary at 9¾, Norfolk Prefs. at 17, and Northern Pacific Prefs. at 23, should have a fair run for his money. The "Bears" have made the most of a few unimportant bank failures in the West and of an accident on the Louisville and Nashville line. The latter has evidently been greatly exaggerated. Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks have fluctuated with the American market, and are rather dull, the traffics not showing well. The Bond market has been comparatively firm, and a good deal of investment buying is going on both in New York and on this side. It will be useful at this time, when investors are looking round for suitable gilt-edged and second-class securities, to give a list of American Railroad bonds, which, notwithstanding the Cuban fizzle and other incidents, promise to constitute a favourite form of investment in the coming year. Considering their security, they yield a much better return than could be obtained elsewhere. I give herewith tables from two different firms, who do a large business in these bonds, and investors have thus a wide range over which to make their selection :—

Personally, if I had to make a selection, I would take, for instance, a gilt-edged bond like New York and Putnam First Consolidated Four per Cent. Mortgage bonds at 109, yielding £3. 16s. 3d. per cent., and add to it a certain portion of other higher-yielding securities, such as Northern Pacific Prior Lien Four per Cent. bonds at 88, yielding £41. 4s. 5d. per cent. Lynn and Boston Five per Cent. First Mortgage Gold bonds at 103, yielding £5. 0s. 3d. per cent.; Alabama Midland First Five per Cent. Mortgage bonds at 96, yielding £5. 9s. 9d. per cent.; Baltimore and Ohio Five per Cent. Sterling bonds at 93, yielding £5. 10s. 3d. per cent.; and Detroit, Grand Haven, and Milwaukee Consolidated Six per Cent. bonds at 86, yielding £8. 0s. 6d. per cent. An average return of over 5⅜ per cent. would thus be obtained, and the reasonable safety of this investment could be depended upon.

Kaffirs, Australian, and Other Mines.

There are many indications that a better time is coming in the Kaffir Circus, and through it in the whole Mining market. The continued sagging of prices has been stopped, and for the first time for many a month we have a carry-over list which shows in numerous instances slight gains in South African mining shares, while the improvement extends to a point or two in several of the Heavy stocks. I have so fully discussed the position of late that it will be unnecessary to again point out how the mining industry in the Transvaal is going ahead, how it is benefited by the larger supply of native labour, by the reduction in cost of labour, and by recent Legislative enactments, and how the political position in the Transvaal is also more satisfactory. The rumour that a claim had been advanced by the Transvaal Government on account of the Jameson raid, and that the sum was below £100,000, is false; but the amount will shortly be fixed, and the claim will then be made. This matter is, however, much less likely to interfere with the market than such spouting as Cecil Rhodes has been doing in Port Elizabeth, and which is by no means a fitting introduction for the examination which he has to undergo before the Royal Commission. A cablegram received by the Standard and Diggers' News reports that in the course of interviews with Messrs. J. B. Robinson and B. I. Barnato both gentlemen stated that they intended to devote themselves to the task of reorganising the mining industry, and exerting every possible and legitimate influence in the direction of reducing mining costs. They are also stated to have resolved to combat the mischievous misrepresentations circulated by interested parties concerning the attitude and intentions of the Government, and as satisfied that complete confidence in the Rand and in the future of its goldfields would shortly be re-established. This is exactly in accordance with what I predicted ever since these two millionaires departed from these shores, and as 1896 has been the year for the "Bears," so the year 1897 is likely to be the year for the "Bulls" of South African mining and land shares. In the meantime holders should stick tight to their shares, and if they wish to buy any more they can easily make their selection from the list which I gave last week. A favourable circumstance is the breaking-up of the drought, heavy rains having fallen since December 15, so that the mine dams are now all full of water. Thus we may expect that the December crushings will be benefited somewhat by the ample supply of water, while those for January should be above the average. A very favourable feature is the distribution of a final dividend of 30s. per share by the Ferreira Company, making 55s. per share, or 275 per cent. for the year. A circular is now being sent out by the East Rand Proprietary, giving particulars of the new debenture-issue of £300,000 for twelve months, which is to be guaranteed by a group against the right to take an issue of £150,000 of debentures in the Angelo Company for two years (convertible into Angelo shares at 3½ at any time during that period), and £100,000 debentures of the Driefontein Company, convertible into Driefontein shares at 2½. It remains to be seen how this new plan will be received by the public, and especially by the French holders, who have hitherto been the stumbling-block. Diamond shares have been strong, De Beers rising to 29¼ on the announcement of a dividend of 22s.,

New Jagersfontein are firm at 10½. New Bultfontein stand at 1⅛, and it is understood that a dividend of 7½ per cent. will be declared for the half-year just expired. The West Australian section has been greatly affected by the holiday time, and dealings have been reduced to a minimum, but there have not been wanting during the last day or two some favourable developments. West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance shares have advanced to 4⅜, and a further advance is expected. A rise to 4¼ in Great Boulder Perseverance has put up British Westralia, which are nominally quoted 4¾. Another crushing of the Great Boulder of 712 tons of ore for 2,147 oz. of gold was received favourably, and the price has moved up to 7⅝. Great Boulder Main Reef have advanced to 1⅜, in sympathy with Great Boulder. Very satisfactory was also the crushing of the East Murchison United of 618 tons of ore for 1,146 oz. of gold. These shares have improved to 1⅛, and if crushings should continue on this scale we may look for a further important advance in these. A feature of strength has also been Ivanhoe, which are better at 11¼, chiefly on Colonial buying. A further improvement in Hannan's Brownhill to 6⅞ will have been very unwelcome to the "Bears" of these shares. Lake View Consols remain in the neighbourhood of 7, West Australian Goldfields at 5⅝, and Hampton Plains are still very unduly depressed at 2¾. Most of the above Companies promise to give a good account of themselves in 1897. There are other shares in West Australian Mining Companies which are altogether at nominal prices at present, and can be picked up very cheap. Some of these deserve special attention, and I propose in the next issue to discuss the merits of those most likely to benefit purchasers at present quotations. There is yet another class of mines which has to be considered, the duffers. To many of these I drew attention at the very outset, and warned my readers to have nothing to do with them. Amongst these was the Golden Plum. I characterised this venture as over capitalised and unpromising, and never likely to prove a plum to the shareholders. For making these remarks, and for following up these criticisms, I have been much abused in certain circles; but Mr. Samuel de Lissa, in his speech at the meeting of the Ramage Syndicate (the parent Company), himself now confirms my view. He admitted that there was no denying the fact that the majority of their properties, including those they had floated, had gone wrong, mainly, he ventured to think, through bad management. Moreover, he continued, the promises held out by the experts, who had professed to examine the properties, had not by any means been borne out. No wonder Ramage Syndicate shares have fallen to $\frac{15}{16}$, although they touched at one time 6! The Golconda Gold Mines have just announced a crushing of 455 tons of ore for 1,084 oz. of gold, an average sample of the tailings assaying 4½ dwt. per ton. The following additional crushings have also come to hand:—Clyde Gold Mines, 80 tons of ore for 68 oz. of gold, tailings assaying 23 dwt. per ton; Cue "1," 350 tons for 134 oz.; Consolidated Gold Mines of Western Australia (Coongan Mine), 95 tons for 84 oz., making a total of 685 oz. from 727 tons; Menzies Crusoe, 234 tons for 471 oz., tailings assaying 15 dwt. per ton; this makes a total of 3,244 tons crushed for 7,092 oz. of gold; Menzies Gold Reefs Proprietary, 129 tons for 212 oz., tailings assaying 20 dwt. per ton, making a total of 2,272 tons of ore crushed for 3,794 oz. of gold. The low yield of the Cue "1" is explained by the fact that in order to keep the mill going some poor stone from the upper levels has been crushed. At the meeting of the North West Australian Goldfields Company, held last Thursday, very satisfactory statements were made, and it would appear as if this Company is pulling itself round. On the face of the statements of the position made at the meeting, the shares now quoted at ½ appear to be very cheap. A further crushing of 80 tons of ore for 100 oz. of gold has also just been announced, and this, with the previous recent crushing of 141 tons for 211 oz., makes a total yield of 311 oz. of gold of the value of about £1,244. Advices from the General Gordon Mine near White Feather are very favourable. Rich stone has been found in the 60-ft. level, the formation being 40 ft. wide; and the appointment of Professor Krause, who occupies the Chair of Mineralogy at the Melbourne University, as manager of this mine, is very promising. A London Register has just been opened by Messrs. Stoneham & Wethereds, Limited, the agents for the General Gordon Company, at 70, Cornhill, E.C. I welcome back from Western Australia Mr. Faithfull Begg, M.P., who, I understand, has conceived a favourable opinion of the West Australian goldfields. He has also visited New Zealand and British Columbia on his trip round the world, and whenever he is inclined to speak he will be able to give very valuable information on the various goldfields. Mr. Frank Nicolas, the engineer to the West Australian Development Corporation group, has also returned from Western Australia, and will, no doubt, shortly give his experiences on the mines with which he is connected, such as the Armadale, Dorothy, Orotava, &c. In other Australian mines there has been very little movement. Mount Morgan are firmer, and amongst Charters Towers shares, Mill's Day Dawn, United, and Bonnie Dundee have hardened. Bendigo New Chum and Broken Hill Proprietary are, however, lower. Croydon Consols have been firm at 10s. 6d. to 11s. A further crushing of 270 tons of ore for 1,162 oz. of gold has just been announced. In New Zealand mines a recovery to 2⅞ in Consolidated Goldfields of New Zealand was the feature. On the other hand, Taitapu, Woodstock, and Komata Reefs are easier. Indian mines have been firm all round, Mysore and Nundydroog more especially advancing. In the general foreign section dealings have been nominal. St. John del Rey and Montana are slightly better, but De Lamar and Springdale have given way. The shares of the Grand Central, the well-known Mexican mine, have been firm at 2¼. The Debenture issue of the Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico, which are convertible into Ordinary shares at the option of the holder, has met with a favourable reception on the part of the public, and the debentures are quoted at 102½ to 103½, at which they still form an excellent purchase. The Secretary of the Sultana Gold and Silver Mining Syndicate, Limited, is circularising the shareholders with reference to the acquisition of a new mining property, for which an appeal is made for further funds. I see that this syndicate was registered on May 6, 1895, to acquire a mining concession in the Vilayet of Angora, Turkey; but so far the Syndicate has not set the world on fire, and it would be desirable to hear something about its previous achievements. The London General Assets Corporation, Limited, of 3 and 4, Great Winchester-street, London, E.C., is to the front with advance prospectuses and underwriting letters of the Victoria and General Mining and Finance Corporation, Limited. As they offer as much as 10 per cent. for underwriting commission, and 20 per cent. for procuration fee, it is evident that the promoters have put a great deal of loading on this concern, and personally I should perfer to keep the money in my own pocket.

The "Moses Moss" Toy Fund.

Last week I was able to announce a total of £174. 15s. 6d., and I have since received the following subscription:—

Neville A. Abrahams & Co., £1. 1s.

New Enterprises and Issues.

As usual at this season promoters have been resting on their oars, and the only prospectus so far issued has been that of the following Company:—

The Greylingstadt Gold Mining and Exploration Company, Limited (Heidelberg District, South African Republic).—This Company has been formed to acquire and work two blocks of 58 and 38 claims respectively, with mill-site and water-right situate on the farm Roodepoort, in the Greylingstadt District, Heidelberg, South African Republic. The capital is £150,000, divided into 150,000 shares of £1 each, of which 50,000 are set apart for working capital, and subscriptions are now invited for 80,000 shares.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents :—

Government, &c., Bonds.

F. C. O.—Yes, I should consider Argentine Funding bonds a good purchase now. If you wish to invest in Railway debentures, Buenos Ayres and Pacific Four per Cent. First Perpetual Debenture stock at 109 should suit yon; also as a more progressive, if more speculative, investment, Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income Debenture stock at 61½. The latter are expected to receive a dividend of at least 4½ per cent. for the current year. Quebec Bondholder.—I should say there is every prospect of this conversion being made compulsory, if the majority accepts. Uruguay Bondholder.—You will have seen from last week's issue that the remittance from Montevideo has come to hand, and the whole trouble was only due to some slight misunderstanding between the Government and the London and River Plate Bank. 2. No.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

S. T.—No; I do not advise purchase of these American Land shares; European investors have lost quite enough in these. Eta—I have repeatedly explained that the Lottery bonds of Cunliffe, Russell, & Co., 10, Place de la Bourse, Paris, are dependent upon drawings only for their income, and yield but a small return. The quotations of this Paris firm are considerably above the market quotations in most instances. Careful, Manchester.—You ought to have nothing to do with these outside dealers, but should transact your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. A. M. P.—A second-class life office. Odin.—After the heavy fall you should hold for a recovery, which is quite possible in view of the slight general improvement which has taken place in Brazil. Ostrich.—I should think that you can obtain a yield satisfactory to you by investing in some of the gilt-edged American Railroad bonds, of which I give some lists in this issue. G. le M.—If you want to buy Lottery bonds you should do so through a respectable London firm of foreign bankers. I send you a name in your envelope. The Paris firm in question charge considerably over the market price. J. M. L.—I am not a general information bureau, and cannot tell you anything about the firm in question. Brighouse.—You cannot be a regular reader of Truth, or else you would know that I advise my readers to have nothing to do with the Provident Association of London. The promises held out in their prospectus are not fulfilled. Felix.—You cannot get the return you require in Trustee investments. Nemo.—It is impossible to tell whether the charge was justified unless you give me the exact names of the stocks. S. W. R., Cardiff.—I do not advise you to speculate through Douglas, Hungerford, & Williams, of 5, Copthall-buildings; you should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange.

Home Rails.

Liverpool.—The best speculative purchase in the Home Railway market is at present Caledonian Deferred Ordinary (Coras). J. T.—I am afraid that you are so little acquainted with Stock Exchange matters that you are bound to lose your money. As a matter of principle I cannot give the names of stockbrokers, and cannot reply by letter.

American and Foreign Rails.

Suir Island.—I do not see that you have any claim with reference to Erie Prefs. You ought to have noticed the advertisements and joined the reconstruction. You might, however, again make an appeal to Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co. Why do you not read the financial papers? Young Investor.—1. Hardly any risk. 2. The dividends are paid in English money on this side. 3. I do not like the Great Horseless Carriage Company, and have repeatedly said so. H. C. P.—It is not likely that the value of these shares will suffer by a possible conversion, and you should hold. Anxious, Dublin.—You should certainly hold all your American Rails Nos. 1 to 5 for a rise. Borth.—This American concern has gone through bad times, and you must decide yourself whether to join the reorganisation, or have your shares forfeited. It may be throwing good money after bad, or it may not. R. H. and W. J.—I see no reason why as trustees you should not continue to hold shares and bonds of the Illinois and New York Central to the market value of over £40,000. The capital value is likely to improve in the new year. Earthquake.—I should think it would be advisable to hold your bonds. J. A., Great Yarmouth.—I warned my readers from the outset against these bonds, it is a pity that you did not read your Truth.

Mining Shares.

Bute.—No option but to hold both classes of shares for an improvement. C. P. W.—Yes, Porges Randfontein (A) are a good purchase at present price. I do not recommend a purchase of Chartered. Mashie.—You should hold your mines Nos. 1 to 5; they should improve. You might average Nos. 1, 3, 4, and 5. Umtoli.—I quite agree that it is a very hard case for the Umtoli Gold Reef shareholders, but can do no more than advise them to resist the unwarranted proceedings of the Directors. Anxious Inquirer, Wolverhampton.—It is quite correct that Messrs. Barnato have guaranteed the new issue of shares of the Johannesburg Consolidated Investment at £3. 15s. each, but this does not mean that Messrs. Barnato will buy up the old shares at this price. But with some patience you will no doubt see them reach this figure. A. F., Glasgow.—Both these mining shares should be held. J. M., co. Galway.—West Australian Exploring and Finance Deferred shares stand at about 6, and are very promising. Croydon Consols are likely to further improve, and I do not think there is any fear of a call; I prefer these to the others. You will find what you want in my letter, but I do not approve of all the low-priced shares; some of these are certainly not cheap. J. M. H., Cork.—I have always warned my readers against St. Augustine, and if you had read Truth regularly you would not now be a holder. G. M. H.—These shares are rigged at present, and I do not advise the investment. J. J. H. C.—Same reply regarding Umtoli shares as to "Umtoli" above. X. Y. Z.—These shares have given way in sympathy with other West Australians, and should be held for a recovery. L. C.—It is advisable to join the reconstruction, or else your shares would be forfeited. There is plenty of chance for this Company. G. M., Leith.—I cannot really trouble myself about the opinion of a correspondent of a Scotch paper. My view is that it is advisable to hold Buffelsdoorn. I cannot reply by letter. V. D.—I do not like the Mountain Copper Mining Company, and the public subscription has been very small. Cymro.—1. I should think there is every prospect of a recovery, and you might average. 2. No option but to hold A, B, and C for a recovery. Salpinger.—There is every prospect of Lake View Consols touching that price again. I do not like St. John del Rey. Montpelier.—I have always warned my readers against Sam's Wealth of Nations, and you really cannot expect me to advise you, as you have acted directly against my advice. Knock.—1. Barnato Bank shares have been converted into Johannesburg Consolidated Investment shares, and the latter should be held for an advance. 2. No reason to sell now. Price.—1. Yes, Croydon Consols should be held for a rise. Take a good profit on the others. 2. Instead of buying Nos. 3 to 6 you should make your selection from the shares mentioned in my letter. Dark.—1. This is not the time to sell; you should hold. 2. Yes. 3. No recent news. H. M.—I advise you to await developments before buying more; the matter is now being sifted. Bert.—The position of the West Australian mines mentioned by you is such that you should hold for an advance; the decline is due to the general depression in this market. Lemington.—Amongst the shares Nos. 1 to 5 mentioned by you, I should think that Nos. 1, 2, and 5 are the most promising. I do not like the Mountain Copper Company, the shares in which already stand at a discount. Neither do I like the Brewery shares. Yule Tide.—1. It is probable that these shares will recover again. 2. Yes. 3. I know nothing of this concern. 4. Yes, Croydon Consols are good for a further rise. 5. Yes. W. D., Chillington.—You seem to ignore entirely the severe depression which has occurred in the Mining market. There is nothing in the report in question to indicate that it is a swindle.

Industrial Shares.

Hercules, Yorks.—1. Some negotiations have apparently been going on between Mr. Hooley and the English Incandescent Gas Light Company, but they appear to have come to nothing for the present. 2. No. 3. No. 4. Far too speculative. Florence.—In view of the uncertainty as to what will happen about the Concession it might be advisable to sell half. R. T.—It is quite correct that the Bagot Tyre Company's shares have received a Stock Exchange settlement for January 6. The premium now stands at 2⅜, but I cannot tell you exactly what will happen. Littleford.—All I can tell you is that I do not like Daimler Motor or Great Horseless Carriage shares, and have always warned my readers against them. Wentworth.—Yes, Financial Times shares are very promising. They stand at 3, and yield, on the basis of the last accounts, a return of upwards of 8 per cent. per annum. Ayrshire.—Very speculative. R. W., Yeovil.—Publishing Companies of this kind are very speculative, and I do not recommend the investment. A. B., Edinburgh.—A very speculative stock, and I do not care much for the investment.

Mixed Investments.

Rupee.—I am sorry to say that I cannot see my way to publishing a table giving current prices of shares. I must leave this to my financial contemporaries. S. F., Mysore.—I should advise you to hold your stocks Nos. 1 to 3 for an improvement. The West Australian Finance Company mentioned is likely to improve. 1. Stuart.—The Pittsburg, Cleveland, and Toledo, (guaranteed by the Baltimore and Ohio) Forty-year Gold bonds are redeemable in 1922. I do not know what may be done in the reconstruction. 2. A good investment. 3. Hold. Boz.—1. A fair industrial investment, but no catch. 2. Hold Buffelsdoorn Consols, which should recover with the rest of the market. Gozo.—No option but to hold all your Mining shares Nos. 1 to 10, they are well selected and likely to improve. A. M. B.—The bonds are good. Amongst the other shares, there is no reason for selling the three mentioned by you. K. B. A.—A fair investment (1). On the other hand, I do not like Nos. 2 or 3. G. R. J.—Hold all your shares Nos. 1 to 8 for a rise; most of the Companies are doing well. Mansfield.—1. A fair investment. 2. No catch. 3. Nothing against this investment. C. E. M.—1. West Australian Goldfields will no doubt pay a dividend in the course of the new year. 2. Impossible to tell. 3. No. Belvedere.—It is a great pity that you should have gone in for British Motor Syndicate and Electrical Cab shares. I have an unfavourable opinion of these. 2. A fair investment. 3. You can easily find what you want in my letter. 4. See remarks under "Golden West Australia." J. R.—Yes. Old Ebor.—The shares Nos. 1 to 7 are promising. The Company No. 1 is now doing remarkably well. No option but to keep the others. M. B.—I have a favourable opinion of Bovril Prefs. (1). I do not think much of Nos. 2 and 3. Yes, No. 4 is still a promising purchase. Gold.—1. I advise holding Northern Territories Goldfields. 2. Yes. 3. Swift Cycles are in my opinion preferable to those mentioned by you. J. W. G., Hull.—I do not like No. 1 at all, 2 is a very speculative bank share, and Nos. 3 and 5 are also too speculative. Sportsman.—No option but to hold your shares Nos. 1 to 10 for an improvement; do not be frightened out of your holdings by such advisers. Coras.—I do not think there is a big "Bear" account, but the shares are very promising. Hold your American Rails and also Waterfall Estates. Enquirer, Bury.—You should hold your American Railroad bonds for a recovery. 2. Yes, Dunlop Four per Cent. Debentures are a good investment. A. A. Z.—There is nothing to be said against your investments Nos. 1 to 8, which you may safely hold.

Various Investments.

Notwithstanding all the talk about dearer money, investors have been wise enough not to throw away their stocks, and with the turn of the year there will be comparative ease and lower rates. With an almost unclouded political horizon the door is thus opened for successful speculation, if entered into in moderation. Gilt-edged securities have weathered the short period of dearer money remarkably well, and we have Consols again at 111 for the account. Neither has there been any backsliding in Colonial Government bonds or British Corporation stocks. Silver has remained in the neighbourhood of 29⅞d., and Rupee Paper is fairly steady at 62¾. The coming Indian loan has not interfered with India stock, the Three and a Half per Cents. standing at 118, and the Three per Cents. at 109. The Industrial department has been fairly active, and prices of Cycle shares have been well supported. Dunlop Pneumatic Deferred are firmer at 1⅝ x.d., the Ordinary at 1 3/16 x.d. Gladiators have had a good market at ⅜ premium, and Humber Ordinary have been steady at 1¼. New Beeston, after dropping to 2½, have recovered to 3. Swifts are firm at ⅛ premium. In Bagots some business has been transacted down to 2⅜ premium. The Motor brigade is generally on the down grade. British Motor Cars, which were offered a few weeks ago by advertisement at 3, have fallen to 1⅛. Daimler Motor have declined to 7¼, and Great Horseless Carriage to 3; but these prices are still far above their real value, and I should advise my readers to give these shares a wide berth. Notwithstanding the expenditure of much energy and money, it has been impossible, so far, to get up a motor car boom, for the very good reason that the ideal motor car has not yet been discovered. New Bovril shares are steady, and both the Deferred and Preferred stand at par to a small premium. Financial Times shares have been dealt in at 2⅞ to 3. At the latter price, as I have stated, they yield upwards of 8 per cent. per annum, and the new balance-sheet, which is expected to be issued early in January, will, I hear, show very favourable figures. A new committee of inquiry has been put forward by the Board of the Nitrate Railways, but its appointment is challenged by the Shareholders' Provisional Committee, at whose request the previous Committee of Inquiry—appointed on November 9—has resigned. It is desirable that all the various interests should unite in order to obtain a complete inquiry, and to rescue the Company from its present unpleasant position. A new prophet seems to have arisen, who works under the name of Clarke, Richardson, & Co., Stock and Share Dealers, 3, Copthall Buildings, London, E.C. They are circularising country investors with invitations to join their "Special Investment Syndicate." Contrary to the habit of other syndicate touts, Clarke, Richardson, & Co., admit that out of the ninety-six "Specials" they have conducted they have had five failures, leaving ninety-one successes; while the average profit obtained on the ninety-six (inclusive of the five failures) has been about 75 per cent., or 15s. for each £1 invested. It would be interesting to meet some of the fortunate clients of Clarke, Richardson, & Co., who have obtained this splendid profit of 75 per cent., in the flesh. An ingenious person is Mr. J. Herbert Wilkinson, of La Maisonette, Le Hocq, Jersey; and 61 and 62, Chancery-Lane, London, E.C.; who issues a pamphlet in which he offers to convert merchants, manufacturers, traders, and others into private or public Limited Liability Companies at an inclusive fee; and in order to gather such firms into his net, he sends the pamphlet to Congregational and other ministers with a typewritten letter headed "Village Churches—Increase of Ministerial Stipend," in which he suggests to them that as they are bound to know several tradesmen or manufacturers whom they could direct into this channel, he will give them one half of the profit he makes out of the business as and when he receives the same. I should hope that clergymen, as a rule, are too high-minded to become partners with Mr. Wilkinson in his promoting schemes. It may interest my readers to learn that the firm of City solicitors, whose name I have given at various times to readers of Truth who have been badly treated by outside brokers, have succeeded during the past year in recovering numerous and, in many cases, substantial sums from this fraternity, and amongst others they have recovered from one of the most unscrupulous of these gentry a considerable amount on behalf of a lady and her daughter, whom the outside broker in question had attempted to victimise. And now, my dear Ben, let me again wish you health and prosperity for the New Year, and may the balance at your bankers and the investments in your strong-box multiply during 1897.—Your affectionate uncle, MOSES.

QUEER STORY.

A NEW YEAR'S EVE.

"OLD year's weeping himself out with a vengeance. Never saw heavier rain, to last. About a record—eh, Mr. Noad?"

So said the Rector, as he shook the streaming water from his hat and coat in the cottage doorway; then entering, seated himself on one side of the fire, in the Windsor chair which the goodman's granddaughter, a girl with a face like a polished apple, had placed for him.

The goodman himself was very old; so crippled and bent with rheumatism that he was unable, except by long and painful effort, to rise from his chair. He lifted his gnarled old hand to his forehead by way of a respectful welcome. And, indeed, no prince of the land could have surpassed the perfect courtesy of that salute.

"A record for a rainfall—eh, Mr. Noad?" repeated the Rector, cheerily, extending his chilled hands to the cosy fire.

The goodman uttered a sort of low chuckle, full of pitying, though well-mannered, amusement.

"Will, will!" he said. "But then you can't hreckon back ser fur as I can, zurr."

"And you can remember rain to beat this, Mr. Noad?"

"That I can, zurr. I der mind the winter zeazon of vifty-vive and vifty-six, when I wur down to Mrs. Blain's, where Varmer Green do live now; and it hrained worse nor this, nigh ivery day for six wiks; and the water in many parts wur right over the tops of the hidges. Aye, zurr, that wur summat like hrain—that wur."

The Rector smiled and nodded. He had often heard of "vifty-vive and vifty-six" before. Those two dates had apparently crystallised in the goodman's brain. Did you happen to allude in his presence to any exceptional season—exceptional frost, snow, heat, drought, wet, or what not—out "vifty-vive and vifty-six." invariably came. The goodman was very old. His memory now was often dim and hazy. And whether "vifty-vive and vifty-six" had really been such phenomenal years, or whether he was vaguely identifying all the unusual seasons of his former life with a date which some striking occurrence had indelibly impressed upon him, was fair matter of debate. He would, however, have been a rash man who should have treated it as debateable in the goodman's presence.

The old fellow soon ceased his chuckling. A shadow seemed to settle on his wrinkled brow. He looked across at his visitor sadly, and rather wistfully. The Rector was new to the place; new, at least, as they reckon newness in that slowly-changing country village, where almost every family, from the Squire's downwards, seems to be coeval with the land on which it lives. He had only held the living for a matter of four years. But he had a kind face—a face inviting to sufferers and sorrowful—and the goodman had a burden of many, many weary years, whereof he yearned to unbosom himself. He had often been on the point of doing so before, but had not quite nerved himself to the effort. To-night, however, his yearning was to have its way.

"Polly, child—beän't it time ye wur off to help Jesse wiv the milking?" he said, turning to the young girl with the polished face.

"Yes, grandfeyther; I'll go this minute."

And, taking up an old covering of sacking and a felt milking hat, she stepped outside into the splashing rain.

"You'd never get on at all without Polly. She's your right hand—eh?" said the Rector.

"Aye, that she is. A good little myde—a good little myde. I der wish Jess wur ser good a lad."

"I thought Jess had become quite steady," remarked the Rector, always anxious to say a good word for everybody.

"Will, zurr, I doän't zay az how he be azackly onsteady. He doän't drink or hrin after the wenches. But he's a thriftless, mooning, caddling piece of it, zurr. He woän't niver do much good."

"Oh, come, I hope you are mistaken. When he grows older, he will become wiser. Boys will be boys; we were boys once, eh, Mr. Noad?"

The goodman did not answer. He was looking into the fire. The shadow had settled down more heavily upon his face. Still looking at the fire, he said, at length:

"Der you think there's such a thing as being onder a curse from God, zurr?"

"No, no, Mr. Noad; surely not. The only curses that afflict men come from themselves—from their own sins and evil passions."

"Aye! aye! Vrom their own zins and evil passions," repeated the goodman, in a dreamy voice. Then he added, after a silence broken only by the ticking of the tall clock in the corner, "You niver know'd what it wur to have a darter go wrong, zurr?"

"Thank God I never did, Mr. Noad."

"Ah, will! I have knowed it, zurr—I have knowed it."

"My poor old friend!" said the Rector, sympathetically.

"Aye, zurr. My own darter brought shame on us; and Jess wur the child of her zin."

"He is the more to be pitied, my friend. You should treat him with especial tenderness—with especial tenderness, Mr. Noad."

"I've niver been hard on him, zurr. Mebbe less hard than I oughter to hev bin. But I wur hard on his poor mither—I wur crule hard on my girl."

"Is she still living?" asked the Rector.

"Nay, zurr, nay. She died soon arter Jess wur born. She wur drowned in the floods."

The goodman spoke in a very low voice, sinking at the end almost to a whisper. Then he lifted his smock, pulled a great spotted handkerchief from his breeches pocket, and wiped his wrinkled face; and again restored the handkerchief to his breeches, before proceeding.

"It der all come back to me this evening, zurr; fur 'twas this viry night—the night of New Year Eve—that Jess's mither first returned from service. She returned onexpected; and a'most before she had spoke to me, I knowed the causes on it. It wur a night like this—worse nor this. The hrain were beating down in streams. And my girl come in pale, wiv her wit hair hanging round her face, and her clothes soaked and dripping. I think, as I der look back, that no face wur iver more piteous and wild wiv anguish. It might hev milted anybody's heart; let alone a feyther's. But it niver milted mine. I had always bin a stright man; I had always held my head up. And what I saw when I looked at her, hardened my feelings into stone. She fell upon her knees, jist theer, inside the doorway. She prayed for mercy, for kindness, for pardon. My poor girl! If I'd a' bin A'mighty God, she could niver have prayed to me more earnest. But my heart wur friz. I wur harder nor tempered steel. I took her by the arm. I ordered her to pack, and niver lit me see the face on her agen; and thin and theer I turned her out into the hrain and darkness. It wur a crule, onpitying thing. But I wur a proud man thin, zurr, as proud, I der believe, as Satan hisself. And I turned her out."

The goodman paused, never raising his eyes from the fire, and again wiped his face with the spotted handkerchief. At length, he resumed:—

"Neighbours proved kinder to her than her own flesh and blood. Some on them as found her next morning, lying by the roadside, faint and drenched wiv hrain, and a'most dead, took her in. And wivin a wik Jess wur born. They did bring me word of it. I druv them away wiv curses and hard words. I said I did niver wish to hev news or tidings of the —— agen. Aye, zurr, I did use that virry word. God forgive me, I did use that virry word.

"But not many days wur passed afore I had to heer on my child agen. She wur found drowned in the floods; and I wur fetched to 'dentify her. I shall niver forgit how she look. She wur beautiful, zurr; my little myde wur always beautiful. But in the hrist and peace of death she wur more beautiful ner ever she had bin before. She wur a smiling, zurr, wiv her lips a little parted; aye, she wur smiling virry sweetly. It wur the smile of one in trouble as hev found an onexpected friend.

"I did begin to ask myself then, zurr, what her onexpected friend must think of me. And a grit fear come over me—a fear that hev clung about me iver since. Fur I know as will as if A'mighty God Hisself had told me, that His hand is heavy upon me day and night—day and night. And zo will continue, zurr, until I die. Not that I hev been visited worse, nit so bad as many neighbours. Times hev ruled hard of late. And there's a power of small varmers, like me, as hev vailed and drifted into the House. But I hev struggled through and paid my way—paid my way. I've hed to scrape and pinch, and vight for ivery ha'porth; but I hev done it, zurr. And 'tis summat to hev lived, the dree on us, and hev kept paid up, on thirteen acre and vour cow. In that respect, as you may say, the A'mighty hev niver stricken me as he hev stricken ser many. And there's Polly—she'm a good little myde to her old grandfeyther; and Jess, if he be a mooning, caddling lad, will, he might hev took to drinking, or swearing, or worse. Aye, aye! I ain't been visited by the A'mighty in my fam'ly or business, or nowt of that. There's them as might hold I've even bin vavoured. But, zurr, I knows, all one for that, as the A'mighty's face is stiddy sit aginst me, and that I shall yit feel the heft of my Maker's hand."

"Come! come!" said the Rector, "you must not give way to those morbid feelings, my old friend. I do not doubt that God has forgiven you long ago. For you have repented sorely—have you not?—and made what amends you could by your kindness to her child?"

"Aminds, zurr? Ah! There be no making aminds to the did. Onkindness to the living may be washed and milted away during their life; but arter they are gone, that can niver be. Wur you iver in Chidder caves, zurr?"

"Yes, Mr. Noad, often."

"Aye. Then you hev seen them things they call stally tights. They's pitrified now, zurr, and virm as hrock.

Water Supply to Country Houses.—Read "Water Supply to Mansions." The Times says, "a practical pamphlet." Post free.—Merryweathers, 63, Long-acre, London, W.C., & Greenwich, S.E.

They wur all soft and squashy once, and any myde might hev flicked 'em away wiv a duster. But to-day a mason and a cold cheesil would hev summat to do wiv 'em. That's wot onkindness to the did is like—hard and fixed and pitrified."

"It is good for us to be humble and not to forget our past sins," said the Rector. "But it is not wise or right, my friend, always to be brooding over them. Remember, God is merciful. You say yourself that He has prospered you in your business; that——"

"Prospered?" interrupted the old farmer. "Well, yis; I suppose I must call it 'prospered.' Vorty year—vorty long year—hev I spent on this zame little varm, and each of those vorty year hev bin a year of anxious struggle and oncertainty; grinding wik by wik to scrape the hrint: always put to it for vood and clothes and vuel; sildom a month gone by but wot we wur druv up to our last ha'penny; and scarcely daring to look the vuture in the vace. Not that I'm grumbling. To hev struggled on at all is more than I've deserved from the A'mighty. But it hev bin a weary, weary life, zurr, and I hreckon He hev meant it to be zo. And I hreckon, too, that He hev hild His hand up and delayed to smite me becos He knows that a punishment iver, iver hanging over is zurely the hiviest punishment of all to bear."

Before leaving him that evening, the Rector used every effort to console and cheer the old farmer, without, however, producing much effect; for the old fellow was evidently in a morbid, nervous condition, in which reason and encouragement were alike wasted upon him. But the Rector decided to see him again in a few days, when his state of mind might be more amenable to that comfort which it was his delight, as it was his privilege, to convey to the poor and afflicted. The Rector was good and kind and simple. He was also hopelessly behind the times. He not only preached the literal precepts of the Gospel; he actually believed in them.

Early next day, while the Rector was engaged upon his morning toilet, he received a message that the parish doctor had called and wished to speak with him upon an urgent matter. Having finished his dressing with all possible despatch, the Rector hurried downstairs to the front door, where the Doctor was awaiting him in his gig—looking half-drowned in the still drenching downpour.

"Good morning, Rector. I am sorry to bring you bad news of one of your parishioners. Old Farmer Noad is dying. He wishes to see you at once. I have come on straight here from him, and have promised to take you back in my trap. There is no time to lose."

"Farmer Noad? Dying? But I will waste no time—you shall tell me as we go," exclaimed the Rector, rushing back into the hall for a hat and macintosh.

"You've not heard about the fire—eh?" said the medico, as our Rector settled himself beside him in the gig.

"Fire? No? Do you mean to say that old Noad has been—been burnt?"

"Yes, poor fellow! A shocking thing! If he had not been so crippled, he might have escaped with little injury; but as it is, he has been frightfully burned, and is now fast collapsing under the shock."

"How did the fire break out? When was it?" cried the Rector.

"It seems that one of the ricks caught first, and that the flames spread from that to the house. Little Polly was awakened by the heat and smoke about five this morning. But by that time the house was well ablaze. The old man's bedroom was in the thickest of the flames. Both the girl and her cousin Jess have been badly burned in rescuing their grandfather. But they are young and strong, and will both recover. The old fellow cannot last more than a few hours."

"I am indeed grieved to hear it. I should have thought no fire could have lived in this soaking downpour," said the Rector, shaking streams of water from the brim of his wideawake.

"No! A most extraordinary thing. Quite a phenomenal stroke of bad luck. While the fire was raging—so they tell me—the weather happened to hold up. But as soon as the engine had got it under, down came the rain again in torrents. Never did weather, even in this miserable climate, behave with purer cussedness."

"And do they know how the fire originated?"

"Yes, with tolerable certainty. It appears that the boy Jess and some of his pals were smoking out in the cowshed last evening. No doubt some of their sparks lodged in the hay. Careless young mooncalf! He deserves to be—however, I mustn't say too much, for the lad has had a sharp lesson—a lesson of which he will carry the traces to his grave."

The Rector was silent. A strange expression had come over his face—an expression of mingled excitement and awe. He did not speak another word for the rest of the drive.

When they reached the neighbour's cottage to which Noad had been removed, the Rector dismounted from the gig and knocked at the door. He was at once ushered into the room where the old farmer lay.

His face had not been burnt. But his poor arms and legs were swathed in cotton-wool; and he lay on the bed moaning softly, with eyes closed, as often a troubled child moans to himself in his sleep.

At the sound of the Rector's voice, the eyelids were raised, and the old man slightly turned his head.

"Ah! you be come, zurr," he murmured. "And hev you heerd all about 'un?"

"Yes! yes, my old friend. And truly grieved I am to find you in this case."

"Will thur! It wur hanging over me, and it hed to fall. Aye; thur be no misdoubting what this hev bin. It warn't by no accident that yest'rnight wur th' anniversy, zurr, and that Jess—her Jess—did cause the fire. Nay, and it warn't no chance that the hrain did stop jist while the flames wur gaining strength. You der mind what I told you last evening, zurr, and you can clearly zee the heft of the A'mighty's hand in this.

"But," continued the old fellow, after a short pause, speaking very dreamily. "Although I be in mortal pain and at the point to die, it doän't sim ser bad now, as it did while it wur henging over. You der mind what I said to you, zurr, about them stally-tights in Chiddar caves? Will, now, I can plainly see them milting, eh! like icycles in a March sun. I wur always tirrified before to think of dying and of meeting my myde. But I beänt tirrified to-day. I der even yearn ter meet her. Fur I der know that wot wur pitrified beän't pitrified no more, and that I'll find ne'er a stally-tight agin me in the kingdom above!"

ART NOTES.

VERY welcome, indeed, is the re-appearance of Mr. F. Cayley Robinson in Suffolk-street. Such interest of a special kind as the hundred and sixth exhibition of the Royal Society of British Artists possesses is due well nigh entirely to the inclusion in it of one of his pictures. One may not agree always with what Mr. Cayley Robinson does; one may question his method and criticise its results, but it is impossible not to be attracted by his work; and for my own part I confess to having spent more time in front of his picture than before the acre of painted canvas, more or less, by which it is surrounded. "The Foundling," as his picture is called, is none the less a disappointing work. One had hoped that Mr. Robinson after his long absence from the walls of a picture exhibition would have returned all the stronger, in an artistic sense, for his retirement, and with his style crystallised, so to speak, into individuality. But, as a matter of fact, "The Foundling" shows that he is still feeling his way along the artistic path he travels. He does not yet appear able to walk boldly and erectly. His picture is full of reminiscences. As one looks at it one thinks of Millais in his early days; of Dante Gabriel Rossetti; of Fred Walker; even of Ford Madox Brown. The woman making the bed, for instance, is pure Millais. Now, this, of course, is a great pity. One would like, when looking at Mr. Cayley Robinson's pictures, to be reminded only of Mr. Cayley Robinson. Moreover, like many other of the younger and more clever artists of the day, Mr. Robinson is perverse. Especially is this seen in the figure of "The Foundling." To say that this young girl has an impossibly large head would be speaking too strongly, perhaps; but it is certainly an unnaturally large one, which means, need I add, that it is an unlovely and ill-proportioned one also. The feet, too, are unnecessarily large, to put it mildly, and are painted with the soles turned up in such a way as to make them seem almost repulsively ugly. The artist on his side may contend that his model actually had an abnormally large head, and that her feet painted from the point of view he chose for them, looked precisely as they do in the picture. To which the obvious rejoinder is that the artist was under no obligation to select a hydrocephalic model nor to paint the soles of her feet. In the old Bulwer Lytton days it used to be said that "Truth was beauty, beauty truth"; now, there is too determined an effort made to persuade us that art and ugliness are one. I must protest, too, most strongly against Mr. Cayley Robinson's cat as a wholly impossible quadruped. It is almost as far removed from nature as the conventional dragons which form the andirons in his picture. It says much, indeed, for the artist's skill that he is able to deeply interest the spectator in his "Foundling," in spite of the numerous faults that picture contains.

Mr. Rupert Bunny's contributions are also interesting, but they in no way advance his reputation. The mermaids, in his small picture near the door, are of an unpleasant and unnatural colour, a morbid, corpse-like sort of green, in no way suggestive of the inhabitants of Neptune's realm. His "Eos" (No. 103) would be more satisfactory if one could understand why it is that the boatman in the punt at the back of the picture is apparently about to "heave 'arf a brick" or a chunk of ballast, possibly, at the young lady who is tripping along the sands in diaphanous garments. If there is any allegorical or symbolical meaning in the incident, I for one am quite at a loss to understand it. The landscape painters, as is generally the case at the Suffolk street Gallery, attain to a much higher level of excellence than the figure painters and the painters of genre. Mr. Arnold Helcké, Mr. Tom Robertson, Mr. Terrick Williams, and Mr. Frank Spenlove-Spenlove, all do well. Mr. R. Machell is as allegorical and unintelligible as usual; and there are some odd attempts at the impressionistic method by Mr. O. Eckhardt, Mr. W. T. Warrener, and others.

The verses which Mr. Wyke Bayliss has composed and printed in memory of Lord Leighton and Sir J. E. Millais, at the beginning of the catalogue, are doubtless well meant; but I am not sure that the precedent set by their author is one to be followed. However, it is not necessary to criticise the lines here. Let it suffice to say that Mr. Wyke Bayliss apparently composes sonnets as well as he paints the interiors of cathedrals. Those well acquainted with his painting of the latter will thus be able to judge to what extent he succeeds as a poet.

Cascarine Leprince —The housewife's ideal laxative. A pure vegetable product, free from irritating effects, which not only relieves, but permanently cures, obstinate and chronic constipation. Its action is mild, painless, and certain, and its tonic properties insure a regular habit of the body. It is invaluable in chronic congestion of the liver, dyspepsia and indigestion, biliousness and sick headache, owing to its tonic influence on the digestive apparatus. The mildness of its action and its absolute freedom from irritating or disagreeable after-effects render it peculiarly suitable for women during nursing. It has secured on the Continent an ever-increasing popularity. Sample gratis on application to Francis Newbery & Sons, 1 and 3, King Edward-st., Newgate-st., London, E.C.

MUSIC.

AMERICAN DEGREES AND MUSICAL MILLINERY.

THREE weeks ago I referred to the fact that the English Church Union had terminated the sub-tenancy of their premises in Wellington-street, till then held by an affair called the "Church Choir Guild"—now re-named the "Guild of Church Missions." I mentioned that this step was taken owing to an advertisement that the Guild in question was "affiliated" to an enterprise in Leavenworth, Kansas, U.S.A., which pretended to grant musical degrees and diplomas in absentiâ at, as will be seen below, a sliding-scale of from three to thirty guineas. The whole matter has since been before the Council of the Union of Graduates in Music, a body which has at its head such men as Professor Bridge, Sir John Stainer, Professor Stanford, Dr. Hiles, Professor Prout, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Martin, and Sir Arthur Sullivan. The Union have, I am officially informed, also communicated with the authorities of Kansas University, a quite proper institution of thirty years' standing, and vouched for by Yale and Harvard. The Chancellor of the real Kansas University, in writing to the hon. secretary of the Union of Graduates in Music, speaks in very indignant terms in regard to this so-called "College of Church Musicians, Leavenworth, Kansas," which, it is stated, is a brass-plate affair held at the private residence of the travelling agent of the Leavenworth Bridge Company. Mr. T. L. Southgate, hon. secretary of the British Union of Graduates in Music, thereupon writes me as follows:—

In consequence of erroneous statements which have appeared with regard to the action of the English Church Union in not permitting their premises to be used any longer by the Church Choir Guild, I am instructed to supply the following information for publication.

Complaints were made to the Union of Graduates in Music that the Church Choir Guild was advertised to be "Affiliated" to a College of Church Musicians in connection with a University chartered by the State of Kansas, and that the officers of the Guild were engaged in the distribution of American titles. In connection with this scheme, circulars were sent out from 35, Wellington-street, Strand, the offices of the E.C.U. and of the Guild, respecting the diplomas and degrees issued by the American institution. On investigation it was found that these were offered to members of the Guild, and to "Persons of Distinction in the Musical World," for fees varying from three guineas for a diploma, to thirty guineas for the title of Doctor of Music, and charges were set out for hoods, gowns, and caps. In a letter signed J. H. Lewis, "Provost" of the College, it was stated that no examinations for degrees has been held in England, but that some Life Fellows of his Guild had been recommended to the Vice-Chancellor for distinctions.

On inquiry, we were officially informed by the Chancellor of the Kansas University that there was no College of Church Musicians in connection with the University, and also that no such institution had ever been open for the reception of students in any city of the State of Kansas.

In the opinion of the Council of the Union of Graduates in Music, the systematic issue in this country of foreign in absentiâ degrees is an illegitimate traffic, calculated to degrade University Degrees and to deceive the public; and further, it exposes those who have earned true University degrees to an unfair competition. Accordingly, a memorial was addressed to Lord Halifax, the Chairman of the E.C.U., and the Council nominated from their members a Special Committee to inquire into the matter. Representatives from the Union of Graduates in Music appeared before this Committee, representatives of the Church Choir Guild also being present. Sets of the circulars issued were shown, and other evidence was presented of the practice complained of, and of the business which had been done.

On their Report, the Council of the E.C.U. terminated the tenancy of the Church Choir Guild, and required them at once to quit the premises of the Union.

This official letter opens up the whole question of in absentiâ degrees and diplomas supposed to be granted abroad by non-recognised bodies, and in this country by speculative or other institutions which do not possess a Royal Charter. The assertion that "Members of the Guild of Church Musicians" have been offered Kansas in absentiâ diplomas for the ridiculously low figure of three guineas, and the admitted fact that no examinations for such degrees have been held in England at all, tell their own tale. Thirty guineas for a more or less valuable Kansas College (not University) Degree of Doctor of Music may be another matter; although, as I learn from the Calendar of the "Guild of Church Musicians" now before me, the possession of this valuable decoration includes the right to wear a hood of "Dark blue silk lined with golden silk." For thirty guineas the linings of "golden" silk may of course have a special meaning. Still, even for the three guineas there is a fair quality of musical millinery, those who pay this sum being authorised to wear a hood of "Black silk lined with light blue and trimmed with one inch white fur." As, however, a man can sufficiently make a fool of himself for three guineas; I really do not see, unless he be a South African millionaire and therefore careless of the dross, why he should spring thirty guineas to sport a valueless Mus. Doc. without examination.

In the "Calendar" aforesaid there are some exquisitely comical particulars in regard to musical millinery generally. The "Guild of Church Musicians" itself provides this sort of thing in great variety. There is a "Badge" boasting on the reverse side a "beautiful sketch of three surpliced choristers, with an organ in the background," which can be had at various prices from £6 in 18-carat gold, to 9s. a dozen in white metal. It is true there does not seem to be any extravagant demand for these badges, and, at any rate, by the balance-sheet, it would appear that the soul of nobody last year yearned after even one in 18-carat gold. The total receipts in this branch, indeed (including the sale of Calendars), amounted only to £4. 16s., so that the run, if there were one at all, must have been on the pewter. In the Calendar now before me (which was, by the way, supplied to a shorthand clerk for the modest sum of 1s.) was enclosed a letter signed "J. H. Lewis, Warden," and suggesting that the applicant should contribute a further half-guinea, or, as Mr. Lewis wrote:—"May I have the pleasure of proposing you a member of the Guild." There was a blank form of membership at 10s. 6d. a year, to which J. H. Lewis, Warden, had obligingly signed his name as "Proposer." There was also a blank order form in the Calendar to be signed by the Warden as follows:—

—— is hereby authorised to obtain from the Guild (at his own expense) the distinctive Hood, Cap, and Gown ordered to be worn by the Fellows.—WARDEN.

"At his own expense" is a delicious touch. Still the member should not grudge the trifling outlay for a really beautiful piece of millinery, which is officially described as "Crimson corded silk, edged with white fur, lined throughout with gold shot silk." J. H. Lewis, Warden, apparently did not care to inquire whether the gentleman who wrote for a shilling Calendar was or was not qualified for membership of a Musical Guild. As a matter of fact, the applicant was a shorthand writer wholly innocent of music, and totally unable to discriminate between Great A and a Bull's Foot. In a blood-red slip enclosed, "J. H. Lewis, Mus. Doc., D.C.L.," likewise obligingly offered to give "Lessons by post. Terms, in advance, £1. 11s. 6d. per quarter, from Silvermead, Twickenham, S.W." The shilling Calendar was, perhaps, a sufficient "lesson by post" to the shorthand gentleman in question, even if by a wholly unpardonable slip of his typewriter "Silvermead" did not come out as "Silver-need."

The "Warden and Licensed Lay Chaplain," the "Honorary Organising Secretary," the "Chairman of Conference," the "Chairman of the Board of Examiners," the "Chairman of the Executive Committee," and the "head of the London Diocesan Council" of this "Guild of Church Musicians" seems to be a sort of musical Pooh Bah, for all these offices are identified with "J. H Lewis, Mus.D., D.C.L., F.V.C.M," who, by the "Constitution," is Warden for life. Mr. Lewis, however, certainly holds no such degree as Doctor of Music or D.C.L. in any University in the United Kingdom. His fellow members of the "Diocesan Council," "F. J. Karn, Mus.D., F.V.C.M.," and "Churchill Sibley, Mus.D.," are in a similar predicament. The capital letters, indeed, with which their names are so bountifully ornamented, refer chiefly to American or Colonial enterprises, whose degrees are not recognised by English Universities. As to the mystic letters "F.V.C.M.," these simply refer to a limited liability company, entitled the "Victoria College Corporation, Limited," otherwise the "Victoria College of Music," of which "J. H. Lewis, Mus.D., D.C.L.," in the advertisement in the Calendar, is described as "Musical Director." The Victoria College of Music also has its millinery, and the proud holders of the letters F.V.C.M. are, it appears, entitled (so far, at any rate, as a limited liability company can give such a title) to wear a hood of "Royal blue corded silk lined with brocaded white satin, neck band edged with red silk." Then there is the "University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee," with which Mr. Lewis is, or was, connected, and where the Mus. B. sports a hood of "Black silk lined with white and trimmed with blue," while the Mus. Doc. is resplendent in "Scarlet cloth lined with Virgin Mary blue silk, edged with a small white silk cord." Then there are the "Musical International College," which is another private speculation, of which Mr. Lewis is "Vice-Principal," where the hood is of "Purple silk (or poplin) lined with white silk, and edged (an inch) with the same material;" the College of Church Musicians, London, another Lewis enterprise, whose members sport "Dark slate silk lined with light-blue silk, and edged as Oxford M.A." ("Hood, price £2. 2s., the gown price £2. 2s., the cap 7s. 6d., can only," says the advertisement, "be obtained at the College," which seems a glorified draper's shop); and the limited liability company known as the "London College of Music," where the licentiates wear "Black silk lined with light-blue silk." Trinity College, Toronto, whose in absentiâ degrees raised such sturdy protests a few years ago, sports "Scarlet cloth lined with violet silk," an extremely modest apparel compared with the violent colours of some of its more pretentious competitors.

On the other hand, the University of Toronto, which is the real and legitimate university of the province, has no costume for its doctors of music, and, indeed, I believe it grants no such degree. The better class American Universities, also, have no distinctive habit for their doctors of music, even if they grant the degree at all, and in this honourable non-costume list are our own Royal College of Music, Yale University, the University of New York, the University of Chicago, the University of Boston, besides Colonial colleges, such as the University of Sydney, the University of Adelaide, the University of New Zealand, the University of Tasmania, and the University of Ottawa.

Although sensible men will laugh at this ridiculous assumption of millinery by musicians or shorthand clerks; it is nevertheless pretty obvious that there is a demand for such feminine distinctions, for otherwise the organisers of private speculations would not take the trouble of supplying it. In cathedrals, where surplices and gowns are worn, the organist who happens to boast a bonâ-fide University or Canterbury degree is, of course, by law and custom fully entitled to sport a costume which might more justifiably be worn by his wife. On these vanities a good deal is frequently spent, and it is said that the gown and hood worn by Professor Bridge on State occasions at Westminster Abbey, and subscribed for by a number of admirers, cost more than one of Madame Patti's dresses. This, however, is a distinctive hood and gown worn by a musician who has honourably passed his examination at the University of Oxford. For others who obtain the so-called in absentiâ degrees, and with little or no other test than the payment of three guineas, or, for the matter of that, thirty guineas, the assumption of gowns and hoods in various colours is vastly absurd. A fool's cap is quite as legally bestowed, and it would perhaps possess an even more pregnant meaning.

After all there was a modest sort of operatic performance by the Guildhall School students before they broke up for the holidays. Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger," written for a family gathering at his own house on his parents' silver wedding, was intended to be played by amateurs and, therefore, should not have been above the means of students. Except as to the prima donna, who was much out of tune, most of them sang well, although, from an acting point of view, the show was a wretchedly poor one, and here the reform which every one expects from so sensible a man as Mr. Cummings will probably come in. The chief exception was Mr. Thesiger, who, in Mendelssohn's operetta, played the part of the old man who in the trio has to sing only one note, F—a note which Mendelssohn's unmusical brother-in-law, Hensel the painter, forgot at the original performance in 1829. Afterwards Mr. Thesiger, a member of the legal family of Chelmsford, played the rôle of the Learned Judge in "Trial by Jury" remarkably well. In "Son and Stranger" the best vocalist was Miss Edith Clegg, who sang the contralto part of the mother.

The only concerts of the week have been those given at Christmas, mostly at Queen's Hall. Mr. Robert Newman must have been a little disappointed at the attendance, but then on Christmas Day a concert audience is more or less a doubtful quantity. On Boxing night there was the largest attendance yet known at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, and big houses were likewise drawn on Sunday afternoon (when Beethoven's symphony in D was given, and Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in D minor was well played by Mr. Ferdinand Weist Hill), and on Sunday evening for Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

In regard to the recent concert by Mr. Bantock and his brother musicians of Tooley-street, that gentleman has been considerably chaffed for referring contemptuously to the "commercial" spirit, whereas he fixed the price of his stalls at half a guinea. The assertion has thereupon been made that Mr. Bantock was helpless, and that the proprietors of concert rooms, backed by concert agents, regulate the prices of reserved seats, and insist upon high charges. So far as Queen's Hall is concerned, this statement is false, and is, indeed, supremely ridiculous. Mr. Newman himself frequently gives concerts with threepenny or sixpenny seats. It is, however, I believe, a fact that at certain unlicensed concert rooms where the place is offered gratis to the young concert giver, the ridiculous half-guinea stalls are insisted upon. And it does not really matter, for at unlicensed concert rooms nearly all the audience as a rule are deadheads.

The case of Vallon versus Lansdowne Cottell, which should have been heard this month, was postponed until Tuesday, January 19. Mr. Cottell, who was present at the December hearing, I believe proposes to submit himself as a witness, and I sincerely hope, for his own sake, that he will. Meanwhile his advertisements of "free scholarships" are still appearing in the daily papers, but those who, after the truth has been so plainly stated, are taken in by such humbug almost deserve to lose their money.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Christmas was much mitigated to me this year by the lovely table decorations that helped to make harmonious the inevitable family dinner. This dreaded repast took place at the Pater's and Amy's and Charlie's joint abode, and even Aunts Tabitha and Jemima relaxed from their unbending attitude to the world in general, softened by the charm of Maud's baby, now becoming fairly accustomed to the trials of teething. He only alludes to them occasionally in a mild and subdued manner, by endeavouring to get his whole fat hand inside his mouth, apparently in the effort to wrestle with the unseen, malignant dolour.

Maud had prepared a charming scene for us. The dining room has pink walls with a deep dado of brownish red. Above this is a line of etchings mounted on cream-coloured paper of a rather warm tone and framed in enamelled wood of the same tint. The electric lights are arranged in a way that brings out the etchings to the best advantage.

So much for our background. Now for the table. Down the centre was a drift of rose-pink and silver-embroidered gauze, in itself a delicious bit of colour and texture. It was bordered with long trails of smilax which passed under miniature arches of holly and mistletoe. In the centre of the table rose a small ivy tree, hung on all the branches with peals of tiny silver bells which tinkled with fairy music at every movement of the guests. Trails of smilax hung from candelabra to candelabra, all down the table, tied with pink ribbon, and the candles were shaded with pink. The small vases at the corners were filled with pink roses and brown ivy, and at the plate of each diner lay a "buttonhole," consisting of a rose and an ivy spray. Pink-shaded lamps and baskets of flowers, chiefly pink tulips, palms, and ferns, tied up with pink ribbons, and wreathed with smilax round the tall handles, stood on the sideboard and on the writing-table and at other points of vantage through the room.

The soft brightness of all this was most refreshing and inspiriting, and Maud was much congratulated on the effect. I was fain to confess that the dear old room had never looked even half so pretty in the days of my vicarious rule. I am sure the beauty of it all had something to do with the surprising amiability of every body. I do not think there was a single conversational back-hander. No! Not one. And at a family party, too.

Listen to this delicious dress, dear. Black satin skirt, pink Liberty satin blouse with folded belt of almond green. Boléro of openwork jet, sleeveless, and cut away over the blouse, besides being short enough to show the puff of it above the high belt.

Here is another. Princess dress of turquoise velvet, buttoned down the left side with cut-steel buttons placed on the inner side of a band of sable. Collar of palest green-blue satin embroidered in silver and steel and edged with sable. Sleeves slashed with the pale blue and the slashes bordered with pearls.

Makes one want to ask for more, like Oliver Twist. Don't you think so?

This year saw a tremendous boom in marriages, and judging from the imminent fashionable weddings, announced to the number of 200 or so in the Court Journal, the New Year will lead off to a very similar tune. One of the smartest of those to take place is that of Captain Milner, Scots Guards, and Miss Evelyn Rowley, an Irish girl, granddaughter of the second Lord Langford. The wedding is fixed for January 19 at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. Mr. Coningsby Disraeli's marriage will be an interesting one. The bride is Miss May Silva. Lord Charles Bentinck's marriage with Miss Grenfell will bring together whole cohorts of smart folks.

I hope Ninety-seven will not be a record year of broken troth, and of consequent announcements that marriages arranged "will not take place." The present year has been rather a naughty one in that respect. I wonder if the fact of its being Leap Year can account for it in any way?

I wonder what Dame Fashion is going to do for us in Ninety-seven? She has been rather kind this year, relieving us of much irrelevant redundancy. Think of the huge afflatus of our sleeves, as worn to the very end of Ninety-five. And skirts, too. Their width is not very much lessened, it is true, but the horrid stiffening wherewith previous years have more or less afflicted us, has almost disappeared. Late in Ninety-five I found that

8s. 6d. worth of horsehair had been introduced into a gown of mine and duly charged for in the bill. Eight-and-sixpence-worth of weight and inconvenience, Amy, dear. And that burden is cast behind us. Only the Royal Family has its gowns stiffened with horsehair now, which proves that it is quite an obsolete mode. The Princess of Wales and her daughters never adopted this ridiculous fashion, but the other Royal Princesses and Duchesses appear to follow Fashion humbly from afar, as though they feared to come too near.

The huge flower that is now an indispensable feature of smart evening gowns, is quite as large as the fashionable pocket-handkerchief, which is some eight inches square. The funny part of the big blossom is that in Paris the complexion of the evening belles is made up in packets and sold with the flowers, to suit the various tints. It must seem odd to order a floral parure in tones of orange and saffron, with a parcel of the best complexion en suite.

How would you like to be a weaver? I see that it is proposed that ladies who are in need of a remunerative occupation should be trained up to weave rich silks by hand. Oddly enough, it seems that this is quicker than power loom work. I have several times seen hand-weaving carried on at silk exhibitions, and, from that experience of it, I should imagine that the chief objection would be found in the noise. It does not resemble any other sound that I ever heard, but consists of a hard, wooden, intermittent click, which would be difficult to reconcile with any other occupation carried on in the room, even thinking. But one wonders how it comes that hand-work could possibly be swifter than that of machinery. Perhaps it consists in the enormous number of bobbins used in elaborate brocades in which twenty or more colours and shades are introduced. Girls from fifteen upwards could earn from fifteen to twenty shillings a week in this silk weaving, and it appears to be the only kind of employment in which there is still a demand for workers. Do you know anybody who would like to essay it?

The Crystal Palace has Wulff's Monster Circus as an attraction for Christmas this year, the second part consisting of a gorgeous spectacle—a tournament of the olden time, illustrating the magnificence of the fêtes given by Louis XV. A great toy fair has also been arranged in the north nave, and there is a picturesque representation of the quaint old houses of Nuremberg, where the toys come from. These attractions ought to induce crowds of youngsters to perform the rather chilly journey that divides the Palace from London. Don't you wish that we could persuade English manufacturers to turn their attention to the production of toys? It seems such a pity that, with our working classes needing money so very badly, especially throughout our bleak and inconsistent winter, we cannot manage to retain some of it in our own tight little island. Mr. Humphreys, of iron-building fame, made an offer some time ago through the papers of a weekly cart-load of wood to any one who would institute a thoroughly practical technical school of toy-making for boys and girls. I believe he had not one single reply. Now, here's a good work ready to the hand of some philanthropist with leisure and just a little money. The concern would certainly be eventually a paying one, and it would only need funds to give it a good start. Every year toys are more and more unsatisfactory. All the dealers are unanimous in this opinion. If that man who causes two blades of wheat to grow where but one has grown before is the greatest philanthropist, surely he who institutes a new industry in an over-crowded little country like ours would also deserve some meed of praise.

Richard has been reading to me a long account of the condition of the sealskin trade. It appears that it is not particularly satisfactory, but I fancy that view is from the point of sellers. The curious circumstance is that there are hardly any orders this winter from American dealers. Now, American ladies are well known in London to be the purchasers of the most expensive and handsome sealskin coats. Whenever we have seen anything particularly elaborate and costly in this line we have always been told that it was an order for an American lady. Do you think that seal is being superseded in the great continent by sable? Or, what suggestion can you offer to solve the mystery? It is inconceivable that the mock electric seal could possibly be preferred by women whose sartorial instincts are so splendidly developed as those of our American cousins. Richard says that there is some idea that certain firms are "holding back" in sealskins. Does this mean a coming "corner" and, consequently, a rise in price next year? If so, we ought to take old Time by the forelock and invest at once while the fur is comparatively cheap.

Did you see that case in the papers the other day where two ladies claimed the same umbrella, both evidently in perfectly good faith, as the magistrate remarked? One had bought hers near Charing Cross for forty-five shillings in 1888, and the other had invested in an exactly similar one for forty-seven and sixpence in 1891. The silver handle resembled the head and neck of a stork. Both ladies were customers of the same grocer, and one of them left her umbrella in his shop, going on the following morning to inquire about it. Oddly enough, the other lady visited the establishment in the interval, and, seeing the umbrella, remarked that it was very strange, but it was hers. She had lost it eighteen months before. When the real owner asked for it, the lady who supposed herself to be its proprietor refused to give it up. Don't you think the best moral of this story is that one should always have a particular private mark affixed to portable property of this kind? In case of doubt the description of the distinguishing sign would at once settle any vexed question.

In the following recipe the word terrine is employed, as it is these Eastern receptacles with lids, like those for pâté de foie gras, that are used in France, but the mixture is equally good in a raised crust, like a pork pie, should no terrine be at hand. It is called terrine, or pâté de lièvre:—

Bone the hindquarters and part of the back of a hare, about a pound and a half in all when boned, and cut the pieces evenly. Have ready ½ lb. of sausage meat, or what is better, ½ lb. of fresh lean pork and ¼ lb. of bacon, mince the pork and bacon as fine as sausage meat, put in a basin and mix well with a glass of Madeira or sherry and one of Cognac and some salt and pepper. Now line the bottom of the terrine with thin slices of bacon, and over that put a layer of the chopped pork or sausage meat about an inch deep, a slice or two of ham if at hand, then a layer of pieces of hare, then a little sausage meat and hare again, till the terrine is full, taking care the top layer should be sausage meat. Put on the top some very thin bacon and two or three bay leaves. Put on the cover and fasten it well with a paste made of flour and water so that no steam escapes. About three hours in a rather slow oven is sufficient to cook it, then take it out, take off the lid and fill up with the following jelly, which should have been making while the rest was cooking. Take the bones of the hare and put in a stewpan, with shalot, thyme, bayleaf, and half water, half white French wine, boil for about half an hour, strain and clear, and either add to it a little good stock in jelly, or else a more ready way is to add two or three sheets of gelatine, previously soaked in cold water, and a good teaspoonful of Liebeg—for it is not always that good stock is at hand, so this is a good substitute. Pour this into the terrine, and put by to get cold. It is delicious for luncheons. The fore part of the hare can be used for soup, and would even make a small dish of jugged hare; in French cooking nothing is wasted or lost, all turned to account and used.

Rolled duck is an entirely new dish:—

First, having plucked and cleansed the duck, immerse it for two days in a pickle made as follows:—Put 2 lb. of salt, 4 oz. of moist sugar, a sprig of thyme, parsley, and marjoram, a bay leaf, a shallot, a clove of garlic, a teaspoonful of peppercorn, a blade of mace, two cloves, and a gallon of water into a stewpan; bring these ingredients to the boil, simmer five minutes, and allow it to get quite cold before putting in the duck. Wash and drain the bird, cut off the wings and feet, open it down the back, and, with a small sharp knife, take out all the bones, draw the wings and legs inside the body and cover the interior with a layer of forcemeat, which is made as follows:—Scrape the breast of an old hen and the flesh of a small white rabbit, in all about 1 lb.; pound it thoroughly, add 6 oz. of scraped fat bacon and 4 oz. of butter, pound again, then season with a good pinch of cayenne pepper, a teaspoonful of salt, a saltspoonful of pepper, and the yolks of four eggs. Work the whole thoroughly together and it is then ready for use. Smooth the forcemeat with a palette knife dipped in hot water, and garnish it with slices of truffle, cooked red tongue, and the yolks of two or three hard-boiled eggs, rubbed through a wire sieve; cover the garnish with the remainder of the forcemeat. Draw the back together and sew it up with a needle and strong thread. Wring a clean napkin, first through hot, then cold water, spread it with pure lard, lay the duck, breast downwards, on the cloth, tie the ends securely and sew up the side with thread. Now put the duck into a braising pan with a bouquet of herbs, spices, carrot, and onion, cover with stock and bring to the boil on the stove; then place the stewpan in the oven to simmer for two hours. When the duck is done take it from the cloth, which wrinse and again wrap it around the duck. Press slightly with a 2 lb. weight until next day. Then draw out the thread, glaze it with some good clear glaze, dish with a nice border of croûtons of aspic jelly and garnish with sprigs of parsley.

"Apple Cake" is a Glasgow dainty. It is an admirable luncheon dish:—

You will require a round tin plate, about ½ lb. of puff pastry and half a dozen good cooking apples. Put 6 oz. of loaf sugar into a stewpan with a gill of water and boil it to a thin syrup, put in the apples, which must be pared and cored, with the grated peel of half a fresh lemon, and boil until the apple is a thick mass, then leave it to cool. Divide the pastry in halves, roll one piece into a round, lay it on the plate and put the prepared apple in the centre, roll the remainder of the pastry and cover the apple, folding the edges well under the bottom piece. Dust with castor sugar and bake about three-quarters of an hour in a moderate oven. Cut the cake into eight, corner-shaped pieces, and serve on a dessert paper. The cake, when baked, should have an appetising gloss on the surface.

SECOND YEAR.

COSMOPOLIS: A Tri-Lingual and International Review.

Price 2s. 6d.

EDITED BY F. ORTMANS.

The appreciative welcome given to COSMOPOLIS in the course of its first year by the press and the educated public in all countries, has satisfied the Editor that this new Review meets a real want on the part of those who would follow closely the development of foreign politics and literature.

COSMOPOLIS offers its readers, in a practical form, the means of keeping themselves in touch with the literary, political, artistic, and scientific movements in foreign countries and of maintaining or completing their knowledge of the most widely-known European languages.

COSMOPOLIS is composed (in equal parts) of English, French, and German text. Arrangements are now being made for special supplements in which European languages other than those already represented in the Review shall find a place.

In each of the three languages, monthly chroniques or summaries by Mr. Henry Norman, M. F. de Pressensé, and "Ignotus" discuss, from the often divergent English, French, and German points of view, the principal events of current international politics. In other monthly or trimestrial articles, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. A. B. Walkley, MM. Emile Faguet, Jules Lemaitre, Herrn Anton Bettelheim and Otto Neumann-Hofer take note of important literary and dramatic productions of their own countries. In addition to these chroniques, annual or bi-annual articles by competent English, French, and German critics will review (from the outsider's standpoint) the various phases of current foreign literatures.

COSMOPOLIS publishes every month a short Story in each of the three languages, as well as unpublished Memoirs, Letters, &c.

Space does not permit the mention of more than a few of the distinguished English, American, and Continental Novelists who have contributed to COSMOPOLIS in the course of 1896: Robert Louis Stevenson, Mr. Henry James, P. Maarten-Maartens, "John Oliver Hobbes," Mr. I. Zangwill, Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Mr. George Gissing; MM. Paul Bourget, Anatole France, "Gyp," Édouard Rod; Herrn Paul Heyse, Hermann Sudermann, Mme. Von Ebner-Eschenbach.

In order to give an idea of the interest and variety of the general articles on literature, politics, art, science, and travel which have appeared in the first twelve numbers we have not space to do more than draw up the following list of some of their Authors: Mr. Oscar Browning, Professor Sidney Colvin, Mme. Darmesteter (Mary Robinson), Professor Dowden, Mr. T. H. S. Escott, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, Mr. Frederic Harrison, "Vernon Lee," Mr. D. S. MacColl, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Professor J. P. Mahaffy, Professor Max Müller, Mr. George Moore, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. George Wyndham; MM. Georges Brandès (who writes in French), J. Chailley-Bert, Arthur Chugnet, J. J. Jusserand, Gustave Larroumet, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, A. Mézières, Gustave Monod, Count Léon Tolstoi, M. E. Melchior de Vogué, Charles Yriarte, Mme. Judith Gautier, Lady Blennerhassett, Herrn Theodor Barth, Ludwig Brentano, Theodor Fontane, Herman Helferich, Max Lenz, Maurus Jokai, Theodor Mommsen, Friedrich Spielhagen, &c., &c.

For forthcoming numbers of the Review we have the pleasure to announce the following new Contributors: Mr. RUDYARD KIPLING, Mrs. HUMPHREY WARD, Mr. THOMAS HARDY, Mr. ANTHONY HOPE, MM. EM. ZOLA, FRANÇOIS COPPÉE, PIERRE LOTI, ALPHONSE DAUDET and FULDA, BJÖRNSTJERNE BJÖRNSON, &c.

ST. JAMES'S-SQUARE.—By ORDER of TRUSTEES.

One of the finest Freehold Building Sites in the West-End of London, occupying the extensive area of 11,300 square feet or thereabouts (upwards of a quarter of an acre) between Pall Mall, St. James's-street, and Piccadilly, in the very heart of clubland, near the Parks, and within easy reach of the Houses of Parliament, the principal theatres, and other places of entertainment and popular resort. The property occupies a splendid corner position, having frontages of about 59 ft. 8 in. to St. James's-square, 195 ft. to King-street, and a return frontage on the west side to Cleveland-yard; it therefore possesses exceptional advantages with regard to light and air. The site is in every way adapted for the erection of a series of handsome shops with high-class residential flats or chambers, banking or insurance premises, a large clubhouse, hotel, restaurant, an important public building, theatre, concert-hall, art gallery, or other purposes of a special character. It is seldom the opportunity occurs of acquiring a Freehold site of this magnitude in such a position, and it will be sold with possession.—MESSRS. DEBENHAM, TEWSON, FARMER, & BRIDGEWATER will SELL, at the MART, on TUESDAY, FEB. 2nd, 1897, at TWO (unless an acceptable offer be previously made by private treaty), the very valuable FREEHOLD PROPERTY (Land tax redeemed), comprising the Site of the historic mansion known as Cleveland House, No. 19, St. James's-square.—Particulars, plans, and conditions of sale may be obtained of Messrs. WYNNE, HOLME, & WYNNE, Solicitors, 10, New-court, Lincoln's-inn; and of the Auctioneers, 80, Cheapside.

TO INVALIDS.—A LIST of MEDICAL MEN, in all parts, willing to RECEIVE RESIDENT PATIENTS, giving full particulars and terms, sent Gratis. The List includes Private Asylums, &c. Schools also recommended—Address, Mr. G. B. STOCKER, 8, Lancaster-place, Strand, W.C.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed to acquire and work two blocks of 58 and 38 claims respectively, with mill site and water right, situate on the proclaimed farm Roodepoort, in the Greylingstadt district, Heidelberg, South African Republic, more particularly described in a map accompanying prospectus.

The property is about 128 acres in extent, exclusive of the water-right of about 8 acres. It is immediately adjacent to the township of Greylingstadt, and only six miles from the Greylingstadt Station on the Johannesburg-Natal Railway. Its proximity to the railway obviously affords great facilities for cheap transport.

The situation and character of the property, and the prospect of making it a dividend-paying investment will be best gathered from the following extracts from a report thereon, dated 1st June, 1896, which the Directors have specially obtained from Mr. C. WILSON MOORE, F.G.S.S.A., Consulting Mining Engineer, lately Curator, Witwatersrandt Chamber of Mines, which was drawn up by him from notes made on a personal examination of the property:—

"LOCALITY.—The farm Roodepoort, No. 165, Heidelberg District, is situated—the town of Greylingstadt being thereon—about 30 miles south-east of Heidelberg. An arc struck from Greylingstadt at a radius of 30 miles passes as nearly as possible through both the town of Heidelberg and the Nigel Company's property, the latter being about 9½ miles along the arc east north-east. The claims upon which this report is written are just immediately west of the New Heidelberg-Roodepoort property, while the larger block has, as its immediate neighbour, the 'Mynpacht,' held by Messrs. Barnato Brothers.

"In addition to the Heidelberg Roodepoort reef, which dips directly into your claims, there are a series of reefs known as the Kildare striking into the farm in the direction of your claims from the one side, while those that run through Malanskraal, Tweefontein, Rietfontein (244), Daspoort, and Rustfontein, strike into the property from the opposite, or west side. I may mention here that it is very generally thought now by Rand experts who have made a study of the correlation of the different reef series that the continuity of one unbroken series with another over a reefless patch is hardly likely to be proved, and that the different series may be as valuable as containing payable auriferous lodes as if they belonged to the Main Reef series.

"The best guide, I take it, for an opinion as to the payability of the reef series on Roodepoort (165) is the practical results obtained by the New Heidelberg-Roodepoort Gold Mining Company, the reefs of which dip into your ground. They have been proved to a depth of some 600 feet on the incline, and have proved continuous and auriferous throughout.

"In addition to the dips of the Heidelberg-Roodepoort, you possess direct continuations of the 'Daspoort-Rietfontein' series, assaying in places from 4 to 5 ounces, and those of the 'Kildare Reefs,' which are reported rich in gold, but from which I have not seen assays. The true and relative value of the numerous auriferous 'banket' beds will not, however, be ascertained until the dolerite (or diabase) overflow sheet has been penetrated and further development undertaken; but the evidence gained by the Heidelberg-Roodepoort Mine on the farm is sufficient to establish the value of the latter.

A claim in the Company's property mentioned is estimated, allowing for faults, &c., and taking a stoping width of two feet of rock, to yield, on an average, rather over 9,000 tons of ore. Assays from over 140 different points gave an average of some 14 dwts. per ton over 2 ft. 2 in. of rock in this mine.

"WATER.—Your ground has attached to it a water right on the spruit running through the claims capable, with conservation, of supplying 100 head of stamps.

"COAL.—Coal costs at present 30s. per ton, but this somewhat high figure will be reduced when mines in the vicinity, now being opened up, are in operation.

"COSTS OF WORKING.—Mr. Starr (Messrs. Barnato Bros.), Consulting Engineer, whose opinion is indisputably sound, estimates the working costs of the Heidelberg-Roodepoort at 23s. per ton, and the "REVENUE at about 6 dwts. of gold over the plates, and a recovery of 4 dwts. from the tailings. Both these estimates may be said to err on the safe side.

"CLIMATE.—The climate is perfectly healthy for Europeans and natives all the year round.

"COMMUNICATION.—A siding of the Natal main line is about 2½ miles distant from the property.

"OPINION.—The property is undoubtedly in the auriferous conglomerate series of the Witwatersrandt.

"To the West and North, and on the farm itself, payable auriferous beds have been found, and in the latter case proved in depth, and by milling. There are numerous ore bodies awaiting exploitation, and the conditions of working and costs are normal."

Earlier reports upon the property by Messrs. J. Dampier-Green, John L. M. Fraser, and R. H. Cavell, made for previous owners, are also highly favourable as the following extracts will show:—

Mr. R. H. CAVELL says:—"The position is good, being an extension of the Kildare, showing the Kildare Reef, and beyond all question a dip of the Heidelberg-Roodepoort now being developed by the Barnato Consolidated Mines."

Mr. J. DAMPIER-GREEN reports.—"The order of succession of the principal reefs (conglomerated beds) is Heidelberg-Roodepoort, the lowest discovered one of any importance. Next in ascending order is Kildare Reef No. 1, then Kildare Reef No. 2, followed by numerous other reefs and pebble beds in upward succession, which have not been worked upon to any great extent. The dip of strata taken at Heidelberg-Roodepoort Gold Mine shows it is to be in the direction of the West, proving that all the reefs dip into your claims, but they will, I think, be found only at depth. Your instructions were that I should go over and carefully examine your claims with a view to ascertaining whether the known reefs of the district were contained therein. I have no hesitation in saying that they lie in their geological order under the diabase which overlies your claims. The large and valuable water-right which you have secured is estimated as sufficient for the battery requirements of 100 head of stamps.

Mr. JOHN L. FRASER reports (the 1st October, 1895):—"The Kildare Reef outcrops on the adjoining property, and runs in an Easterly and Westerly direction through your claims. It is a strong reef dipping West. Although the ore from the reef assays up to 7 oz. of gold per ton, still I will only calculate upon 15 dwt. of gold per ton of ore throughout the reefs. Taking each claim to produce 20,000 tons of ore, and 15 dwt. of gold per ton, and calculating 70s. per oz., it would realise £52,500, and after deducting £20,000 for working, leave a profit of £32,500 for each claim."

Mr. Fraser further states: "After having developed the Kildare Reef, you should continue sinking the shaft to cut the Nigel or Heidelberg-Roodepoort Reef, and also drive North and South on its course. By this means you would open out large quantities of ore."

Mr. Fraser says in conclusion; "Taking into consideration the known richness of the banket formation, and the fact that at least two reefs run through your claims, I have no hesitation in saying you should open out one of the best mines in South Africa."

In a subsequent letter, dated September 11th, 1896, Mr. Fraser says:—

"Since writing my report upon the above Gold Claims on the 1st October, 1895, a very large amount of prospecting and development has taken place on the adjoining Claims and Farms, further proving the highly auriferous nature of the Reefs running into your claims.

"Besides the Heidelberg-Roodepoort and Kildare Reefs No. 1, there has been proved the Daspoort and Reitfontein series of Reefs running directly into your claims, which in places assayed 4 to 5 oz. gold per ton, and the Kildare Reef No. 2 has been discovered, assaying 16 dwt. gold per ton.

"It is, therefore, sufficiently proved that your claims are situate in the heart of the Gold District of Heidelberg, and almost surrounded with the outcrops of rich Gold Reefs; consequently, if efficiently developed, will be very profitable."

The members of the Board are all connected with important commercial enterprises, which is a guarantee that the business of the Company will be conducted in a sound and prudent manner.

The Directors have also agreed to act for not less than three years.

The purchase price has been fixed at the sum of £100,000, £30,000 of which is to be in cash, and the balance of £70,000 in fully-paid shares. The small amount of cash asked for by the Vendor as compared with the total purchase price is some guarantee of his confidence in the property.

With proper machinery and appliances, for which the working capital of £50,000 is considered ample, the property can be opened and developed, and there is good reason to believe with most profitable results.

The only contract entered into by the Company is one dated the 3rd day of December, 1896, between John Gingold, Esq., of the first part, Albert E. J. Parker, of the second part, and the Company of the third part, adopting an Agreement dated the 16th day of November, 1896, made between the said John Gingold of the one part, and the said Albert E. J. Parker, as trustee for and on behalf of the Company, of the other part.

Full copies of the reports of Mr. C. WILSON-MOORE, Mr. J. DAMPIER-GREEN, Mr. R. H. CAVELL, and Mr. J. L. FRASER, consulting mining engineers, and of the above-mentioned contract, and the Memorandum and Articles of Association, may be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company.

The Vendor has also entered into certain contracts relating to the expenses of the formation of the Company, and in connection with guaranteeing and issuing the capital offered for subscription to which the Company is no party, and applicants for Shares will be deemed to have notice of such contracts, and to have waived their right to have such particulars thereof, as is prescribed by Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, or otherwise.

The Vendor bears all expenses attending the formation, incorporation and registration of the Company, and all duty and other expenses incident to the transfer of the property to the Company, and generally of all preliminary expenses whatever incurred in relation to the Company up to and including the first general allotment of shares.

The original reports and the map above referred to can be seen at the Offices of the Company.

Applications for shares should be made on the accompanying form and forwarded to the Company's Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application. The allotment will be made as early as possible after the subscription is closed, and in cases where no allotment is made, the amount deposited on application will be returned at once, without reduction. If the number of shares allotted be less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the payment on allotment; so far as necessary, and any balance will be returned.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and at the Offices of the Company.

December, 1896.

ADDENDUM.

Since the drawing up of this Prospectus, the returns of the New Heidelberg-Roodepoort Mine for the month of November have come to hand. With 40 stamps, running 28 days, 1,552 oz. have been obtained. As this Company's reef is one of those running through the Greylingstadt Company's property, this result of actual working is most satisfactory.

(This Form of Application may be used.)

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2. 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and, for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change their noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 931.

The answers in this competition have been referred to a gentleman who is, I think, well qualified to adjudicate in this particular instance. I have not up to the time of going to press received his award, but I shall be able, doubtless, to announce it next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 932.

The award in this competition will not be made until Puzzle Competition No. 935 is also decided.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 936.

The usual prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

The Most Amusing Instance of any Original Malapropism Overheard by any Competitor.

It is essential that the instances sent in should be original and not repetitions of malapropisms already seen in print. The following example of a malapropism will serve to make quite clear what is the kind of thing which competitors are required to send in:—

A district visitor one day addressing a cottager said, "What an old woman your mother is, to be sure!"

"Yes, mum," was the answer, "if she only lives a couple of years longer she will be a centurion."

No competitor must send in more than three malapropisms, and all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, January 11.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Queen Anne, winner of a half of Prize No. 927, is Miss Katharine Stewart, care of Mrs. Spain, 10, Victoria-square, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Waynflete.—I have received your letter and will reply to it next week.

Bel Demonio, Charlwood, P. P. C., Meg, Abbot, &c.—Many thanks for your kind wishes, which I heartily reciprocate.

M. A. M.—I have read your seasonable greeting with much pleasure.

Viva.—The correction will be made.

Black Poodle.—"Sir Inge" is not really a rhyme for "Syringe" any more than "soled" is a rhyme for "sold." Words intended to rhyme together must begin with letters dissimilar in sound.

East Anglia.—I much regret your dissatisfaction. I may tell you, however, that I carefully examined the available authorities before confirming my decision.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 933.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

EPIGRAMMATIC DESCRIPTIONS OF CHRISTMAS.

A boxing match minus gloves.—Ellart.

The chameleon of days—presenting a different aspect, bright, parti-coloured or dark, to the mind's eye of each observer.—Nosloc.

1. A season of seasoning, when dead geese are stuffed, that living ones may be. 2. The crowning carnival of an old year in old England homes.—Blunderbuss.

An opportunity for Christian charity, more often an excuse for self-indulgence.—Malignant.

1. By developing reciprocal kindness and good-will, it is the best ideal of family and social life. 2. Heaven's spring in earth's winter; heaven's dawn on earth's night.—Excelsior.

The bil(l)ious season.—Phyllis.

The season when the soft light of a divine star is obscured by a blinding constellation of material comets.—Georgina.

1. A present help to the Christian life, but a recurrent menace to the Christian liver. 2. A time when the soul's opportunity is apt to be lost in the body's importunity. 3. An observance under the new dispensation, in which the law of the table replaces the tables of the law, the burnt offerings being returned. 4. A paradoxical season when the heart is affected, the liver enlarged, and the organs sound. 5. A feast for which the well-to-do thank Providence, the necessitous their uncle, and the destitute their guardians. 6. A season when "merry thoughts" suggest turkeys, and turkeys suggest stuffing.—Merle.

1. An immovable feast (pending blue pills and black draught). 2. A holly-day.—Wallfred.

1. Though winter, the springtide of generous giving and wide-reaching happiness infecting all with a noble wish to serve. 2. The season when the dove and olive branch seems fittest emblems.—Esperanza.

1. Billtime. 2. Tiptide. 3. Feast and good pill.—Wild Cat.

Christmas is to me a season of seasoning, and a seasoning of the season.—Beginner.

The apotheosis of a pudding.—Tibicen.

Holly, Holocausts (of poultry), and Holloway's Pills.—Coalheaver.

A bill-ous time.—Popocatapetl.

1. A holiday, a holly day, not a holy day. 2. The doctor's carnival.

1. Nativity, festivity, receptivity. 2. A time for every one to have a finger in the pie. 3. Christendom's Carnival.—A. E. L.

A season of spiritual rejoicing noted for indigestion.—Dromedary.

1. A holy season, a holly season, a holiday season. 2. A holy day, a holly day, a holiday.—Frank.

King Christmas comes but once a year, and in his train there run
Five chief attendants—dancer, diner, doctor, debt, and dun. Oom Paul.

1. The time for tur-key, whis-key, and latch-key. 2. The omnipresent time. 3. The season of mist, missive, and mistletoe. 4. The time when the world may turn over its new leaves.—Pansy.

1. The season for remembering debts of money and forgetting debts of malice. 2. The time when many try to be happy, and some succeed. 3. The season of numerous good wishes and a few good actions. 4. The father of good feeling and good feeding.—Amos.

Fills, pills, bills.—Vervex.

That day on which this part of the planet attains its perihelion to the sun of happiness, and all around in consequence is "radiant with arrowy vitalities."—Arch. Gibbs.

A solemn birth,
Bright children's mirth,
Fraught with much care
For many to bear,
Memories of gold
To solace the old. Mim.

A holly-day and holy day (O lie day). 8. A holiday (O lie day) when it is customary to shower on another best wishes, if you wish him from your heart all the misfortune imaginable. 9. When England enjoys meeting (meat in) Turkey. 10. Ha'p'orth of all sorts as regards wishes. 11. Box and Cox.—Felixicus.

1. A sentimental pantomime with a prelude of psalms and gifts, an interlude of feasts, and finishing up with indigestion and debt.

2. Room at the inn for great and small,
And a fair and fragrant festival.

3. A season to commemorate our forefathers' appetites and their hospitality 4. A festival to the gods Bacchus, Christ, our Forefathers. 5. That season of the year when people so crowd the inn that Mary is compelled to retire to the stable. 6. One of the sorrows of Satan. 7. A season when everybody seems to be enjoying themselves but—oneself.—Job.

1. Christmas to us should mean a time
To act more Christlike—more divine,
And read again that verse with care:
Ye should another's burden share.

2. To the children it means all frolic and fun?
To the turkeys and geese, their race they have run;
For the young men and maidens a time of delight;
To the old and the aged another year's flight.
E. J.

Birth-day,
Mirth-day.
Bright holly,
Much folly.
Cares manifold;
For lack of gold.
Empty places,
Wistful faces.
Peace untold,
To Christians old.
Mina.

Feasting, flirtation,
Bills, botheration,
Much osculation,
Ills, irritation,
Church decoration,
Chills, inflammation,
Gifts, gratulation,
Pills and purgation,
Joy, jubilation,
Wills—inhumation!
Maia.

The close of the Anglo-Saxon year, under religious auspices in honour of the birthday of Christ (December 25), the Founder of the religion. It is marked by general relaxation and corresponding festivities. It takes place in the most inclement season of the year, consequently for their comforts, their recreations and their amusements, the Anglo-Saxons are at the time thrown entirely upon their own personal resources. In result, increase of goodwill among men, the cardinal point of the religion, is perhaps perceptible at any rate at the time, and permanently so in the case of many large trading firms. The celebration of the event is naturally most conspicuous among those, ordinarily, the most occupied. It is, of course, most highly appreciated by those in whom the capacity for intense enjoyment has not been blunted, such as the young, &c.—Apostrophe.

The Historical Christ.

"And Thou, Diviner still, &c."—Byron.

Birthday of Him, whose influence divine
E'en theologians could not wholly kill;
Oh! that mankind would, one and all, combine
To see Him as He liv'd and do His will.

The Obscured Christ.

"Is not this the carpenter?"—Mark vi. 3.

How long will Christians patiently endure
To wrangle o'er a portrait dim with time,
By priestcraft, in dark ages, made obscure,
Nor lift the veil which hides His face sublime?

The Popular Creed.

"Some Christians have a comfortable creed!"—Byron.

Christ died to sinners save from endless hell;
Yet most are damn'd: explain this curious puzzle;
All save himself each damns—yet cries, "All's well!
A merry Christmas"—then goes home to guzzle!
